LITERATURE.

Madame de Staël: her Friends and her Influence in Politics and Literature. By Lady Blennerhassett. Translated from the German by J. E. Gordon Cumming. In 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

THIS work, which originally appeared at Berlin, is one of unusual interest and value. Prompted by a genuine love of her subject, Lady Blennerhassett sets before us what really amounts to a series of elaborate pictures of the period between the accession of Louis XVI. and the fall of Napoleon, with M^{de}. de Staël as a more or less distinctive figure throughout. It must at once be said that the author sins in the way of giving her readers too much. The acts and character and influence of M^{de}. de Staël might be adequately illustrated in about one-half of the sixteen hundred closely printed octavo pages here devoted to her memory. Lady Blennerhassett, there can be little doubt, has a defective sense of order and historical proportion, and has not been at sufficient pains to sift the enormous mass of material at her command. But any prejudice that may be excited against her book by its excessive length will be largely dissipated in the perusal. It is one of the brightest and most trustworthy records of the time in question that we possess. No good source of information as to the personages it deals with has escaped Lady Blennerhassett's researches; anecdotes new to English readers often light up her narrative; and her writing is clear, unaffected, and generally vigorous. From serious error she is commendably free, although the proofs of the English translation have not been revised with due care. Misprints of names and French words follow in rapid succession; and the eyesore of a formidable table of errata, in itself not exhaustive, is inflicted upon us at the beginning of each volume.

M^{de}. de Staël cannot be thought unworthy of the incense here burnt at her shrine. It is true that as a literary phenomenon she has ceased to impress the world. Posterity declines to re-echo the praises she elicited in her own days. Her works are rarely read, quoted from, or written about. Nor are we disposed to urge that they deserve a better fate. Without going quite so far in the way of hostile criticism as Thiers, who called them the perfection of mediocrity, we may say that they are comparatively unattractive both in matter and in style. High creative power M^{de}. de Staël did not possess; the finer thoughts embodied in her pages are borrowed; and she could never be persuaded, as Sir Philip Francis would have put it, that polish is essential to preservation. Moreover, the peculiar vein of sentiment which colours so much of her writing is no less a thing of the past than that of the précieuses of the seventeenth century. When all this is admitted, however, there are still many reasons why a tolerably full account of her career should be procurable. She had a prominent place in the elegant and glittering society of Paris as the ancien régime was tottering to its fall. Her biography is a part of the history of France in the two eventful decades that followed the convocation of the States-General. Out of France she became acquainted with the most illustrious of her contemporaries. Her treatises on German literature, like Voltaire's Lettres sur les Anglais, had the inestimable effect of familiarising her countrymen with intellectual treasures previously unknown to them, of implanting increased catholicity of taste among the rising generation, and of hastening what is rather loosely designated the romantic movement. Faithful to Liberalism in a high sense of the term, she brought upon herself the bitter and inveterate enmity of Napoleon, whose despotism assumed its meanest aspect in his attitude towards her. Lamartine rightly speaks of M^{de}. de Staël as a representative woman of the stormy era through which she passed:

"Born in a Republic and brought up in a court, daughter of a minister and wife of an ambassador, and connected by birth with the people, by talent with the literary world, and by social position with the aristocracy, she united in her person the conflict of the three elements of the Revolution."

Eminently favourable to the cultivation of her keen and comprehensive intelligence were the conditions under which M^{de}. de Staël grew up. Her father was Necker, the Swiss financier, and her mother that Suzanne Curchod whom Gibbon jilted so heartlessly. The pair were clever, refined, and exemplary in the relations of private life; and their marriage, originally one of convenience simply, soon came to be cemented by affection on each side. M^{de}. Necker, born in 1766, was, like thousands of children at that time, educated on the system laid down by Rousseau, but also with a strong reverence for Christianity, against which the New Philosophy had long declared war, and on behalf of which her father now and then took up his pen. "I bring up my daughter," M^{de}. Necker wrote, "to be like Emile and not like Sophie; and hitherto nature seems more attractive than any art could be." M^{de}. Necker's childhood was marked by uncommon precocity. She wrote a variety of things—social sketches, studies of character, verses, essays, letters, plays, marginal notes upon a copy of the Esprit des Lois, a short treatise upon the Edict of Nantes, and even an analysis of the Compte Rendu by which her father deprived himself of his post as finance minister of France. Necker, pleasantly styling her M^{de}. de Sainte Eeritoire, smiled encouragement over these compositions, but wisely refused to let any of them appear in print. From what we see of the girl it is clear that she was the mother of the woman—ardent, impulsive, generous, fond of knowledge, and craving for the affection of those around her. Necker seems to have understood her better than his wife did. She had the first place in his heart and thoughts, and her love for him rose to a species of idolatry. Presently, as a consequence of the confusion into which the finances of the country were falling, he found himself reinstated in his old position, and M^{de}. Necker's salon in Paris became a favourite resort of genius, rank, and wealth. Lady Blennerhassett well remarks that this was in reality M^{de}. Necker's training school. The conversation of the men she met there could not but have had a direct effect upon the development of her mind. Ideas of settling her in life occurred to Necker before she was out of her teens. It was not improbable at one time that she would be the wife of William Pitt, who met her in Paris during his travels; but in the end, evidently to please her parents rather than herself, she married the Baron de Staël-Holstein, from Stockholm, on the condition, with which Gustavus III. was good enough to comply, that he should be made Swedish ambassador to the Court of Versailles. This was at the beginning of 1786. Nearly three years afterwards, when the storm that had been so long gathering over the country was about to break, the young Baroness, already a profound student of contemporary politics, as a correspondence with her husband's royal master will show, made her first appearance as a writer with the Lettres sur Jean Jacques Rousseau. No subject could have been more attractive. The Contrat Social was the "Bible of the day," and churches ordinarily deserted would be crammed when sermons based upon Emile were announced. M^{de}. de Staël, though "intellectually a daughter of Rousseau," had the good sense to perceive, and the courage to declare, that the chief doctrines he had promulgated, were purely chimerical:

"He wished," she writes, "to lead mankind back to social conditions of which the fables of the Golden Age can alone give any idea. Such a project is, of course, a mere flight of the imagination. But in their search for the philosopher's stone the alchemists made many useful discoveries. I venture to reproach Rousseau for refusing to consider that a nation governed by its own representatives is free, and for insisting on a general assembly of every individual. Enthusiasm is all very well in sentiment, but is out of place in practical schemes. The defenders of liberty should beware of exaggeration. Montesquieu is more useful to society as it now exists. Rousseau would be more useful to those combining together for the first time; most of the truths he develops are speculative."

Indeed, it was as a disciple of Montesquieu instead of Rousseau, as a supporter of the form of government which secured the ascendancy of rank and education and wealth, that M^{de}. de Staël entered upon the revolutionary era. "France," she wrote three months before the convocation of the States-General, "is on the point of presenting a tremendous spectacle to Europe. This in itself should awaken ambition; but I tremble for the steersmen surrounded by such rocks." The triumph of the Tiers-Etat, of course, divided the country into hostile parties, and even the most refined salons became theatres of political passion. M^{de}. de Staël soon made herself famous, not only as the daughter of Necker, whom Paris temporarily regarded as the saviour of France, but by reason of the cogeny with which, barely twenty-three years of age, she advocated the introduction into France of something resembling English constitutionalism. Ségur tells us that among the remarkable and attractive members of the younger generation the Baronne de Staël, in especial, betrayed such marked pungency of argument and eloquence that very few could enter the lists against her, since she surprised, convinced, and carried away her hearers. "Her house," said Gouverneur Morris, "is a kind of temple of Apollo, where men of wit and fashion are collected twice a week at supper, once at dinner, and sometimes more frequently." Her life-long affection for Necker did not prevent her from seeing that nature had unfitted him to deal with such a crisis as had now come. He was timid, irresolute, and prone to reflection; and his daughter confesses that his character and cast of mind led him to await events instead of precipitating them by any decision of his own. He even lost an opportunity of coming to terms with Mirabeau when the democratic ardour of the latter was cooling. Malouet had arranged a meeting between the two. Necker was so little a judge of men that he received the popular leader with a frigid and reserved air. "Monsieur," he said, "I understand you have propositions to make. What are they?" Mirabeau recoiled, looked at his interlocutor from head to foot with ineffable contempt, and, remarking "My intention was merely to wish you a very good morning," turned upon his heel. For Mirabeau himself Mme. de Staël entertained an involuntary but profound admiration. To her, as to all keen-eyed observers, he was "a sort of Hercules." His firework eloquence transported her out of herself. "He was too great," she tells us, "not to be aware of the impossibility of a democracy for France; but had such a thing been possible he would have had no taste for it." Mme. Roland is one of those who do not appear to advantage here. Lady Blennerhassett quotes a letter in which this additional "daughter of Rousseau" breathes as sanguinary and ruthless a spirit as that of the furies de guillotine.

"You busy yourselves," she wrote to Bosc, "with forming a municipality; and you shield the heads of the evil-doers. You are mere children; your enthusiasm is a short-lived flame; and if the National Assembly does not arraign two illustrious heads, or fails to find a noble-minded Decius to cut them off, you will all be—"

Mme. de Staël was not content to play the part of a passive spectator in the convulsion. Before the 10th of August she devised a plan for saving Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, which, however, came to nothing. With the fall of the monarchy, as may be supposed, her sympathy with the Revolution finally ended. From that moment she exerted herself to promote what a Girondist called "le retour de la paix après une agitation nécessaire." Friends in danger of the guillotine, too, found an asylum in her house. One of these was Narbonne, who, according to her own confession, was the first possessor of her affections. Her generosity exposed her to some danger, as even her rights as an ambassadress were not likely to be respected under the Terror if she stood in the way of "justice." On one occasion she nearly fell a victim to the fury of the crowd. She was stopped in her carriage by a horde of old women, and was compelled to drive through the streets, amid the objurgations and threats of the onlookers, to the Hôtel de Ville. The steps there presented the appearance of a forest of pikes. A man pointed his weapon at her, but the gendarme in attendance struck it aside with his sword and saved her from falling. "Had I fallen," she said, "there would have been an end of me. It is in the nature of the populace to like that which stands upright; once down, you get no mercy. Horror gave me courage." Extricated from this difficulty, she went soon afterwards to England, there to become the "centre of a small colony of emigrants," including Narbonne, at Mickleham. If her relations with the object of her affections were innocent, as some of her admirers have asserted, she certainly showed what to the English mind was a culpable disregard of appearances. Migrating to her father's Swiss home at Coppet, she occupied herself with works of benevolence, wrote a pamphlet in defence of Marie Antoinette, and contrived to save many friends still in Paris from the guillotine. By the time of Robespierre's fall her political opinions had undergone some modification. In the following year she wrote her Réflexions sur la Paix. "The Republic," she said in it, "recommends itself to the French; a limited monarchy can be reached only through military despotism."

The most important period of her activity as a writer began in 1798, when, again a power in Paris, separated from her husband, and an object of rancorous hatred alike to Royalists and to believers in Caesarism, she entered upon her studies for De Littérature. Her chief aim here was to throw light upon the history of the intellectual development of Europe from the days of Homer to the French Revolution. The review was wider and deeper than had been expected, although she knew little or nothing of Dante, so long underrated in France, and was apparently ignorant of the existence of Calderon. Especially striking were her dissertations upon German literature—dissertations which to all but a few of her countrymen were like the revelation of a new world. The reaction against the old classical forms of poetry acquired fresh energy in view of the masterpieces thus brought to light; and Mme. de Staël, while so far under the influence of early training and associations as to perceive in "Hamlet" "les fautes de goût les plus révoltantes," gave the support of her pen to the inevitable triumph of genius over conventionality. Lady Blennerhassett, by the way, betrays some poverty of information on one point by saying that the romantic school of 1830 was "begun by Beaumarchais, Mercier, Diderot, and Mme. de Staël." Lamotte is entitled to the credit of having laid its foundation-stone; Voltaire unconsciously lent a hand in raising the structure by importing an element of realism into his tragedies; and the only other poet who can rightly be said to have furthered the work in the eighteenth century was Mercier.

The publication of De Littérature was followed by a heavy blow to Mme. de Staël. Napoleon, now supreme in the state, found in her an uncompromising foe, with the power of argument and wit to give ample effect to her ideas:

"Why," he said to Joseph Bonaparte, "does she not support my government? What does she want? The repayment of the sums spent by her father? She shall have them. Does she wish to remain in Paris? I will permit it. In one word, what does she want?"

The conversation was reported to Mme. de Staël by Joseph himself. "Mon Dieu!" she exclaimed, "it is not a case of what I want but of what I think!" Refusing to give way, she was doomed to what Napoleon thought would be banishment for life from France. For this sentence, crushing as it must have been to one who scarcely found a congenial atmosphere out of Paris, she had some consolation in the excitement of travelling abroad. After publishing her first novel—Delphine—she paid the first of two visits to Germany. Her fame had preceded her thither, and all the giants at Weimar hastened to give her welcome. Goethe thought that she did honour to the age. To Schiller she appeared the cleverest and most intellectual of women.

"Mme. de Staël," said William von Humboldt, "was a really great woman, not only in her intellect, but in her true and deep feeling, her endless and never-failing goodness, her heart and disposition."

None the less is it the fact that a few of them found this vivid and voluble lady somewhat fatiguing. "She writes octavos and talks folios!" groaned one of the band. A tour in Italy gave her the idea of Corinne, in many respects the most enduring of her works. Like Delphine, it turns partly upon her own experience—an unrealised aspiration for marital happiness—and has special charms for lovers of the aesthetic. Her elder son, Auguste de Staël, thought this an excellent opportunity for interceding with the emperor on her behalf. Napoleon received him with a show of kindness, but would not let her return:

"Before she had been in Paris six months," he said, "I should have to send her to Bicêtre or the Temple. That would be a pity, for the affair might injure me in public estimation. As long as I am alive she will never see Paris again."

Corinne was succeeded by that striking picture of German life and thought and art, De l'Allemagne. Napoleon's bitterness against her seemed to deepen with lapse of time. He suppressed the book as soon as it appeared in Paris, several thousand copies being confiscated. In a year or two, however, it was printed in London, where the author, after a tour comprising Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Stockholm, arrived in the spring of 1813, and where, by reason of her intellectual prowess, the persecution she had suffered, and her enmity towards "the Corsican," she was lionised to a degree that might have satisfied even a vainer woman. It is to her credit that on the fall of the emperor she did not join those who execrated him as destitute of genius and courage. "France," she said, "has not sunk so low as to obey a poltroon for fifteen years." Before this, Staël having died, she had married Jean de Rocca, who, although her junior by many years, had conceived a romantic attachment to her, and in whom she found the sympathy denied her until then.

One of her last acts was to advocate the restoration of the Bourbons on liberal principles. With Rocca at her side, she died at Coppet in her fifty-first year, leaving a not unimportant contribution to history in her Considérations sur la Révolution Française.

Few readers of Lady Blennerhassett's book can fail to be struck by the singular fascination exercised by Mme. de Staël over those who met her. Beautiful in the ordinary meaning of the word she was not; but if ever a countenance derived beauty from intellectual expression it must have been that which appears before us in the well-known portrait representing her masculine figure in the costume of the Empire, with her masses of curly hair half confined under an oriental headdress, her luminous dark eyes turned slightly to the left, and her lips "parting as though about to speak." Besides this, she had the gift of what is nowadays called personal magnetism, and her conversation had all the power that comes of acute observation, wide knowledge, and brightness of repartee. From the typical bas-bleu she was certainly removed by many degrees. The following extract from a letter by Henriette Knebel may be said to crystallise nine-tenths of contemporary testimony on the subject:

"There is nothing pedantic or priggish about her, nothing exaggerated or immature. She is healthy in all her cleverness. Anything less oppressive it would be impossible to find; she cannot be otherwise than pleasant. Her conversation is really the most unusual talent I have ever come across; so gentle, yet full of that power which always betrays talent; never anything cutting or decided, which so often makes a woman ungracious and tiresome. She is equally above affected compliance or coquetry, and yet no one knows better than she does how to give way or to unbend."

Doubtless there are a few incidents in her career which an appreciative biographer feels reluctant to narrate; but no ordinary respect was due to the woman who at imminent risk to herself had protected some of the intended victims of the Terrorists, whose purse had always been open at the call of persecuted friends, and who had preferred exile from her beloved Paris to surrendering or paltering with reasoned convictions. Looking at her character in its entirety, we can hardly be surprised that she should have been half-deified before the grave closed over her remains.

FREDERICK HAWKINS.

In my Lady's Praise. By Sir Edwin Arnold. (Trübner.)

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD's new poems are born of that "bitter constraint and sad occasion" to which, by the strange miracle of Art, we owe so many of her most beautiful things, begotten in pain yet joys for ever. How often, indeed, does the poet sow in tears that we may reap in gladness. And seldom would it seem has "sad occasion" been sadder than the loss which gives us these "Poems, Old and New, written to the Honour of Fanny, Lady Arnold, and now collected for her Memory."

It was fit that the monument which Sir Edwin Arnold thus seeks to raise should be Oriental in subject, though the Oriental spirit which also inspires it—that spirit seeking grandeur rather than pathos in its memorials, asking more the homage than the tears of the passer-by—is somewhat alien to the temper of English grief, which seeks rather some flower-like symbol of piteous beauty for its graves.

"The daffodils fill their cups with tears
To strew the laureate hearse where Lycid lies."

So, Sir Edwin Arnold—though he cannot, as he sings in some introductory lines, build for his lady a literal Taj Mahal of wondrous marbles—still essays to build such metaphorically in "The Casket of Gems."

"Only my verses have I, which I built Line by line, for thee living, and now r. of
With sorrowful last words, and coping-stones
Of fond farewell."

But ere we enter therein, let me not forget the little opening poem of the volume, which brings us so piteously close to the bed where Love is kneeling in tears. Its theme is Love's last words—"Good night! not good bye!"

"Good-night!—and not good-bye!
Good-night!—and best 'good-morrow' if we wake;
Yet, why so quickly tired? Well, we must make Haste to be done, and die!"

*For dying has grown dear
Now you are dead. . . .*

The lines I have ventured to italicise are forget-me-nots such as grow but in English fields.

The "Casket of Gems" is more literal than fanciful descriptions of poetical collections are wont to be, consisting entirely, indeed, of poems of precious stones, ranged in such order that the initial letters of their names build together, from beginning to end of the casket, Lady Arnold's name—Fanny Maria Adelaide—a device perhaps too suggestive of acrostics for dignity. Sir Edwin Arnold's method of treating his various gems gives him many opportunities for his particular felicities. Sometimes he sings their growth in the wonderful caves of the sea, how "the oyster gems his shallow moonlit chalice," or how the trilobite comes to ultimate transfiguring uses—thus:

"Mean rubbish of the road-heaps; silicates Which gather in chalk-hollows, where, sea-bred,
Millions of billions, tubes, and tunicates Laid down their limy shells, Nature's small dead."

"Who would have thought there should be use, or other Service, for such lost Atoms of the main When, sinking through the seas, they give the Mother
Their tiny life-garbs, to lay up again?"

"But she—who hastes not, wastes not, scorns not —takes it,
Each relic of her nameless children gone, Stores her sea-oozes with their spoil, and makes it
Chalk down, or marble vein, or quarry-stone."

"Till ages thence—of ruined nummulites, Pharaohs their pyramids majestic build;
And Phœdias, from a tomb of trilobites, Calls Pallas forth, radiant with helm and shield!"

Sometimes he unveils the hidden virtues for good and ill that dwell therein; how diamonds "under the pillow of a sleeping bride" will make her tell if other lips have kissed her; how an emerald knows the hearts of parted lovers, and

"Burgeons for true love, like sprays of henna,
But withers at a broken vow to white."

Potent is it also against snake-bites; and does not one of the Gesta Romanorum tell how the blindness of Theodosius was cured by a topaz, and the wonderful manner of it? Then, again, iolite and ivory remind the poet of the old Buddhist story of the elephant that was born again a prince, because in a jungle fire he saved the life of a mouse at the expense of his own; as rubies bring to mind how the dove Kumri saved Suleiman in his temptation of the Ruby Vial. Very pleasantly set forth is all this quaint lore and fable; but, as always, Sir Edwin Arnold is most acceptable telling some tender love-tale with the memory of which his gem is linked. His descriptions of bodily beauty, sensuous, yet chaste, and his expression of the moods of passion, are as delicate as of old. Suvama, with her "sweep of silken shoulder," was indeed too beautiful to have "meekly followed Buddh" as she did; and the poet well asks:

"Was that done well?
Ah Love! love is so lovely, who can say?
I only know this life.
. . . Let us not go her way!"

Nor has the author of the "Indian Idylls" ever given us fairer stories than that, having the dawn-stone for a sign, of the loves of Ayani, daughter of a Mexican priest, and a young captive consecrate as an offering to the divinity; or the legend of the jacinths, which it will be well to pause at a moment, as James Thomson (B. V.) also made it the theme of a poem. It is the beautiful story of those "Two Lovers," a Musalman knight and a Christian maid, who, dying far away from each other, each at the moment of death renounced the religion of their birth to take that of the other, lest the loved one should walk alone in the burning fields of hell, thus missing each other for ever. So Thomson's version of the story; but Sir Edwin Arnold introduces another and a happy ending, which is surely to rob it of that tragic irony which is its great significance. In his version the two lovers, both dying of the plague, apart, but in the same city, are by their relations, in disgust at their apostacy, cast for dead outside the walls. But Majnun was only in a trance; and, on awaking, he finds his lady Mariam, who also is not dead, but soon, by means of his gentle ministrations, is brought back to life and idyllic love. It is a pity Sir Edwin Arnold ends his poem so, for in other respects it is finer than Thomson's—more dramatic, more flexible in movement, richer and truer in colour.

. . . "Majnun was Said's son,

"Sheikh of the Gate, a hot Believer: she Sole child of Nicolas the merchant. Never Dared they to meet if night's complicity Veiled not their trembling joys. Cruel ones ever

"Watched them, incensed an infidel's pale face
Should draw an Islamite with sorcery;
Incensed a maid of Christ should yield her place
'Mid saints, a Muslim's Light o' Love to be.

"But, through the jealous lattice of her bower
Sometimes he took the comfort of her eyes,
And by the lute's low voice, or some dropped flower
Knew it was well with her, or otherwise.

"For many waters shall not overflow,
Nor sharpened daggers daunt, nor angry faces
Affright, nor bitter doctrines check, nor woes
Change a true love, which in the holy places

"Kneels nearest God. Yet, on our little star
Purged must it be by Sorrow's fellowship;
And pale the visages of lovers are
With earthly griefs, when happy lip meets lip
"In those Elysian meads where Death is dead."

Any who find Sir Edwin Arnold's Hindustani a trial will suffer again in this volume, and the name of the Mexican deity referred to above is Tezicatlēpotchli! But his admirers have by this time, I suspect, acquired a taste for these mystic phrases, as one comes to cherish the mannerisms of a favourite actor; and I, for one, admit that certain verses in "The Light of Asia" would lose much impressiveness for me without Om amitaya or Om mni padme om. Of course, there are doubtless people, on the other hand, who, as Doctor Wendell Holmes says, care nothing about Om.

The "Casket of Gems" covers almost the whole of the volume, but following it are collected a few odd poems associated with Lady Arnold in various ways, the majority of which have been printed before. Among the new is a pretty rhythmic jingle in that gay familiar strain of happy days when even solemn thoughts are met with smiles, written once when Lady Arnold was away from home and the poet sat lonely. It is called "In Absence," and this is one verse:

" . . . I love you
For troubler, cares and fears;
For faults and foolish angers,
And whims and tiffs and tears,
For sulks not less than sweetness, sweet!
For faith no more than doubt;
Not counting nought those hours which brought Fondness by fallings-out."

Very sweet and sacred would seem to have been the love of which Sir Edwin Arnold allows us to be partakers through the fellowship of grief and song—

"All ye that pass along Love's trodden way, Pause ye awhile."

Morocco: Journeys in the Kingdom of Fez, and to the Court of Mulai Hassan. By H. M. P. de la Martinière. (Whittaker.)

IN reviewing Mr. Thomson's Travels in Southern Morocco (ACADEMY, June 1) we took occasion to notice the neglect with which Northern Morocco had been treated by travellers who aimed at a somewhat higher status than that of the mere tourist. The present volume emphasises these remarks; for it is not only among the best books which have ever been produced on Mulai Hassan's empire, but it is largely occupied with the description of routes through regions which, if not exactly unexplored, have never been laid down on any map, and to all intents and purposes are as little known as any of the districts which Mr. Thomson examined with such success.

The author—Vicomte de la Martinière—is a Frenchman who for a number of years past has devoted much of his time to the geography and antiquities of Northern Morocco. At present he is engaged on an archaeological expedition in that country, which is understood to have yielded interesting results, though for a time the different opinions held by the sheik of a village near Tangier regarding the dignity of the explorer, and those entertained by that gentleman as to what was due to himself, almost led to an international embroglio, soreness over the inglorious end of which seems to have dictated the reference on p. 421 to the late M. Feraud's "philarabian disposition." This volume does not, however, in any way relate to that journey. Nominally, it is based on a six-months' trip to Al Ks'ar El Kebir (Alqaçar) Wazzan, Meknas (Mequinez) Fez, El Araïsh (Larache), and Azila, which seems to have begun in 1884, though M. de la Martinière is not lavish with his dates. But as there are references to a visit made to Fez in company with the late M. Tissot, who was French minister to Morocco in 1871-76; and to Wazzan with Col. Trotter, who described this trip in a semi-anonymous paper in Blackwood's Magazine for October, 1883—a large portion of the volume must be the record of what in any other country than Morocco would be rather ancient history. Moreover, from allusions to matters which are no longer of living moment, it is evident that much of it was written long before publication, and has, in the author's absence, been translated by some one unfamiliar with the subject. Otherwise, the numerous typographical and other blunders—all of which are not, as an editorial remark intimates, corrected in the index—could not have been allowed to detract from the usefulness of what is, in spite of them, a most admirable description of Northern Morocco, of Moorish life so far as any European has opportunities of studying it, and of the grotesque political life of the empire.

Unlike most of his predecessors, the author has read much; and though a great deal of what he has to say is secondhand from M. Tissot, the memoirs of that lamented scholar are so little known to the majority of our countrymen that even a summary of them must be welcome to the greater number of M. de la Martinière's readers. The route maps are of permanent value, while his notes on the social life of the country are interesting as the observations of a cultured Frenchman, with full access to sources of official information. These seem to have been more trustworthy than those from which so many English writers have drawn the materials for their stereotyped narratives of our ambassadorial missions to the Shereefian court, or courtyard, as it might be more properly termed, considering the undignified position the foreign envoys submit to take up, while the Prince of True Believers sits haughtily on horseback to receive their congratulations and gifts, which in the eyes of his subjects are tribute sent by the Christian powers. At the same time, M. de la Martinière is not very French, though a few of his anecdotes have a Gallic flavour. Nor is he so unjust to the English as most of his countrymen have been in their books on Morocco. He is, nevertheless, inaccurate in what he tells us regarding the origin of the French military commission to Morocco. It was really forced upon the Sultan, in order to act as a check on Kaïd Maclean, the gallant English officer who has done such excellent service to the Moorish army. Now the Sultan, who would fain be without these officious personages, is threatened with both an Italian and a German contingent; and, doubtless, if they are foisted on him, Spain will insist on having her representative as a spy on the others. A good account is given of the Sultan's army, though, as Erckmann and Hildyard (Army and Navy Magazine, October, 1884) had already exhausted the subject, his notes lack novelty. The vaunted "Barb" comes in for little praise. This breed has, with few exceptions so deteriorated that the animals presented to European officials—with swords manufactured in Belgium or Germany, like the "Oriental weapons" recently sent to the Emperor William—are hardly worth sending out of the country by means of the special "permit" which accompanies the gift. Even those offered to foreign courts were valued by a horse-dealer at an average of £20 a-piece all round. The account given of the Moorish court, the slave trade, the strange renegades like "Ingiliz Bashaw" and "Abd er Rahman" (Count de Saulty) who have at different times sought fortune in the Sultan's service, and the scandalous relations of different European officials with the Sultan, will prove more generally interesting, though unfortunately the tale is not likely to put a fresh face on these matters. The empire is in a state of systematic anarchy. But, unlike some writers, who know less of the country than the latest writer on it, M. de la Martinière is not so precipitate as to imagine that it is on the eve of dissolution. It has never been anything else. Its disorders are in reality the safety-valves for the turbulence of its population. The descriptions given of the various towns are also very full and unusually accurate, though the guesses at the identity of certain Roman sites are, like those of M. Tissot, who is almost always followed, capable of a wide contrariety of opinion. Professed geographers will turn with profit to the remarks on pp. 145 and 165 regarding the valleys of the El Kous and Sebou, the latter of which rivers must not, however, be mistaken, as has often been done, for the Σοῖβος of the old Greeks, or Σοῖβος Πόταμος, which is the Wad el Sous.

Altogether, the book is well written, though it bears traces of its French origin in the spelling of various words. The ethnology (p. 69) is the poorest part of it. The sketch of the Grand Vizier, Sid Mohammed el Arbi, though good, is now a little de trop, as this typical Oriental—of an interview with whom the reviewer has a vivid recollection—has for several years past been paralysed and beyond duty. It will likewise be new to those who have studied the resources of Morocco to learn that the Moors "solely tan the skins of dogs" (p. 280). Goats of course are meant. "Tangiers," as the name of the principal port is spelt, is an archaic form. Indeed, it seems to have originated from the notion that in some way the town was identical with Algiers. Nowadays it is a sort of sibboleth and shibboleth by which to know whether anyone has ever visited the place to note whether he adds the final s or not. However, to make amends, Capt. Erckmann, the former chief of the French military commission (a gentleman who so yearned after immortality as to have hewn his name in huge characters on the monolith of El Outed!) is denied the ultimate n.

These are, however, trifles, due to the book not having been revised by a competent editor during the author's absence from the proofs; and, like many others which could be pointed out, will no doubt be corrected in the second edition, which the volume is so well entitled to attain. The bibliography is, perhaps, the most useful and yet the least satisfactory part of the volume. This list, which professes to supplement that of Renou, first appeared in the Revue de Géographie, so that plenty of time has been left for emendations. Yet it is still extremely imperfect. French books and papers are naturally most fully noted. But German, Spanish, and English ones have been sadly overlooked. No great difficulty would exist in doubling the roll. Even the compiler's own contributions to the literature of Morocco are not given with perfect fulness. Sometimes a page, but not the volume, of a journal is noted—so that the entry is useless; and occasionally we find, in the case of German books, the trade remarks of the bookseller from whose catalogue the name had been cut inserted, under the belief that they were part of the title. In many instances it is impossible to suppose that M. de la Martinière can have seen the volume he describes; and in no case is the "bibliography" of any critical value, though it may serve as a guide to those who are not very exacting in such matters. The list of maps is better, having been apparently compiled for the most part from the British Museum catalogue. But even this list will require revision. As for Renou's original bibliography, it was so ludicrously wanting that it requires supplementing quite as much as M. de la Martinière's addenda.

The volume, nevertheless, shows how much remains to be done within a few days' journey of Tangier. The whole country is, in truth, a terra incognita. Few Europeans have ever been inside a wealthy Moor's house. Yet in the recesses of some of these mansions there are stores of old china, the aftermath of ancient piracies; and only recently on an old court warehouse in Mequinez being opened, after being forgotten for ages, it was found full of works of art, including some lovely inlaid armour, which had been sent as gifts by the Portuguese sovereigns more than two centuries ago. By this time it may be destroyed, like so many other costly presents brought by embassies, tossed into a lumber room, like the portrait of the king of Italy, which, with strange ignorance of Moorish fanaticism, his majesty sent to Mulai Hassan, or serving as playthings to the inmates of the harem—a fate which long ago befel the mirrors of the heliograph, carried to Fez by Sir John Drummond Hay.

"Men of the Bible."—Jeremiah: His Life and Times. By the Rev. T. K. Cheyne. (Nisbet.)

THE series of biographies entitled "Men of the Bible" is obviously planned on the model of Mr. John Morley's "English Men of Letters." The aim of the series, therefore, is to produce volumes which shall be at once popular and critical. The writer of each life must have some right to speak with authority on his subject, and some claim to possess special knowledge of it. He must also be willing and able to write for the general reader, forcibly and clearly. The ideal biography unites literary grace and finish with the most recent and exact information. In the case of a series of lives of Biblical heroes, a special difficulty arises. No attempt has been made hitherto in England to write popular lives of Men of the Bible, in which the information is brought down to date, and the result of recent research clearly and fairly detailed and discussed. The revolution in the methods of historical criticism, which has compelled us to rewrite our histories of Greece and Rome, has not been permitted to interfere with the Biblical records. Dr. Arnold sighed for the Niebuhr of Jewish history, and his pupil, Dean Stanley, began the work his master suggested; but since Dean Stanley's effort the specialists have been left to themselves, and no one has come forward to explain their work to the general public. And yet it is just this explanation which the intelligent reader wishes to hear. He has no wish to assert that the Jewish historians are as untrustworthy as Livy in their earlier records; but he is most anxious to know what is the result of applying to their work the same criticism which has been applied to Livy's, and he will expect such a series as "Men of the Bible" to give him this information. Unfortunately, he will in most cases be disappointed. Such a piece of work, for instance, as Prof. Milligan's Elijah will be useless to him. Its ability, its scholarly clearness, its forcible style, are at once obvious; but Prof. Milligan holds that "the interpretation of the Old Testament has as yet made little really scientific progress," and says that "in the meantime . . . our proper attitude is to accept the narrative as it stands," so that his book has nothing to say on the one point of importance—the nature and value, that is, of "the narrative as it stands." His biography, in fact, is written for those who are to be kept in the dark; and anyone who resents being kept in the dark will be justly angry with Prof. Milligan. Most of the biographies of the series "accept the narrative as it stands," and are, therefore, futile; but Canon Cheyne's Jeremiah is a welcome and delightful exception. It is, indeed, to be regretted that this volume or Canon Driver's Isaiah was not published first, to encourage the other writers to be less proper in their attitudes. It is true that the career of Jeremiah does not include the difficulty of a miraculous element, nor do the historical records of his life present the problems which are suggested by the history of Elijah. But the finding of the Law has to be considered, and this introduces the whole question of the formation of the Old Testament books. This question has further light thrown upon it by Canon Cheyne's treatment of Jeremiah's writings; and everywhere Canon Cheyne meets and resists the temptation to adopt Prof. Milligan's "proper attitude," of accepting what he knows to be false, because it is difficult or impossible to ascertain the exact truth. Canon Cheyne's work is a labour of love. He has perfectly saturated himself with his subject; and, therefore, his book is clear and interesting in spite of its learning, in spite of its occasional detail, and in spite of the necessarily provisional character of some of its conclusions. Jeremiah's times and Jeremiah's character are made clear and interesting to the reader, mainly because they are so intensely clear and interesting to Canon Cheyne himself. The modest words of the preface—"With faltering steps I have sought to follow Arthur Stanley"—are too modest, because Canon Cheyne's steps do not falter. He has not Dean Stanley's literary genius; but his literary ability is considerable, and he has the power of communicating to his reader some of his own enthusiasm. The breadth of his culture is as surprising as his scholarship and learning, and has enabled him to add greatly to the charm of his biography by illustrations and parallels drawn from general history and literature. His book has none of the scholastic dryness which makes the excellent works of Prof. Robertson Smith somewhat tough reading.

We have been speaking so far entirely from the point of view of the general reader. It is for the general reader that Canon Cheyne specially writes. His motto is "C'est pour nous tous un devoir de rompre le cercle magique dans lequel nous restons volontairement enfermés"; but since his exposition of Jeremiah in the "Pulpit Commentary," and his article in the Encyclopædia Britannica, his views on some points have undergone change, so that the present volume will be interesting to scholars and specialists for its facts and arguments, as well as for its method. The method, however, is the remarkable feature of the book. The ease with which a load of minute learning is borne, the interest, almost amounting to excitement, with which we are enabled to follow a career occasionally so faintly described, cannot be realised till the volume is read. Dr. Cheyne has placed all readers of the Old Testament under a deep debt of gratitude.

- Children of To-morrow*. By William Sharp. (Chatto & Windus.)

The Mysteries of Deepdene Manor. By Frank Mauduit. (Digby & Long.)
Eight Bells. By Hume Nisbet. (Ward & Downey.)

It is unfortunate—perhaps more unfortunate for Mr. Sharp's readers than for Mr. Sharp himself—that, in his Children of To-morrow, he indirectly demands either a commendation or a condemnation of its idée mère. The children of to-morrow are Felix Dane, an artist, and Sanpriel Acosta, a beautiful Jewess, the daughter of a mad musician who is at the same time a true prophet. They are frantically in love with each other. The death of Felix's wife Lydia, and the disappearance of her lover and murderer Ford, have apparently left them free to marry. But Felix is a Gentile, and Sanpriel will not hear of his converting himself into a Jew to please and possess her. So she suggests as a way out of their difficulty that she should become his mistress—so at least the grown-up babies of to-day would have styled her had a flash of lightning not prevented the consummation of her purpose. Thus she "should still be a daughter of Israel, though as one fallen and disgraced." But, may it not be hinted to Mr. Sharp that at least one of his children of to-morrow is decidedly too superstitious? Looking to the stream of tendency in modern thought, is it not morally certain that the children of to-morrow will be neither Jew nor Gentile; but will, like Garibaldi and Anita, be believers in natural morality, will dispense with the services of parson and rabbi, and will be content with a civil marriage, if, unlike good Anarchists, they think any ceremony whatever necessary? It is a pleasure, however, to pass from Mr. Sharp as a seer—or, should I say, the champion of the sexual morality of to-morrow?—to Mr. Sharp the artist. The Children of To-morrow, though an unequal book, contains many passages both of beauty and of power. The plot, which leads through conspiracy, intrigue, and murder, to the union in death of Sanpriel and Felix, is well constructed; although, by the way, one cannot help asking if that ineffable scoundrel Ford, who succeeds in taking the heart and life of Lydia Dane, and tries to murder Felix, should not have been lynched, or handed over to the police in the last chapter? Ford's first attempt to murder Dane is exceptionally well managed, and so is that scene in which Felix hears his wife avow her love for Ford and her hatred of Sanpriel. Mr. Sharp can, moreover, enter very thoroughly into mysterious affinity between human passion and the storms of nature. His penultimate chapter, in which more than in any other, he illustrates this affinity, is, in spite of some extravagances, a piece of remarkable Turner-esque writing. I have little doubt that Children of To-morrow, which includes some of the best verses Mr. Sharp has ever written, is but the prelude to a riper, a pleasanter, and (in Mr. Sharp's own sense) more truly romantic work.

It is tolerably safe to say that Passages in the Life of Sir Lucian Elphin of Castle Weary is the work of a beginner in fiction, and of a promising, ambitious, and cultured beginner. It presents, at all events, both the strength and the weakness to be expected in such a work. It is written with great and commendable care. All details, both of plot-construction, and of character-development, are diligently attended to. But, on the other hand, the book is too long by, at least, half a volume. Then, its author falls into the beginner's faults of letting his readers perceive the sources of his intellectual, if not also his ethical inspiration, and of trying to include too much in his plot. The bye-elections and the hunting scenes in Merklandshire, an unconventional love affair, and Sir Lucian's parliamentary and "society" experiences were, with the "ban" which all but ruins his life, quite enough for one novel. We could very easily have dispensed with the Yankee financial swindle, and still more with Sir Lucian's passion for the wife of his defeated political opponent, which is only prevented from ending in an elopement by the murder of the chief scoundrel of the story in a railway carriage. It is disagreeable and—what is worse—it is French and artificial. Sir Lucian Elphin, as a fine young Scotchman, and Alceste Guiltree, as a typical American, are hardly the sort of folks to contemplate a breach of the seventh commandment. The Scotch scenes, particularly the early ones, of which Toomcaskie is the centre, are the best in the book, and, but for the artist's tendency to linger over his work, could honestly be described as very good indeed. Lord Guiltree, as a manly Teuton and aristocrat—of the English rather than of the Scotch variety, however—makes a pleasant portrait; so, although in different ways, do his impatient and hard-swearing father, and George Denison, his good genius, who is more or less of an agnostic. There is a sufficient amount of ability in Sir Lucian Elphin of Castle Weary to justify the belief that it marks its author's ostensible rather than his real start in fiction.

It may be doubted if Lord Desart will ever become a great novelist. But there is no reason why he should not attain a position of equality with, say, Mr. Hawley Smart. The Little Chatelaine is a much greater improvement upon Horne Lodge than Horne Lodge was upon its predecessors. It is, indeed, a well-constructed and well (because simply) written story, with no vulgar, sensual, or morbid element in it. In making Col. Carruthers fall in love with the daughter of his good-natured and proud, though weak and improvident, chum, Garland, and in making Geraldine finally offer herself to her protector, Lord Desart cannot be said to have struck out a fresh line in fiction. But he finds new surroundings for old ideas, and he develops these ideas consistently and cleverly. From first to last Carruthers is seen hovering about his ward, guarding her, fighting for her, unravelling conspiracies for her, but not actively figuring as a lover. The plots of the dubious Madame Proviro, first to bring about a marriage with Garland, and subsequently to injure his daughter, are worked out with considerable skill. Then Joxam, the vulgar but honourable sporting man, who comes conveniently on the scene, to act as Geraldine's protector when Col. Carruthers is not at hand, is in every way an admirable sketch. The humour, displayed chiefly in character-sketching—Edith Garland and her Tom are quite as good as Joxam—which is the pleasantest element in The Little Chatelaine, is a new and very promising departure for Lord Desart; and it may be assumed with tolerable confidence that he will make the most of it.

Derrick Vaughan, Novelist, does not challenge comparison with Donovan, We Two, and In the Golden Days. It is a study, not a story. But Edna Lyall has not written anything more artistic, or, from the moral point of view, more stimulating. In the midst of what promises to be a successful career as a novelist, Derrick Vaughan is called, by the voice of duty, to become the nurse and protector of his father, who is a dipsomaniac. This self-sacrifice threatens to be the ruin of his whole life. For his father, who despises him as at once a milksop and a tyrant over himself, prefers his other son, who blossoms into a somewhat showy military hero; and so for a time does Freda Merrifield, whom he loves, as novelists inferior to Derrick Vaughan would say "with all the intensity of a strong nature." In the end—for Edna Lyall has not heart to wind up her story with a tragedy—self-sacrifice meets with its reward, selfishness is exposed, and Derrick Vaughan is all the greater an artist for the experiences he has gone through. But even although Derrick's life had been a torso, his biographer would have made good her point, which is, to utilise the language that she herself quotes from Arnold Toynbee: "Sympathy is feeling related to an object, whilst sentiment is the same feeling seeking itself alone." There is almost no introspection in Derrick Vaughan, and no preaching whatever. In substance, as well as in form, it is the manliest of Edna Lyall's books.

But for one element in A Vagabond Lover, it would be indistinguishable from the ruck of Rita's novels. There is the usual amount of millinery and of passion—some of the passion, of course, "unholy"—in well-to-do circles.

"Sky, and sea, and air, were only voices echoing the music of his own glad song—the song that for all his life might be set to the passion and ecstasy of fulfilled desire."

Again,

"Her whole person seemed to sway towards him ['he' is not her husband, of course], and she wound her arms, supple as silk and strong as steel, about his neck," &c.

Hilda St. Maur, the Baroness Gildenstern, and Colonel Herbert, who do most of the mischief, the flirtation, the gossip, and the moralising in A Vagabond Lover, are old friends; and but for the fact of her being a widow, there is nothing very notable in Lady Doris Marchmont, the one thoroughly good woman in this story. Jack Trevanion, impecunious, unable to restrain his passion, and physically almost godlike, as becomes a hero-villain, would have been commonplace enough too, but for his withered and miracle-working Uncle Hartman, who can put life but not morality into him, and his Oriental friend, Mandhar Ram, who delivers a number of eloquent but totally ineffectual homilies on the conduct of life. Rita is not at home with occultism, spiritualism, and the elixir vitae. She should stick to sensuousness, splendour, Tokay, cigarettes, sea-green and transparent tulle, and whatever is "laughing, mischievous, riante."

There is a delightful amount of genuine and rollicking Irish humour in Mated from the Morgue, and its title is almost the only ghastly thing about it. A girl is, indeed, found dead at the Morgue, "with a smile on the face and a proud disdainful curl which had left its unchangeable impress on the mouth"; but fortunately the reader of Mr. O'Shea's story is much less interested in the identity of the person actually drowned than in that of the girl for whom she is mistaken. What he is likely to care for are the eccentricities and the adventures of the two Irishmen—O'Hara and O'Hoolahan—the Bonapartist enthusiasm of Capt. Chauvin, and the contrasted natures of his female charges. Some of the incidents are well managed—especially the duel between O'Hoolahan and the Gascon. The "passing" of Capt. Chau-vin on the forty-ninth anniversary of the death of the first Napoleon is also effective, but it recalls too readily the death of Sir Henry Lee in Woodstock. With so much genuine Irish drollery in him, Mr. O'Shea ought to have a future before him as a "patriotic" novelist.

The Mysteries of Deepdene Manor is a decidedly juvenile attempt to reproduce the days of the '45 and of the Pretender in the form of a historical romance. What with political conspiracies, smuggling, love, hollow oaks, trapdoors, seduction, revenge, explosions, and murder, the action of the story is certainly well kept up. That is, however, about all that can be said for it. The most of the characters—including even James Fox, who ruins, and even attempts to murder, Jenny Wood, and her maniacal father, who avenges her in too Whitechapel a fashion—are beneath rather than above the average. The best characters in The Mysteries of Deepdene Manor are the lovers Aline Houston and Arthur Newburgh. This fact, in addition to the stirring character of the plot will, probably enough, recommend it to many readers. Though sensational, it is perfectly harmless.

Eight Bells is obviously written for the class of readers which, although by no means composed entirely of boys, yet enjoys that robust hobbledohy fiction, the best quality of which is purveyed by the authors of Treasure Island and King Solomon's Mines. It would almost seem as if Mr. Hume Nisbet had changed his purpose, with a view to changing his reading constituency, in the course of writing his story, the most unfortunate thing about which is its too fanciful title. It starts with a boyish escapade in the form of running away to sea in the most literal fashion. Even life on board the Black Corbie, with its almost too Stevensonian captain, Edward Coffin, may be understood and, to a limited extent, enjoyed by young folks; but there are incidents in the career of The Flying Fox, such as the captain's struggle with delirium tremens and the butcher's treatment of his own thumb, that are rather too strong meat for boys. Then, when Mr. Nisbet takes his readers and his chief characters among the cannibals of New Guinea, he introduces for their benefit the fierce, though suppressed, passion of Edward Coffin for the wife of the missionary, Mr. Wilmore. The growth of this passion and the transformation of Coffin's nature which it involves, are the best things in Eight Bells; but they are hardly fitted for the daily consumption of the admirers of Jules Verne. Yet, taken as it stands, Eight Bells is one of the most startling stories of adventure, human courage, and human crime, ever written. Mr. Nisbet is a master of the graphic style, and there is an air of reality about his New Guinea scenes which seems to indicate that he knows his subject, and has not got it up from Chalmers and other authorities. The title of his book is, as already said, weak and fanciful; the story is, besides, too long, and the end is rather abrupt, and, if one may say so, does not lead us back to the beginning. Mr. Nisbet may, however, if he chooses, become a formidable rival even to the able writers who have preceded him in the line of fiction for which obviously he has a natural bent.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Prince, Princess, and People: an Account of the Public Life and Work of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, 1863-1889. By H. C. Burdett. (Longmans.) Of the private life which kings and queens, princes and princesses lead, we have lately heard so much that there may be a danger of forgetting that they have a public life which is even more important. We expect and rejoice to find domestic virtues in those whose example is necessarily powerful; but royalty exists for other purposes, and in the efficient discharge of public duties the democracy will look for its raison d'être. The Court Circular is not studied by many; and, therefore, there is far from being prevalent a just appreciation of the really hard work which nowadays a Prince and Princess of Wales are called upon to discharge. Mr. Burdett's record extends over twenty-five years; and it would be no easy matter to calculate how many have been the occasions on which their Royal Highnesses have taken some active part in promoting philanthropic, educational, religious, and, in fact, benevolent works of every kind. The "first stones" they have laid would form a pyramid of no mean height, and the silver spades and trowels they have wielded might be the outfit of an army of elegant artisans. But the point which is really most important is that, as this chronicle shows, our royal family does not confine its interest and its sympathies within any narrow bounds. While in the eyes of some the Prince seems to occupy an almost superhuman position, his own motto has evidently been: "Homo sum, humani nihil a me alienum puto." Mr. Burdett has compiled with much industry, and in a spirit of perhaps exuberant loyalty, a record of some interest; and the portraits and other illustrations with which it is enriched give it an additional value.

Speeches and Addresses of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, 1863-1883. Edited by James Macaulay. (John Murray.) This volume is a fitting companion to that of Mr. Burdett; for no small part of the labour involved in laying foundation stones, and opening public buildings and unveiling statues, must consist in the preparation and delivery of the suitable speech which such ceremony demands. It is well known that the Prince has inherited a very excellent gift of speech, which is not likely to grow rusty from want of use. And this printed collection of his various utterances clearly shows that he spares no trouble to master the subjects about which he has to speak. "After dinner oratory" is of a special character, and even eloquent men sometimes fail in it. These speeches of the Prince are useful in suggesting ways for dealing with trite subjects; and, though some of them seem to us scarcely worth preserving, a later generation may be glad to possess such specimens of an art which may then have become extinct.

The Pleasures of Life. Part II. By Sir John Lubbock. (Macmillan.) Sequels are seldom successes, and even Sir John Lubbock has doubts whether he is wise in publishing another volume dealing with the same subject. He need have no apprehensions. His first volume has, we learn, passed through thirteen editions in less than two years. It hit the public taste, and we see no reason why a second hit should not now be made. The subject is not exhausted. Sir John is still able to draw from his memory and his note-book things new and old; and, in an age of melancholy, the title he has chosen must always prove attractive. Among the pleasures of life Sir John paradoxically classes its troubles—not because, like St. James, he counts them happy which endure; but because to the philosophic mind there are very few such things as troubles, and out of them it can always extract sweet uses. But it is doubtful whether the "general reader" will be able to follow his teacher here, and may perhaps be misled by such a statement as that "we generally speak of selfishness as a fault, and as if it interfered with general happiness." The judgment is certainly true as regards that exclusive attention to one's own interests which is usually meant by selfishness. If otherwise, then altruism is not a virtue. What Sir John Lubbock means is that self-control, though primarily for the benefit of the individual, and so far, selfish in origin, is also of advantage to others. With that conclusion we do not quarrel. It would be curious to inquire how many of what Sir John calls the pleasures of life are universally accepted as such. About health, and rest, and love, there might be a general consensus. But ambition has probably made as many men miserable as happy; and as to art, poetry, and music, the beauties of nature, and even religion—they appeal after all to a minority of mankind, and it cannot be said that in all cases culture will create the want which they are able to gratify. Exception was taken to Sir John's earlier volume that it was too full of quotations and other men's opinions. The fault, if it be one, is conspicuous in the present case. But upon that subject where people are most reticent, Sir John speaks out:

"To do right is the sure ladder which leads up to heaven, though the true faith will help us to find and to climb it. . . . To arrive at truth we should spare ourselves no pain, but certainly inflict none on others. . . . As men have risen in civilisation, their religion has risen with them. . . . We are only just beginning to realise that a loving and merciful Father would not resent honest error . . . but it must not be supposed that those who doubt whether the ultimate truth of the universe can be expressed in human words, or whether, even if it could, we should be able to comprehend it, undervalue the importance of religious study. Quite the contrary. Their doubts arise not from pride, but from humility; not because they do not appreciate divine truth, but, on the contrary, they doubt whether we can appreciate it sufficiently, and are sceptical whether the infinite can be reduced to the finite."

Abdul Hamid II. By the Princess Annie de Lusignan. (Sampson Low.) Can any good thing come out of the harem? Our author answers this with an unflinching affirmation. The reigning Sultan of Turkey is in the eyes of one English lady at least a true hero. Certainly this account of Abdul Hamid's twelve years' reign will meet with no difficulties from the Turkish censor. From first to last it is inspired by the spirit of unflinching partisanship. But even in these pages we find naïve admissions that all is not well:

"As soon as the truth became known at Constantinople (and it is difficult to get the truth known there, for it is nearly always to someone's interest to suppress it)," &c. (p. 163).

Abdul Hamid is the one man who can save Bulgaria. The time has arrived (according to the author) for the restoration to the Sultan of direct and supreme authority over that province:

"In favour of such a decision can be urged the material progress made by the people who have remained under Abdul Hamid's rule as against the wretchedness, discontent, and disorder which have prevailed under the much belauded autonomy" (p. 269).

She cannot even allude to Bulgaria without stigmatising it as "that unhappy province, the hotbed of intrigue and discontent" (p. 200). This total blindness to the peaceful and progressive condition of Bulgaria makes one hesitate about accepting the author's other statements. Still, her chapter on reform is interesting, especially from the fact that it is written by a woman. So highly does she think of the status of women in Turkey that she confesses that she would have to hesitate twice or thrice before she could decide whether to give the preference to the life of a woman under the rule of Abdul Hamid or under that of Queen Victoria (p. 165). The author is very outspoken in her denunciations of Russian despotism, but her extravagant praises of Turkish misgovernment lead us to the conclusion that her liberalism is due rather to hatred of Turkey's enemy than to any love of freedom.

Wanderings of a War Artist. By Irving Montague. (W. H. Allen.) From the first page to the last this book is readable and entertaining. The author divides it into three parts—the Franco-Prussian, the Carlist, and the Servian Wars. There can be no question that the brightest and freshest part of the work is the first. Chapters iv. and v., which describe the brief triumph and crushing overthrow of the Commune of Paris, are especially interesting. His pages overflow with anecdotes, but we can only quote one here. An engaged couple, though in humble circumstances, had enough money to hire a couple of conveyances to drive off with their friends to the Mairie to be married. The place had, however, since they last saw it, been transformed into a Communist guard-house, so the dejected couple had to return single to their respective homes. The soldiery were, however, profuse in their offers to perform the all-important function themselves; but one old woman shouted after them as they left the place: "What a wonderful escape for both of you! You will now be spared the suicide you contemplated for a day or two at least" (p. 147). The following is a description of "glorious war" as it appeared on the field of Worth, after the battle had been lost and won:

"Half-hidden by underwood and forest-trees (for the neighbourhood afforded abundant cover), one here and there came across little groups who, at a first glance, might have seemed peaceably resting (as indeed they were) after a hard day at the front—some sitting binding a wound; others lying about in easy picturesque attitudes in the long grass; here one was to be seen half reclining against a tree, there another firmly gripping his chapeau, as if some unaccustomed sound disturbed him—yet all were dead, dead as the proverbial door-nail" (p. 69).

The author, always good-natured (even when writing of Prussians), expresses a very favourable opinion of the Serb soldier, whom he had many opportunities of observing:

"I have said the Serbs piled the mattock and the spade more ably than the musket and bayonet; but I would not have it supposed that they were as troops unworthy of the country they loved so well, and for which they fought at times with desperate energy" (p. 354).

The illustrations in the book are excellent.

NOTES AND NEWS.

ONE volume of the new edition of the Rig-Veda, with the commentary of Śāyana-kārya, is finished, and will be laid before the International Congress of Orientalists at Stockholm by Prof. Max Müller. The new edition is printed at the expense of His Highness Sir Pasupati Ananda Gajapati Raz of Vizianagram. Several new MSS. have been collated, and considerable emendations have been made in the text. Prof. Max Müller has secured the assistance of Dr. Winternitz; and it is hoped that the four volumes, each consisting of about 1000 pages quarto, will be ready in three years.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH & CO. will shortly publish the first number of a new serial devoted to the reproduction of selected works of the foremost photographers of the day. It is proposed to issue quarterly a portfolio of four photographic pictures from the negatives of "Sun Artists"—such as will tend to advance photography in the estimation of the art-loving public and obtain for it the position which it now claims. The first number of Sun Artists will consist of four studies by Mr. J. Gale, on imperial quarto paper, with letterpress.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish next week The Life of Father Damien, written by Mr. Edward Clifford, with a portrait.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD announce a volume of verse translations from the German, by Sir Theodore Martin, which will take its title from Schiller's "Song of the Bell."

MESSRS. TRÜBNER have in the press a new work by Dr. J. Anderson, the historian of Japanese art, treating of English intercourse with Siam in the seventeenth century.

New Studies in Old Subjects is the title of a new volume of essays by Mr. J. A. Sparvel Bayley, which purposes to re-examine some familiar scenes and topics in English history. The work will be shortly published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE delegates of the Clarendon Press have the following works ready for early publication: an edition, with notes for students, of Tertullian's Apology, by Mr. T. H. Bindley, of Merton College; Selections from Burns, by Mr. J. Logie Robertson (uniform with Selections from Clarendon, just published); Mr. Oliver Aplin's Birds of Oxfordshire. In mathematics they will issue shortly the second volume, treating of "Electro Dynamics," of Messrs. Watson and Burbury's Mathematical Theory of Electricity and Magnetism; and a new edition of the fourth volume on "The Dynamics of Material Systems" (which has long been out of print) of Prof. Bartholomew Price's Treatise on the Infinitesimal Calculus. A school edition of Scott's Marmion, by Mr. Thomas Bayne, is nearly ready.

MESSRS. LONGMANS announce two novels, each in a single volume: By the Western Sea: a Summer Idyll, by Mr. James Baker; and Judge Lynch: a Tale of the Californian Vineyards, by Mr. George H. Jessop, who has recently been contributing a series of Irish-American stories to the Century Magazine.

MR. R. E. M. PEACH, the author of several historical books about Bath, is now engaged upon a similar volume concerning the neighbouring village of Swainswick, which will be dedicated to Prof. Earle, the rector of the parish. The chief title of fame of Swainswick is that it was the birthplace of William Prynn, and was thus drawn into sharing with the city of Bath in the troubles of the seventeenth century. Mr. Peach proposes to give, from the parish register and other sources, full details regarding the local annals, and especially regarding the church. The work will be issued, to subscribers only, in a limited edition.

WE are informed that the Cobden Club has purchased for distribution a thousand copies of Miss Cooke's Life of Richard Cobden, recently published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

THE library formed by that famous collector, the late Frederick Perkins, of Chipstead, Kent, will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby on Wednesday next, July 10, and the six following days. As might be expected, the collection is specially rich in editions of Shakspeare. There are copies of all the four folios, as well as of about twenty of the quartos, not counting the spurious ones. Above all, there is the excessively rare first edition of Lucrece (1594). Mr. Perkins was also an enthusiastic collector of Shakspeare's contemporaries and followers—Chapman, Heywood, Massinger and Shirley being numerous represented, while there are examples of Beaumont and Fletcher, Day, Dekker, and Ford. Coming to later times, we find a long series of the plays of Aphra Behn, and of the various writings of Defoe. There are a few Oaxtons, and many Wynkyn de Worde, and other early issues of the English press. Among the MSS., we can only mention a fifteenth century copy of the "Canterbury Tales," and a set of twenty letters of Dr. Johnson addressed to Mr. Perkins, of the brewery at Southwark.

SIR JAMES ORICHTON-BROWNE has been elected treasurer of the Royal Institution in the room of the late Henry Pollock.

WE hear that the story entitled "Attibai Bevi," in the May number of the Cornhill, was written by Mr. James W. Furrell, for many years editor of the Calcutta Englishman.

THE Incorporated Society of Authors—who published a little while ago a book on Literature and the Pension List, by Mr. W. Morris Colles—have recently engaged in correspondence with the First Lord of the Treasury upon the regulations governing the grant of pensions on the Civil List. The occasion of the correspondence was the refusal by Mr. W. H. Smith to consider the claims of the widow of a novelist, on the ground that "there are regulations against the grant of pensions to the writers of novels (unless historical) or their widows." In a subsequent letter, Mr. W. H. Smith stated more definitely that "the object which the distributors of the Fund have kept steadily in view of recent years is to award pensions to those whose works are of a scientific and technical character. Works of this kind, while of infinite service to the public, are notoriously unprofitable; and workers in these paths of literature have strong claims on the Fund."

The correspondence closes with a copy of the following resolution, which has been passed by the council of the Society of Authors:

"That the permanent exclusion of any class of literary, scientific, or artistic production from the just claim on the royal beneficence contemplated by section 6 of 1 Vict., cap. 2, is not warranted by the Act; that the regulations, if any, under which the Civil List Pension Fund is administered should be communicated to the public; and that it is the duty of this society to call the attention of Parliament at the earliest opportunity to the exclusive rules which are now stated to exist."

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

WE hear that Oxford will be represented by two delegates at the Oriental Congress at Stockholm—Prof. Max Müller and Prof. Sayce. Prof. Macdonell also will be present.

AMONG those upon whom honorary degrees are to be conferred by Dublin University are the Bishops of Oxford and Salisbury and Prof. Valentine Ball.

THE University of Durham will henceforth confer degrees in music, after examination, upon students who have previously passed certain examinations in general education.

THE committee of the British School at Athens have offered a studentship of £50 for one year, open to all members of the University of Oxford.

THE University of Cambridge has renewed for a further period of five years its annual grant of £100 to the Teachers' Training Syndicate, for the purpose of providing lectures in the theory, history, or practice of teaching.

DURING the past year the following changes have taken place in the teaching staff of University College, London. Prof. Oliver has resigned the chair of botany, after a tenure of twenty-eight years, and his son, Dr. Oliver, has been appointed lecturer in botany. Prof. R. S. Poole has succeeded Sir Charles Newton in the Yates professorship of archaeology; Prof. W. P. Ker, from Cardiff, has succeeded Prof. Henry Morley in the chair of English. Prof. Goodwin, already professor of Greek, now teaches Latin also, which was formerly taught by Prof. A. J. Church; and Prof. Watson Smith has succeeded Prof. Graham in the chair of chemical technology. In addition, Prof. Kennedy has resigned the chair of engineering. Prof. Scrutton that of constitutional law, and Prof. A. H. Keane that of Hindustani, the last-mentioned being succeeded as lecturer by Mr. Blumhardt.

AN address to Prof. Henry Morley, from past and present students of University College, London, and residents at university and college halls, on the occasion of his retirement from the chair of English, was presented to him on July 1 by Mr. Justice Charles. Subscriptions towards the testimonial to be given to Prof. Morley in the autumn should be sent to Mr. G. A. Aitken, Secretary's Office, General Post Office.

AT a meeting of the trustees of Manchester New College, held last week at University Hall, Gordon Square, the decision to remove the college from London to Oxford was unanimously approved. For this purpose about £40,000 will be required, of which more than £28,000 has already been promised.

MISS CAROLINE A. FOLBY, of Wadhurst, has been elected to the scholarship in the philosophy of mind and logic, founded at University College London, in memory of John Stuart Mill.

THE Victoria University has issued a series of regulations concerning courses of Local Lectures—a name which commends itself to us as much more appropriate than that of University Extension. The total expense, to be borne by a local committee, of a course of eight lectures seems to range from £40 to £60, the university fee being uniformly 25 guineas.

MANY readers of the ACADEMY will be glad to hear that Prof. Albert S. Cook, of California, has been appointed to the chair of English at Yale College, vacant since the resignation of Prof. Northrop five years ago. Prof. Cook took his degree of Ph.D. at Jena in 1882.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

TO NINA (IN JUNE).

'Tis summer time, the year's at noon
In this bright leafy month of June,
But spring, I see, methinks its grace
I read in this fair maiden's face,
So pure, so fresh, with limpid eyes
As brown and clear as streams that rise
In northern glens; her locks have caught
The ruddy hue of pine-stems sought
By merry squirrels in their play.

O, what recalls sweet spring to-day
As this smooth brow with thoughts untold,
Which later days shall all unfold,
As these soft lips not yet compressed
With hidden griefs? Her heart, at rest,
Is like a quiet pool at dawn;
She is in her shy grace a fawn,
Unstartled yet by stranger's gaze
It greets the world with glad amaz.

We who have felt life's dust and heat
Are quick this breathing Spring to greet;
As travellers tread with joy the grass,
With eyes refreshed we onward pass.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

The first number of the Newbery House Magazine: a Monthly Review for Clergy and Laity, supplies a very abundant and varied table of contents. Ecclesiastical questions, treated from a moderately High Church point of view, predominate; but there is also the first instalment of a scholarly article on the Psalms, by the Rev. J. M. Rodwell. Fiction is represented by the beginning of a novel, entitled "The Bishops' Bible," which bears the joint names of D. Christie Murray and H. Herman; as well as by two or three short stories. The general appearance of the magazine—good paper, clear type, and occasional illustrations—help to give it a character of its own.

THE Expositor for July contains an article of unexceptionable tone by Prof. Milligan on the burning theological question of "The Ministerial Priesthood." Mr. Plummer contributes some excellent illustrations from our English chronicles of the documentary theory of the origin of the Synoptic Gospels, in reply to a somewhat peremptory judgment of M. Godet. Dr. Bruce continues his interpretation of that great "apologetic work," the Epistle to the Hebrews. Mr. Rendall examines that part of Galatians which deals with St. Paul's relations to the Judaizers. Prof. H. Drummond introduces his friend Dr. (now Prof.) Marcus Dods to those who have hitherto only known his subject as an able writer, but who will now learn that he is also a man and a leader. Prof. Delitzsch gives a brief notice of Mr. George Adam Smith's delightful exposition of Isaiah (more interesting perhaps for the glimpse which it gives of Delitzsch himself, than as a criticism). And lastly, the editor devotes a short but generously appreciative obituary to one of his own contributors, well known also to readers of the ACADEMY—the late W. H. Simcox.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for July opens with a comparison of the late Prof. Rauwenhoff's philosophy of religion with the critical philosophy of Kant. Dr. Meyboom studies the Paulinism of Luke; Dr. Kovers, a new hypothesis on the Apocalypse, similar to, but entirely independent of, that of Vischer. The latter may deserve the attention of English critics. It is set forth in a Dutch dissertation by G. H. Weyland. Two reviews of books are followed by an obituary of P. R. Hugenholtz—a gifted "modern" theologian, and one of the editors of the Tijdschrift.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CAPTAIN GEORGE CARLETON.

Oxford: July 1, 1889.

The following documents relating to Capt. Carleton, the alleged author of the famous Memoirs which have lately given rise to so keen a controversy, have never yet, so far as I am aware, been published. That the Memoirs could not be accepted as genuine materials for history I was fully persuaded, before the appearance of Col. Parnell's exposure of their wholly untrustworthy character. The letters which I have transcribed from the Tanner Collection in the Bodleian Library confirm some statements in the Memoirs, while throwing doubt on others, and seem to show that some of the facts were, in all probability, derived by the compiler from Carleton himself. I hope to deal with the subject in some detail hereafter.

The memorandum enclosed in the second letter is not in Dr. Covell's handwriting, and internal evidence seems to indicate that it is not in Carleton's. From 1681-1685, Covell was chaplain to the Princess of Orange (see Dictionary of National Biography, vol. xii., pp. 355 sq.).

C. E. DOBLE.

DR. J. COVEL TO [ARCHBISHOP SANCRIFT].

[Tanner MSS. 32. 55.]

Honoraerdike: May 27 (June 6), 1681.

My L^d—May it please your Grace.

I received your letter concerning Mr. Carleton wth exceeding great joy, being ever ambitious of serving your Grace in all things wthin the compass of my small power; and I should be extremely happy and glad if I could effect anything that might merit your approbation or acceptance. Before the Prince left us to goe for Brabant (which was yesterday morning, I had a fair opportunity to recommend Mr. Carleton to him and Mr. Bontinck, as likewise I had done it first to the Princess; and they all expressed a great readiness to shew him favour as any occasion shall offer. I have not yet seen Mr. Carleton here, but so soon as he make his application to this Court, I shall again renew my suit and be his faithful solicitor, and I shall presume to acquaint you wth what success we meet wthall when we come to the point.

Most humbly begging your blessing, I kisse your hands. My Lord, Your Grace his Most obedient Son and most faithfull servant
JOH. COVELL.

DR. J. COVEL TO DR. H. PAMAN.

Honslaerdike, May 19 (39), 1685.

Sr—I have often had promises from his Highness the Prince of Or. of kindness for Mr. Carleton whensoever there should a Captaines place fall, and he is still very ready and willing to do it, but the death of his late Majesty hath a little altered the measures of those affaires, for his Highness now prefers none in any of his English Brigades but such as are named or recommended or at least approved of by his present Majesty. there is a place or two now voyd, and upon Mr. Carleton's addresse to his Highness upon his promise formerly made, the Prince told him he would serve him in it wth all his heart, had he but any approbation of it from the King. Now, Sr, if you could prevail wth his Grace my Lord of Canterbury to speak to his Majesty one word in Mr. Carleton his behalf, that his approbation might be signified to Mr. Skelton his Envoy here, the business would be done wthout any more to doe. If you shall be pleased to favour Mr. Carleton so farre, it will be a great and seasonable office of kindness to him. I beseech you lay my humble Duty at his Grace his feet, and wth my hearty respects to your self and worthy Dr. Bates, Dr. Morice, and the rest of my good friends, I heartily bid Adieu.

Your most humble Servant
JOH: COVEL.

For Dr. Paman at his Grace, my Lord of Canterbury's house at Lambhith.

VIRGIL IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

Marburg: June 17, 1889.

From Count Balzani's review of Mr. Tunison's book on Virgil in the Middle Ages (ACADEMY, June 8) I learn that the author "separates himself from Comparetti in one very important particular—namely, as to the origin of the legend," which, according to Prof. Comparetti, takes its rise from local, and especially Neapolitan, tradition, whereas, according to Mr. Tunison, it "springs essentially from the North."

I do not know if Mr. Tunison has attempted to refute in detail the leading idea of Prof. Comparetti's book—that there are two forms of Virgilian tradition, totally distinct as to nature, time, and origin—the one literary, the other popular and local. He has certainly not convinced Count Balzani, who sums up by saying that "at all events, the Virgilian legend existed prior to its literary form."

In a paper entitled "Der Ursprung der Virgilsage," published a good many years ago in Gröber's Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie, J. (Halle, 1877), I tried to show that the so-called popular tradition is not only distinctly connected with the older literary tradition (such as the interpolations of the Life by Donatus), but that the pretended evidence for its existence among the Neapolitan people does not stand the test. As the question still seems an open one, the readers of the ACADEMY will pardon me for very succinctly repeating my arguments.

Prof. Comparetti's internal evidence may be reduced to the following points: (1) Coarser conception of Virgil in the so-called popular tradition.—True, but proves nothing. (2) In popular tradition Virgil loses his quality as a poet, but not in literary tradition.—Cf. the "literary" interpolations of the Life on one hand, and the "popular" account of the Cronica di Partenope on the other hand. (3) The "literary" legends are supported by historical and psychological phenomena, which would not suffice to account for the "popular" legends.—Prof. Comparetti himself proves the contrary: (a) Virgil had long been considered among the learned as supernaturally gifted in every science (v. Comparetti, i., p. 85); (b) The most astounding misunderstandings and perversions were current in scholastic literature, Smaragdus, e.g., taking Eunuchus comœdia and Orestis tragedia for the names of authors, Remigius of Auxerre translating emblemata by habundantia, others explaining provincia by celeramente, or reading Quot Emori pedes for Quo te Moeripedes and thinking Emoris to be the name of a swift Saracen horse, &c. (v. Comparetti, i., p. 169 ff.); (c) Just from the twelfth century onward learned literature is strongly influenced by romantic poetry (v. Comparetti, i., p. 248; ii., p. 4, &c.); (d) At least one learned author accounts for the magic art of Virgil in a purely literary way ("Et fuit magnus magicus ut patet ex illa ecloga," &c., v. Comparetti, i., p. 195 f.), to say nothing of the Dolopathos (v. Comparetti, ii., p. 14). Cf., "Che l'antico savio si cambi in mago è fatto di cui rari sono gli esempi" (Comparetti, ii., p. 15).

Turning to Prof. Comparetti's external evidence, we find that it chiefly rests on two supposed eye-witnesses—Conrad of Querfurt (1194) and Gervase of Tilbury (1212), neither of whom is worthy of belief. It will be sufficient to refer to Prof. Comparetti himself, who explains "certi grossi savorioni del bravo cancelliere messi giù con una serietà da far disperare" by saying that he sometimes imagined to see "altro e più di quello che realmente vedesse," while we are told that the work of Gervase, the Otia Imperialia, contains "notizie d'ogni sorta e assurdità d'ogni calibro." And they do not even pretend to have collected "idee allora proprie del popolo napoletano." On the contrary, Conrad boasts that it has fallen to his lot "ut ea quae olim apud vos in scholis positi in aenigmatibus quasi in speculo aure tenus percipimus, facie ad faciem oculata nunc fide cognoverimus." As to Alexander Neckam (about 1185) and Helinand (before 1204), Prof. Comparetti himself thinks that they can only be indirectly connected with the town of Naples.

I proceed to give a rapid survey of the single legends, as related by Neckam, Conrad, Helinand, and Gervase: (1) Macellum. Neckam speaks of "Virgili prudentia carnem nescio qua vi herbarum conditam in macello recludentis," &c. Conrad and Helinand say that the macellum was built by Virgil. Gervase agrees, on the whole, with Neckam. According to Conrad and Gervase, the building is still there. (2) Hortus. N.'s air-wall and air-bridge are given up by C. and G. According to G., the garden contains medicinal herbs. H. says that it never rains in the garden. (3) Serpentes. N. tells us that "the Mantuan poet" kept the vermin confined in the canals by means of a golden leech. C. says, "Caeterum ad mentem reducimur quod apud Neapolin est quaedam porta ferrea . . . in qua V. omnes serpentes illius regionis inclusit." According to G., he kept them "sub huius viae sigillo." (4) Equus. This story, which only C. relates, is clearly connected with a passage in the Life, where V. is said to have cured "multos variosque morbos incidentes equis" by means of medicine and mathematics. (5) Baiae. Mentioned by C., H., and G. The baths of Baiae had been described repeatedly in learned literature. (6) Musca. Similarly related by C., H., and G., who says: "Porro in Campania [he has just spoken of a refectory somewhere 'in regno Arelatensi'], civitate Neapolitana, scimus Virgilium arte mathematica muscam erexisse aeneam," &c. Probably founded on a "literary" anecdote told by John of Salisbury. (7) Statua. The statue holds a balista tensa, according to C., but a tuba, according to G. (8) Ampulla. Even if a similar tradition existed in Naples, it may have been fixed upon Virgil by C. himself, who is evidently proud of having taken the town in spite of a Virgilian charm ("porta firmissima . . . valvas habens aeneas, quas nunc tenent satellites imperiales"). (9) Capita. Possibly founded on fact; but the archdeacon who ascribes the stone faces to Virgil had been Gervase's pupil at Bologna. The popular tradition was different (v. Comparetti, ii., p. 35). (10) Ossa and (11) Sepulcrum. G. says expressly that the people knew nothing about the tomb of Virgil. Also from John of Salisbury we can only gather that the legend was known out of Naples. (12) Rupes. G. relates—"De rupe incisa quae nullas admittit insidias"—that "arte mathematica haec operatus est V."

I see no reason why we should not consider all these legends to have emanated, as some of them evidently did, from the scholastic conception of Virgil's supernatural wisdom, especially in mathematics and medicine. In some cases it even seems possible to point out the literary germ from which the legend has grown. No. 12 reminds one of the well-known distich on the death of the highwayman Balista:

"Monte sub hoc lapidum tegitur Balista sepultus, Nocte die tutum carpe, viator, iter."

With this same distich I should like to connect No. 7, in both cases the stress being laid on mons, balista, tutum. No. 6 I refer to another passage in the Life: "fecit . . . et culicem" (i.e., the poem "Culex"). Likewise, I see the "locus classicus" for No. 3 in the words, not indeed referring to Virgil, "serpentem interemit" (ib). No. 1 may be due to a confusion between macellum and the name of Marcellus, who enjoyed Virgil's teaching. A turn such as "marcellum instruxit" would explain our legend at once.

WILHELM VIETOR.

THE OLD NORTHUMBRIAN GLOSSES IN MS. PALATINE 68.

Berkeley, California: June 12, 1889.

Possibly some light may be thrown upon the age of Palatine MS. 68, mentioned by Dr. Whitley Stokes in the ACADEMY of May 25, by an examination of certain phonetic or graphical peculiarities of the Northumbrian words quoted. For example, the proper names Edilberict and Bericfridi have, as will be observed, the later berht in the form berict. This is by no means common in Northumbrian; and in fact there is no other instance of it, so far as I am aware, except in the Namur MS. of Bede's History, an account of which is given by Sweet on p. 231 of his Oldest English Texts. Sweet quotes Mone as saying:

"The handwriting of both works belongs to the eighth century, but is of different nationality, for the Bede is written by an Anglo-Saxon, the Gregory by a Frank."

Sweet immediately adds:

"My attention was naturally attracted to the MS. by this statement; but when I inspected it myself, I found that it was written in a purely continental hand, without a trace of Old English influence. . . . But the MS. has an independent value, as being a copy of an English MS. of about the same age as M."

M. being the famous Moore MS. at Cambridge, circa A.D. 737. Unless the proper names referred to are merely transcribed literally from an older MS., it would appear, then, as though here might be a partial confirmation of Stevenson's opinion that Palatine 68 is written in a hand of the eighth century.

ALBERT S. COOK.

EMERSON AND GOETHE.

Combe Vicarage, near Woodstock: June 22, 1889.

In the ACADEMY of June 22, Mr. Walter Lewin ("Emerson at Home in Concord") writes thus:

"Persons who possessed talents which he lacked always commanded Emerson's admiration. He magnified the talent of the merchant, of the farmer, and of the man who was handy with tools. One of several causes of his esteem for Thoreau was doubtless Thoreau's ingenuity and mechanical skill."

Reading those words, I am reminded of these in Goethe's Leiden des jungen Werthers (Zweites Buch [second paragraph therein]):

"Gewiss, weil wir doch einmal so gemacht sind dass wir alles mit uns und uns mit allem vergleichen, so liegt Glück oder Elend in den Gegenständen, womit wir uns zusammenhalten, und da ist nichts gefährlicher als die Einsamkeit. Unsere Einbildungskraft, durch ihre Natur gedrungen sich zu erheben, durch die phantastischen Bilder der Dichtkunst genährt, bildet sich eine Reihe Wesen hinauf, wo wir das unterste sind, und alles ausser uns herrlicher erscheint, jeder andere vollkommener ist. Und das geht ganz natürlich zu. Wir fühlen so oft dass uns manches mangelt, und eben was uns fehlt scheint uns oft ein anderer zu besitzen, dem wir denn auch alles dazu geben was wir haben."

THE TEUTONIC KINSHIP OF THE SKYTHIANS.

Die Skythen-Saken: die Urväter der Germanen. Von Johannes Fressl. (München: Lindauer.)

This is a book which, in due time, will make its mark, and place its author in the front rank of scholars. With a solidity of learning, a closeness and force of reasoning, which it would be difficult to match, Mr. Fressl has, in our judgment, made out his case for the Teutonic kinship of the Skythians—that mainly white-skinned, fair-haired, blue-eyed, tall race which once extended from the eastern parts of Europe into farther Asia, surrounding, as it were, together with its Thracian kinsmen, the Hellenic world in a vast outer arc, and thus warding off Mongol inroad.

The very name of the Skyths—long ago explained as "Shooters," from their proficiency with the bow and arrow—attests their Germanic affinity. Skytt, in Swedish; Skytte, in Danish; Schütze, in German, means an archer. Etymological doubts as to the connexion of these words is effectively removed by Mr. Fressl. In support of his chief thesis, Greek and Roman literature has been ransacked most carefully, and linguistic comparisons of his own are added from Asiatic languages and historical records. To the task of explaining the remnants of the Skythian language from Germanic roots he has devoted himself with much ingenuity. Striking parallels are drawn between the manners and customs, the dress, the forms of worship and the magical ceremonies of the Skyths on the one hand, and of the Thracians and Goths on the other. Even though some of the author's conclusions in matters of language and mythology may be open to question, his reasoning in general seems to me irrefutable. The enthusiasm with which a man who feels himself on the right track often endeavours to explain from his own standpoint even that which is no longer explainable with any degree of certainty must not be held to detract from the strength of his main position.

Since the days of Hugo Grotius a large number of learned men—among them Schilter, Wachter, Adelung, Ritter, Niebuhr, Klaproth, Böckh, Alexander von Humboldt, Diefenbach, Jakob Grimm, Schafarik, Kiepert, Müllenhoff, Penka, Cuno—have occupied themselves with the difficult problem of assigning to the Skyths their proper ethnical place. The views expressed have been widely divergent. Some have held the Skyths to be clearly of Aryan, others of Mongol, origin. Those who believed in their Aryan consanguinity attributed this variously to the Lithuanians, to the Slavs, or, more or less, to the Germanic stock, though possibly alloyed with so-called "Turanian" elements. Humboldt, Zeuss, Diefenbach, Grimm, declared strongly for the Aryan descent of the Skyths. So have, in more recent days, Müllenhoff and Cuno. Nearly a hundred years ago Pinkerton ("On the Origin and Progress of the Scythians or Goths") maintained their Teutonic kinship. That which Pinkerton said accords with passages in the work of the Goth Jornandes. Now and then—as, for instance, in an article on "The Origin of the German Race," by Dr. Adolf Douai, in 1866—the identity of the Skyths with the early Germans has been asserted, at a time when these latter had come into Europe after the "Helleno-Italians"; that is, as Douai wrote on the strength of the researches of others, between 1500 and 500 before our era. Without wishing to uphold these chronological speculations, which are beyond the possibility of proof, I think it right to mention these previous attempts to place the Skyths among the Teutons. Skythian names, like Spargapith, Gnur, Idanthyr, and others, I pointed out years ago as indicating that in the vast Skythian race there was a predominance, at all events, of the Germanic element.

It is the merit of Mr. Fressl to have furnished evidence of such a kind that those who can still refuse to yield assent must be indeed hard to convince. Skyths and Thracians he shows to be the primitive Eastern Teutons, closely related to the Goths. The plain truth in these matters, as it results from the putting together of numerous scattered passages in classical literature, has often been obscured by the disinclination felt to see such "barbarous" nations attached to one which has become a banner-bearer of intellectual culture in Europe. Are not polygamy, widow-burning, and other degraded customs, quite at variance with the picture unrolled in the Germania of Tacitus? How, then, could Thracians or Skyths be of the Teutonic family? Yet the remembrance of the statement of Tacitus himself as to the polygamic habit of German princes, and a reference to the description of widow-burning in the Edda, or in the Arab accounts of Norse fire-burials in Russia, might have disposed of an argument which is doubly untenable, because it would exclude various other nations from the pale of civilisation.

Classical testimony, moreover, speaks of both Thracians and Skythians as having produced many men proficient, not only in war, but also in learning, and in the fine arts. Philosophers, artists, writers who pass for being Greek, were either of direct Thracian descent, and only Hellenised—even as many a German is in our days Anglicised or Frenchified; or they possessed at least a notable strain of Thracian blood. To quote but one instance of the latter kind, Thukydides descended, on the mother's side, through Kimon, the son of the conqueror of Marathon, from Oloros (Olor; in Norse, Olafr), king of Thrace. When we hear that almost all Greece was once filled, in prehistoric times, with tribes from the vast Thracian stock, it may well be contended that that race occupied an important position. As to the Skyths, do we not know of their Abaris, their Anacharsis, and Zathraustes? Have not Greek and Roman writers given remarkable instances of Skythian wisdom, justice, readiness of repartee, not to speak of their high strategic talents? Even in the spirit of freedom Skythians read a well-known lesson to Ionian Greeks on the occasion of the Persian invasion.

Of the high position assigned to womankind among the Skyths in general—irrespective of the lower customs of some tribes—there is a great deal to be found in classic writers. That "barbarous" race is known to have held women in veneration, almost more so than the Germans of Tacitus. Here a curious detail of the discoveries recently made in the tomb of a Skythian king, in the Great Kurgan, or barrow, near the Kuban, in South-eastern Russia, may be noted. Among the valuable objects found, there was a large copper tray, on which lay cross-wise two silver drinking horns, such as were used also by the Thracian chief Seuth at the banquet given by him to Xenophon, when the truly Germanic custom of the "nail-proof" was observed. Again, on a thin triangular plate, which lay in the Great Kurgan beside a young woman's skull, is seen the figure of a young man who is offering such a drinking horn to a sitting female. Now, generally speaking, when dealing with the early days of other nations, we might expect the position of these figures to be reversed—that is, to see the woman offering the drinking vessel to the man. Among the Skyths evidently there was a different custom. This recent discovery also strengthens one of the arguments of Mr. Fressl, who pertinently asks whether a high veneration of women is characteristic of Mongols? Among the remarkable parallels between Germanic and Skythian customs may be pointed out the wrestling-match that a young Sakian—that is, a Skyth of Persia—had to undergo with the woman he wooed. It reminds us of Gunther and Brünnhild in the Nibelungen Lied.

Whilst the western branch of the Skyths was nomadic, its eastern section had many settlements. Sakian towns and villages existed of old. Sakian armour resembling that of mediaeval knights shows to what degree of culture that Skythian branch had attained. We hear of a pyramidal structure, and of a golden statue in honour of a queen, among the Saks. Alexander the Great held this branch of the Skyths in high esteem. All this goes far to show that a very widely distributed race of considerable gifts need not be put aside as unworthy of Teutonic kinship.

Mr. Fressl has collected valuable material as to the vestiges which this once powerful nation has left throughout Asia. The hazy notion which no doubt many still entertain with regard to the Skyths is changed by him into a historic picture of great clearness and extent. What he says about the connexion between Marakanda and Samarkand is worthy of close attention. So is also his proposal to explain the name of the Skolotian Skyths from their habit, recorded in Herodotus, iv. 10, of wearing a cup on their belts, in remembrance of their traditional forefather. The cup is called Skal in Danish, skal in Swedish, Schale, Schöl'n, in High German and dialectal German; hence the "Skolotian" Skyths, quite in accordance with their tribal saga. I may mention here that, in some South-Russian kurgans, representations have been found of men holding up a cup near the girdle. Each image does so in reverential manner, as it were. The fact puzzled archaeologists at the time, albeit it has always seemed to me easily explainable from the statement of the old Greek historian. Mr. Fressl does not refer to these curious Skythian sculptures; but his interpretation of the word "Skolot" gains an additional meaning from their discovery. No wonder that Prof. Virchow has recently expressed himself to the effect that "the belief in the Germanic kinship of the Skyths has of late largely grown."

SCIENCE NOTES.

IN Nature for June 27 is given a portrait of the great Russian chemist, Prof. Mendeleef, with an elaborate memoir by Prof. T. E. Thorpe, forming one of the series of "Scientific Worthies." The portrait is engraved on steel by Mr. Stodart, from a photograph; and is a fine piece of work in every respect except in the method adopted for representing the hair. It will be specially valued by those who were unable to see the professor during his too brief visit to England last month.

WE quote from Triibner's Record the following letter from Mr. H. H. Risley, of the Bengal Civil Service, dated March 27:

"I am working up the materials under the title 'The Tribes and Castles of Bengal'; and four volumes, making about 1800 pages, are now standing in type. Volumes i and ii, bearing the sub-title 'Anthropometric Data,' consist of measurements and the conclusions provisionally drawn from them. Volumes iii. and iv., sub-title 'Ethnographic Data,' comprise descriptions, arranged in the form of a dictionary, of every caste, sub-caste, sept, section, &c., that I can hear of in Bengal, i.e., in the administrative area under the lieutenant-governor of Bengal. This reading of 'Bengal' enables me to deal with the Nepalese and Tibetan races; but the attempt to make the work complete for administrative purposes has added greatly to its bulk."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE scheme—which has long been talked about—of founding a school of Oriental languages in London, similar to those in Paris and Berlin, has at last taken definite shape in the formation of a joint committee of members of the Imperial Institute and University and King's Colleges. This joint committee has prepared a prospectus for

"the organisation of a school in London, designed both for giving instruction in modern Oriental languages, and also for the pursuit of studies relating to the history, literature, commercial and physical geography, political economy, and the natural and industrial resources of the countries and districts in which the various languages are used."

What is proposed is that the entire field shall be subdivided, so that the Indian languages, together with Arabic and Persian, should be taught at University College; while King's College shall be responsible for Chinese, Burmese, Japanese, Turkish, Malay, Swahili, besides Russian and modern Greek. The success of the scheme must largely depend upon the amount of endowment to be obtained from some quarter. In Paris, each professor of the Ecole des Langues Orientales Vivantes receives about £300 from the State, and the lectures are free. The newly founded Oriental School at Berlin receives a total grant of about £3600 a year; and there, too, tuition is gratuitous.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

HELLENIC SOCIETY.—(Annual Meeting, Monday, June 24)

PROF. JEBB in the chair.—Among those present were Mr. Watkiss Lloyd, Dr. Hubert Holden, Mr. J. B. Martin, Mr. Walter Leaf, Prof. Ridgeway, Mr. Talfourd Ely, Mr. J. T. Bent, Prof. Butcher, Prof. Baldwin Brown, Mr. George A. Macmillan (the hon. secretary), &c. Mr. Macmillan read the tenth annual report, which presented an estimate of the work accomplished.—The Chairman, in giving a survey of Hellenic studies during the past year, said the first place must be given to the researches which had been prosecuted in Greece itself, partly by the Greek government, partly by the Greek Archaeological Society, which was a private body, and by the foreign schools. In Greece the centre of interest had once more been the Acropolis of Athens. The excavations on the Acropolis, which began from the Propylaea, and were continued eastward to the north of the Parthenon, had now been brought back along the south side of the Parthenon, again reaching the Propylaea. The entire area of the Acropolis had thus been thoroughly explored down to the bed of rock. The gains of the last twelve months from this work on the Acropolis fell under three principal heads: (1) topography and architecture; (2) sculpture; (3) inscriptions. Under the first head, notice was due to the further light which had been thrown on the prehistoric fortifications of the Acropolis. New fragments of the primitive Acropolis wall which encircled the summit of the primitive citadel had been laid bare; and in one place, at the south-east corner of the Propylaea, it was seen to have been nearly twenty feet thick. Between the Parthenon and the south edge of the Acropolis traces had been found of a rude oblong building, constructed partly with the drums of columns, rejected, apparently, by the builders of that earlier temple, never completed, which was superseded by the Parthenon. This oblong building seemed to have been covered over with earth when the Parthenon was finished, and might, it was suggested, have been a workshop used by the builders. West of the Parthenon another building had been traced by its foundations. This was a large chamber of about 130 ft. by 50 ft., with a portico facing north. It was conjectured that this was the χαλκοθήκη used as a repository for arms and stores. This discovery appeared to show that the site of this building did not belong, as had been supposed, to the temenos of Athena Ergane. In the same part of the Acropolis area, west of the Parthenon, the temenos of Artemis Brauronia had now been more accurately defined by the traces of the porticoes which bounded it on the south and east. Within the Parthenon itself excavations had been carried on with a view to ascertaining whether the basis of the temple was a solid mass of stone or consisted (as in many other temples) merely of foundation walls with rubble filling the spaces between them. The results were not decisive, but they showed that the solid stone basis went at least some way beneath the pavement. Passing to sculpture, the learned professor referred to the fragments from architectural groups which once adorned the pediments of older temples on the Acropolis—temples probably destroyed by the Persians in 480 B.C., and found buried between the basis of the Parthenon and the limestone wall to the south of it. The year had not been barren, either, in relation to sculpture of the best time. Among the inscriptions found on the Acropolis in the course of the year, one of the most interesting was a copy of a decree conferring certain privileges on the Samians in recognition of their fidelity to Athens amid her disasters at the end of the Peloponnesian War. Another interesting inscription related to the purchase of materials for the great chryselephantine statue of Athena Parthenos. Having briefly noticed the work of other societies, he went on to say that the British School had not been engaged in excavation except at Cyprus, where some of the tombstones had yielded good results.—Mr. A. E. Gardner, the director of the British School at Athens, then gave an interesting account of archaeological work in Greece during the past season.—The report was approved, and officers having been elected, votes of thanks to the auditors and the chairman were passed.

FINE ART.

ART BOOKS.

The Homes and Haunts of Alfred, Lord Tennyson. (Glasgow: Maclehose.) To many persons the great charm of this book will lie in its rarity, only a hundred copies have been printed. It is a fair octavo, beautifully printed with wide margins, and fourteen illustrations of houses connected with the Laureate—Somersby, his birthplace, Farringford, Aldworth, and the like, together with an engraving of Arthur Hallam's bust, Clevedon Church, and Cambridge. These are produced by a photogravure process, and are satisfactory and as picturesque as the houses themselves can be made. The whole book is a dainty production, the memorial of a tour made last year through the Tennysonian localities by a devoted northern admirer of the poet. Naturally there is nothing new in such a book, but it is pleasantly written. A few characteristic Lincolnshire landscapes might have been added with advantage to show the local conditions under which the Laureate's fine characteristics were reared. The view of his study does not show much individuality, and yet it will interest the bulk of those fortunate enough to possess this book.

The Cistercian Abbey of Strata Florida: its History and an Account of the Recent Excavations made on its Site. By Stephen W. Williams. (Whiting.) The abbey which bore the singular name of Strata Florida—the Latinised form of Ystrad Flur—is said to have been founded by Rhys ap Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, in the latter part of the eleventh century; but it is to his grandson, Rhys ap Gruffyd, and to the following century that the scanty existing remains must be referred. They lie so far from the tourist's beaten track that they still escape much observation, in spite of their accessibility from Aberystwith. The annals of the abbey are not specially interesting to any but Welshmen or archaeological students; but this does not detract from the credit due to Mr. Williams for the industry he has exhibited in tracing them through all their obscurity. To him also we are further indebted for having, with true antiquarian zeal, exhumed the hidden foundations and buried walls of the conventual buildings. He has thus been able to bring to light not merely the ground-plan of the abbey, but also many fragments of arches and pillars, mouldings, bosses, brackets, and pavement-tiles, which are interesting in connexion with its history, and form conspicuous features as illustrations of the handsome volume before us.

Biographical Catalogue of the Portraits at Weston, the Seat of the Earl of Bradford. By Mary Boyle. (Elliot Stock.) This is an attractive-looking volume, and contains a good deal of interesting matter; but we cannot help thinking that very much of the labour expended upon it has been to little purpose. The number of persons who would resort to its pages to find, for instance, a life of Hugo Grotius or Dr. William Harvey must be infinitesimally small; and biographies which cite no authorities, and contain no exact references, are not likely to acquire any permanent value in these days. It is evident that the collection of pictures at Weston is a valuable one, and that it is rich in "National Portraits"; but the catalogue does not deal with them as works of art, nor give us much assistance in realising their features. For example, the portrait of William Lord Russell is described in these terms—"In armour. Long flowing hair. By Russell." The painter, we presume, was either Theodore or Antony Russell—probably the former; but we are left in ignorance whether it is whole-length or of smaller size. The utility of the book would be largely increased if notes upon the pictures, and, at any rate, measurements were given.

Hand and Eye Training. Books I. and II. By George Ricks. (Cassell.) "Manual Training" is becoming now so much in favour in public elementary schools that Mr. Ricks's volumes will supply a need much felt by numbers of teachers. Quite distinct from technical instruction, and not intended as a substitute for intellectual exertion, it introduces into the curriculum of general education exercises for the training of the hand and eye which have till recently received no training at all. It is claimed, nevertheless, for the system that it has not only its practical but its intellectual and moral advantage, cultivating the intelligence to apprehend the difference in substances and ideas of construction, and encouraging diligence, order, neatness, caution, and a number of other virtues. One advantage of it is that it can be taught in some measure before children can learn much else. The kindergarten system has paved, as it were, the way for more advanced and systematic teaching of the same kind; and these books of Mr. Ricks may be said to be a continuation of Froebel's road to Slojd and other manual training. The first book deals with occupations suitable for both girls and boys, which can be carried on in the ordinary school-room; the second with occupations designed especially for boys, which, for the elder boys at least, necessitate the use of a separate work-room. The first embraces drawing (mechanical), cutting, mounting, colouring, designing (geometrical patterns), and modelling simple forms in cardboard and clay; the second deals principally with woodwork of an elementary kind. Mr. Ricks has taken great pains to explain the different exercises recommended, which appear to have been judiciously chosen from various systems in operation in Norway, Sweden, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, and the United States. He also gives a good deal of information about woods, colours, &c., which will be found very useful to the teacher; and there are plenty of illustrations well adapted to their purpose.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

FIRST-CLASS medals at the Paris Exhibition, in the section of the fine art department for painting, have been awarded by the jury to Sir Frederick Leighton, and to Messrs. Burne Jones, Herkomer, Hook, Orchardson, Whistler, Forbes, Leader, Reid, and Shannon; and in the section for engraving to Mr. Seymour Haden. The higher award of "medals of honour" has been given to only two English artists—Messrs. Alma Tadema and Henry Moore.

UNDER the title of Old Cottage and Domestic Architecture in South-West Surrey, Mr. Ralph Nevill proposes to republish (with additions) a large series of lithographed drawings, illustrating the homes of the people in the neighbourhood of Guildford and Godalming, which appeared last year in the Builder. The letter-press will contain a general history of the styles of domestic architecture, with special sections on details—such as timber-framing, chimneys, windows, ironwork, &c. A chapter is added on the Roman and other early occupations of this part of Surrey. There will also be reproductions of several maps—from Ogilby's Book of the Roads (1675), of Bowen's (1749), and of the latest Ordnance Survey. The work will be issued privately, in a limited edition of 500 copies; and subscribers should address to the author, Rolls Chambers, Chancery Lane.

MR. THOMAS COLLIER has finished an important oil picture, which is obviously different in subject from his usual work. It is true that a sky of broken or of breaking weather floats over the landscape; but the landscape itself, instead of being that of the sandy heath or slaty moorland, with which people too persistently associate Mr. Collier's art—instead of being even, as his landscape sometimes is, the landscape of the shore—is this time a scene in the lowlands of Berkshire. "The Kennet Navigation"—a very old canal, which connects the waters of the East with those of the West country—runs here through marshy meadows, rich with the broad leaves of the colesfoot, and under an ancient bridge, and near a mill, and an old-fashioned hostelry. With all his wonted economy of means—with the learning which permits him to suggest infinity by breadth and not by detail—Mr. Collier has transported us to this characteristic bit of Berkshire lowland scenery. It is to be feared that this remarkable picture will not be exhibited in any miscellaneous show. Has not the time come to urge on Mr. Thomas Collier the project of a public gathering together of the better part of his work? When so many little nobodies—the mere "waterlilies" of art—hold their separate exhibitions, and advertise themselves thereby, it seems to us a pity that a master of landscape should allow himself to remain comparatively unappreciated by what is called "the general public."

ON Tuesday, July 9, Messrs. Sotheby will sell a collection of drawings, books, and MSS. of an extremely interesting character. First come the forty drawings, mostly in neutral tint, made by "Phiz" (Hablot K. Browne) for Martin Chuzzlewit, generally considered the most successful of his illustrations to Dickens. Then follow other drawings by "Phiz" to illustrate Dickens, Harrison Ainsworth, Charles Lever, Frank Smedley, &c.; and a set of proof impressions of the etchings for Pickwick. The books include Charles Lamb's Beauty and the Beast, the Pisa Adonais, Thackeray's Second Funeral of Napoleon and the Chronicle of the Drum; while the MSS. are chiefly of contributions to Punch by Thackeray, Dickens (his only one), Tom Hood ("The Song of the Shirt"), and Douglas Jerrold.

M. E. NAVILLE was to read a paper on Friday, July 5, at 8 p.m., before the Victoria Institute, on "The Historical Results of his Excavations in Egypt, at Bubastis and elsewhere."

THE exhibition of portrait-miniatures at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, which was noticed in the ACADEMY of April 20, will remain open until Saturday, July 20.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions M. Piette exhibited a number of objects of prehistoric art, consisting of fragments of sculptured reindeer horn and painted pebbles, found in the cavern of Mas d'Azil, Ariège. He dwelt upon both the skill of the drawing and the information supplied as to the manners of the time. One piece of horn, in low relief, shows a woman lying by the side of a reindeer, thus seeming to prove that the animal was domesticated. There are several very lifelike representations of the aurochs, sculptured in the round; and others of horses, one with a bit in its mouth. Still more remarkable are the heads of horses, one without the skin, another with the muscles likewise removed. The pebbles coloured with symmetrical designs, which show very little artistic taste, M. Piette assigned to a later period.

THE STAGE.

MRS. BURNETT'S NEW PLAY.

"PHYLLIS," the new play by Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, is no worthy successor to "The Real Little Lord Fauntleroy." Construction was not the strong point even in that drama; but one pardoned faults of construction when they permitted the piece to retain in its entirety, not perhaps the action of the story in book form, but the charm of the characters. On the stage, as much as in the book, Mrs. Errol was loveable, the little lord engaging, and his old grandfather a pungent study. Nothing corresponding to any one of these three personages is to be found in "Phyllis." In "Phyllis" there is neither a very genuine comedy nor a very admirable pathos. The play lasts too long; there are too few people in it for whom we can care in the slightest degree; too many whose presence bores us exceedingly. In fact, the people are shadows—shadows or the wholly conventional. There can be no need to tell in detail the dull unsatisfying story. We have heard that the play was, in part, suggested to Mrs. Burnett by an early tale of her own, little known in England. To the reader of fiction, part of it suggests—but this is probably only a coincidence—something in a clever but too long-drawn novel by Mr. James Payne; we mean the relations between the father and daughter. The father proud, selfish, smart, almost a scoundrel; the daughter suffering keenly, and suffering practically, from the small estimation in which this worthy is held. Of Philip Dysart, the egotistical parent in Mrs. Burnett's play, it is touchingly urged that he "does not lie unless he has an end to reach"; but when this tribute has been paid to his morality, there is nothing more to be said for him. The daughter is a character a little more complex and a good deal more admirable. We can imagine, indeed, that in a novel the record of the mental struggles she goes through, with a bad father, with a lover lost, and with a lover to win, might be distinctly interesting; but if this is actually material for the stage it is certain that proper stage use has not now been made of it. As things are, the play cannot have a long run, and we should even be somewhat surprised if an enterprising management made any attempt to give it a run at all.

But, while very little is to be said for the piece, a good deal that is favourable is to be said of the acting. Mr. Conway—apt to be a little too obstinately prosperous—is, at least, gallant and convincing. Mr. Somerset, who makes up badly for the part of the father—unless it is, as it may be, very clever to suggest, by make-up, a character wholly artificial—has the great and rare merit of playing with distinction, of playing with style. Here and there, both in the character and in the performance, there are touches of resemblance to the little Lord Fauntleroy's grandfather. But, on the whole, Mr. Somerset's work is original, and it is done with decision. Of the two or three men who act less excellently, we will not speak. In so far as the ladies are concerned, the cast was, in the main, very strong. There was Miss Rose Norreys, ready to be naïve and tender whenever the dramatist gave her the chance; and that was not too often. There was Miss Rose Leclercq, with her thorough knowledge of her business, her agreeable presence, her velvety voice, and, to boot, the distinction of method which she possesses, almost as much as Mr. Somerset. Again, the heroine, Phyllis Dysart, was played by Miss Alma Murray, who, now by her personality, and now by her art, interested the spectator in Phyllis's fortunes. Phyllis has about as much regard for her father as the maddish young gentleman in Ibsen's "Ghosts"—is it not?—has for those who transmitted to him a hereditary disease. But she does not rebel openly, or deduce, from her own experience, that the commandment, "Honour thy father and thy mother," belongs alone to "traditional morality." Her lot, until near the end, is a pretty hard one. The dramatist, however, permits her at least one engaging love-scene, as well as much mental struggle; and Miss Alma Murray, with her grace and tact, does justice—it is hardly necessary to say it—alike to Phyllis's tenderness and Phyllis's sorrows.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

STAGE NOTES.

MR. HENRY A. JONES's new play will be brought out at the Shaftesbury Theatre early in September. It will immediately be put into rehearsal. Mr. Willard's part is naturally the strongest in the piece; but a very sympathetic heroine has a good opportunity for effect in two acts out of four.

THE season at the Lyceum closed on Saturday last, some time earlier than is usually the case. In a speech delivered on the fall of the curtain, Mr. Irving declared his intention of reviving "Macbeth" at no very distant date; but, when the theatre reopens in September, it will be with the first performance which has been seen for many years of the late Mr. Watts Phillips's "Dead Heart." Mr. Irving will, of course, assume the part of Robert Landry, played with such success at the Adelphi many years ago by Benjamin Webster; and we are glad to know that in another important character in the same piece Mr. S. B. Bancroft will reappear before the public.

WE hear that Miss Rose Norreys—who has gone into the country before now with a view to practise in the greatest parts in comedy—will be seen this summer at a Kentish watering-place in the character of Juliet.

LITTLE Miss Vera Beringer takes her benefit at the Opéra Comique on the morning of Tuesday, July 16. The occasion is interesting, not only because it is admitted that this very young lady shares only with Miss Minnie Terry the honours which may fall to childhood on the stage, but likewise by reason of the character of the bill of the play which has been prepared for the benefit. Mrs. Kendal recites, M^{lle}. Antoinette Sterling sings, and a primeur—as the restaurant keeper would say—is provided in the first performance of Ibsen's "Pillars of Society." The drama will, we hear, be given intact; and the artists who take part in it include several of the actors who have been wont to be welcome in "The Real Little Lord Fauntleroy," and Miss Genevieve Ward, and Miss Mary Burke, and Miss Vera Beringer herself.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. MAX HEINRICH gave the first of two concerts at Prince's Hall last Saturday afternoon. He sang four numbers from "Lieder des jungen Werthers am Rhein" (Op. 2), by Hugo Brückner. The music is fresh, charming, and clever. The songs were admirably sung and much applauded. We understand that the composer, who died recently, was a pupil of Adolphe Jensen; and, judging from these songs, he was a musician who seemed likely to rise to eminence. Miss Lena Little's excellent rendering of Lieder by Schumann, Grieg, and Bizet ought not to pass unnoticed. This lady is making rapid strides in her profession, and we are glad to see that she always sings the best classical music. Herr Schönberger gave an exceedingly fine performance of the "Wanderer" Fantasie of Schubert. An artistic reading of the "Kreutzer" Sonata by Herren Schönberger and Hess also deserves mention. Two vocal duets by Goring Thomas were unfortunately placed at the end of a very long programme.

There was a violin and pianoforte recital at the same hall on the following Monday afternoon. Herr A. Friedheim, the Russian pianist, played Liszt's Sonata in B minor. It was, on the whole, a fine performance. The player is evidently quite at home in this kind of music, but yet did not seem to us to display quite as much life and brilliancy as Herr Stavenhagen. As to the composition itself, the more we hear it, the less we like it. Herr Friedheim was heard to advantage in the "Kreutzer" Sonata. The violin part was played by M. Tivadar Nachéz, but his reading of it was not over-refined. He was also heard in Max Bruch's G minor Concerto—a work which is quite out of place in the programme of a chamber concert.

Dr. Parry's fourth Symphony in E was produced at the eighth Richter Concert last Monday evening. It is only a few weeks ago that his Symphony in C was heard for the first time at a Philharmonic concert. Such industry speaks for itself. No. 4 was written at the special request of the conductor of the Richter Concerts. The first movement is an Allegro energico, and it contains much that is good and effective. There is, however, a certain uniformity of rhythm which, in spite of the waltz-like character of some of the music, produces rather a heavy effect. The slow movement cast in the "song" form opens with a broad melodious theme, which, however skilfully constructed, bears no trace of effort. The middle section contrasts well with it. It concludes with an effective coda. The Allegro scherzoso is a delightfully fresh and piquant movement—one which, as described in the book, "seems suggestive of an al-fresco fête in the olden time." At a first hearing, we feel disposed to consider this and the preceding movement the best parts of the symphony. The Finale, though clever, appeared to us laboured. The new work was well received. A first movement of a Concerto attributed to Beethoven was given for the first time in England. The history of this fragment is a curious one. A set of orchestral parts and the pianoforte part in the handwriting of Joseph Bezdny, the late director of the Hradschm Institute for the blind at Prague, were lately discovered—the one in the house of Bezecny's son, the other in that of his stepson. Dr. Adler, professor of music in the German University of Prague, considers it a genuine composition of Beethoven. The music is quite Mozartian in character, and, therefore, any interest it may possess is purely historical. It would be interesting to learn why it was not brought to light before now. It is supposed to have been written in the year 1790. The pianoforte part, which is not difficult, was exceedingly well played by M^{lle}. Stepanoff. The programme included the closing scene from "Götterdämmerung," in which Miss Fillunger was not heard at her best. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Beethoven's eighth Symphony.

Fraulein Spies again met with immense success at her second vocal recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. To hear her sing the Lieder of Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms is indeed a great treat. She riveted the attention of her audience by the charm and feeling with which she interpreted nearly the whole set of Schumann's "Dichterliebe" songs. But why did she leave out two of the finest—"Das ist ein Flöten und Geigen" and the pathetic "Die alten bösen Lieder"? She sang the Schubert songs delightfully. The programme concluded with Brahms, and her rendering of the dainty "Wiegenlied" and of the humorous "Vergleichliches Ständchen" left nothing to desire. Some pianoforte solos, skilfully played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, gave variety to the programme. Mr. T. Frantzen was a careful accompanist. There was a fairly large, but highly appreciative, audience.

Herr Johannes Schubert, of Dresden, gave a pianoforte recital at Steinway Hall on Wednesday. His rendering of Beethoven's F minor Sonata (Op. 57) was correct and intelligent; but his playing of some pieces by Chopin was far too mechanical. There is something behind the notes in this music; but Paphmann, perhaps, has made us too exacting. Herr Schubert gave some clever, if not very characteristic, variations of his own composition.

LITERATURE.

A PORTUGUESE NOVEL.

Dragon's Teeth. A Novel from the Portuguese of Senhor Eça de Queiroz, translated by Mary J. Serrano. (Boston: Ticknor; London: Trübner.)

If the "naturalists" go on much longer on their present lines, if they refuse to abate anything of the full rigour of their theories, they will go some way to push the novel out of sight and mind altogether, and let in that ancient enemy of the novel—the drama. No moderate-minded critic, indeed, can deny the great service that is being done to fiction by these realistic innovators—even by the most narrow and intolerant of them. It seems to me that they have done, and are doing, for literature what the Pre-Raphaelites did for painting. There is certainly a realistic Slough of Despond to be waded through before we can reach to firm ground beyond; and the novelist and his readers must do this penance and suffer this expiation for a good deal of weak, false, and over-sentimental fiction that has lately been in favour.

In the mud of this same Slough the weakling sticks, the strong man shall win through. For the present, therefore, we must put up with dirty ways and rough travelling; but there is a limit. There are, we all know, many honest, moderate, and intelligent readers whom no theorist shall ever persuade that the art of fiction is not something beyond a mere demonstration of the pessimistic theory of human life, and who will have it that a story should be something more than a photographic representation of the acts and deeds and motives and talk of commonplace mean-minded men and women. No argument, no mockery, no clever writing of realistic novels, with nothing unsavoury and disagreeable in life left out, shall persuade these moderate-minded readers and critics that fiction, rightly considered, is not an interpretation of life through art methods, rather than a minute reiteration of its meaner details. Such critics will never allow that the higher fiction is not a seizing of the essential and salient points rather than a conglomerate of everything. The Zolaists claim to know everything of the ways of this world, and to set down all they know; but, granting for argument's sake that they are omniscient, it may be urged that omniscience, recording all it knows, would achieve an absolutely unreadable novel, unreadable for length and monotony. The Zolaists, to do them justice, have never gone quite so far as this. Their novels are not mere photographs. To a considerable extent they are, in spite of their author's theories, selections of salient points, often admirable presentments of life—of such life as has been passed through the mental alembic of men of undoubted literary talent. It is the alembic itself that there is some reason to quarrel with. It is the imperfect vision, the extraordinarily limited vision, that seems to those who do not accept all their methods, or perhaps share all their blindness, to vitiate their best work.

M. Zola and his disciples have treated all schools and all methods but their own with such contumely and contempt that it is difficult in our turn not to be contemptuous of their intolerance. To take but one point in the new doctrine—the Zolaistic abhorrence of the hero and the villain. Is it really a fact that there are no men who, in the drama of life, act atrociously, none who play their parts nobly and well? My personal experience is quite the other way, and I express it the more confidently because a chain of great men from Shakspeare to Victor Hugo are dead against M. Zola on this point. I absolutely refuse to believe that M. Zola and his young friends of the Paris Boulevards know more of life than Shakspeare and Molière, Dickens and Balzac. Everyone of these greater writers admits the existence of that neutral tint of meanness and self-seeking which is the dominant colouring on the Zolaists' canvas, but everyone of them has shown that he is aware too of a soul of good in the world as well as a soul of evil. To make a true report of life they personify the one as a hero and the other as a villain.

Now, in examining the work of the great Portuguese novelist, Senhor Eça de Queiroz, it is well to bear this particular point in mind. The Portuguese novelist is a "naturalist" of the school of M. Zola, but he is hardly a follower. It will presently be shown how he has refused to accept this particular tenet and many others of his master. He is so extreme a realist that it would be easy in this very novel to pick out a passage or two that would, or should, bring a blush to the cheek of M. Zola himself, if, since La Terre, that eminent writer has not got beyond this particular demonstration of emotion. This, the realists will say, is a performance to be proud of; but Senhor Eça's hardest critic will admit that in his pages, though he never shirks plain speech, there is never "Dirt for Dirt's Sake."

Dragon's Teeth is the translation into fair English of Senhor Eça de Queiroz's best novel, O Primo Bazilio. The translator's title appears to be an invention of her own. It is, perhaps, a tolerably taking and appropriate title from the lending library point of view, but in dealing with a masterpiece it would have been a hundred times better to stick to the book's true name.

Senhor Eça de Queiroz is at present not only the most eminent novelist of Portugal, but of the whole Peninsula; and what is odd is that he has found favour with the reading public of Spain and Portugal by literary methods which are the reverse of those followed in either of these two very literary nations. To a northern taste, the fault of Peninsular prose literature is an over-rhetorical tendency. Senhor Eça de Queiroz is a close student of both English and French literature; and he is as direct and concentrated as a good English writer, as logical and pointed and graceful as a Frenchman. In strength, in manly directness, and in literary charm, M. Guy de Maupassant comes nearest to Senhor Eça de Queiroz of any Frenchman of his school. In general power, in knowledge of life, in breadth, in tolerance (not a common trait among the Naturalists), I should be inclined to place him above every living disciple of the eminent half-Italian Pessimist who is at the head of French realistic fiction.

It is strange, therefore, that Senhor Eça de Queiroz, notwithstanding a French translation of one of his novels, should be so completely ignored as he is in France, when he has so many great qualities that should recommend him there. In Spain, in spite of the jealousy between that country and its Atlantic neighbour, his merits are generously confessed. The Spaniards praise his fluent and flexible style, his narrative power, his ease, his strength, his pathos, and his humour: on the latter point (a delicate one to handle) I shall presently have something to say.

O Primo Bazilio is a tragedy interspersed, as life's tragedy itself is interspersed, with comedy passages. Jorge is a young mining engineer happily married to a beautiful girl, Luiza. She is gay, gentle, bright, affectionate, and loves her husband dearly. As the book opens, he is about to leave her for a month on business; and she reads in a newspaper that her cousin Bazilio is returning to Lisbon from Brazil. Bazilio has been her first love, the hero of an innocent boy and girl flirtation long before her marriage. Compelled by poverty to leave her and his country, he has made his fortune by speculation in Brazil, and is on his way home after a stay in Paris. She is pleased to think she will see him again, recalling this romantic episode in her life somewhat contemptuously, steadfast in her love for her husband. He goes and Bazilio comes. He is handsome, distinguished, knowing the world, the merely mercenary world of Paris. He can speak to her of things—art, literature, and the easy, social ethics of the world—which, for the commonplace, excellent Jorge have no existence. Slowly his influence grows upon her, the old illusion revives. She does not guess the man's true character—his heartlessness, his disloyalty, his meanness, still less his contempt for herself in his mental comparison of her with the stars of the Parisian demi-monde. Then comes a realistic tale of seduction: his false wooing; her weak yielding. Their secret is discovered by her servant, Juliana; and thenceforward the plot turns on what is a more frequent motive in French than in English stories, the "blackmailing" of the mistress by her servant. But the woman Juliana is a good deal more than a mere extortioner; it is more than the wringing of money from her mistress that she wants. In all realistic fiction perhaps no such villainous and hateful character exists. She sinks so far below the average low level of naturalistic commonplace iniquity that in common fairness of moral adjustment the reader needs a counterpoise in the direction of heroism, but he gets none. Juliana is a thin, hard-featured woman of forty, suffering from chronic heart disease. She concentrates all her envious hatred of mankind upon the person of her gentle and pretty mistress. This awful female villain accumulates in her own wretched person pretty nearly every vice that has won the loathing of men since the ages began—perfidy, meanness, cruelty, and greed. She is a liar and a bully, and hideously ill-favoured. For the first time in her own miserable life she feels delight as she persecutes the helpless Luiza: she sings, rubs her hands, and laughs out at times suddenly with secret glee. Mistress and servant almost change places: the maid compels the unhappy lady, under threats of exposure, to perform menial services: to wash, sweep, iron; and in this long passage of the story, the revolted pride, the agony of continual terror, the unceasing humiliations of the persecuted woman are depicted with a force, a painful realism, and a truth that are beyond praise—in their kind.

Before this, Luiza has had recourse to her lover to save her. Bazilio absolutely refuses to move in the matter. In a powerful scene his true nature is revealed to her. The scales fall from her eyes, and she sees his dishonourable cowardice, his disloyalty, his baseness, and his utter selfishness. Her illusions end, her love turns to hatred and contempt. She has to bear all the cruel tyranny of Juliana unhelped. Bazilio, under a false pretext, too mean himself to discover that he can have failed to come up to his mistress's standard of right doing, and still believing himself loved, has gone to Paris. The husband returns. The letters are recovered without scandal by a friend from the woman Juliana, who, in her excitement, dies suddenly of a spasm of the disease that has threatened her all through. The old love and liking for her husband, Jorge, return to the vacillating Luiza. She is nearly happy again, wrapped in a false sense of security, when an accident reveals the intrigue to the husband. For a time he suffers in silence, nurses his wife through an illness, still loving her at heart, and is generous to the point of condonation, but more through weakness and complaisance than any action of those higher or nobler motives of tolerance that lead to true pardon. She recovers, and he tells her he is aware of her secret, and, in the same breath, offers to forgive her; but the blow is too heavy. She gives way, is struck with brain fever, and dies miserably. Such is the plot of this remarkable work; and it is told with a concentrated strength, a dramatic power, and an ease that can come only from a master's hand.

The Spanish critics find wit and truth in the passages that satirise some national and some Peninsular habits and methods of thought. A foreigner can hardly enquire very closely into the truth or propriety of these sarcasms, but there is no doubt whatever about their power. Senhor Eça de Queiroz's humour, too, has been praised. There is nothing upon which men so differ as the causes which stir them to laughter; but to the present writer the Portuguese novelist's humour seems to dwell too much upon the inevitable defects and misfortunes of mankind to be very laughter-moving. Some things are surely too pitiful to be laid bare. Sunt lacrimae rerum; and disease, and defect, and deformity are not fit subjects for ridicule. We all know them too well. We mark them, we pity, or pass on. We do ill to laugh.

Such a book is not easy to translate. Apart from the literal rendering which Miss Serrano has done creditably—she does not seem well acquainted with Portuguese ways of life. A few notes would have been useful, but there are none but such as relate to the value of Portuguese money in American dollars. Portuguese is the most crabbed and difficult of all the Romance tongues, and the one most remote in construction from English; but that is no reason why certain Portuguese words should be left standing in the English rendering. Um conto de reis occurs a dozen times over. It has no sense for English readers, but its plain rendering, "a million of reis," is quite intelligible. At times Senhor Eça de Queiroz uses strong expressions; but they have all perfect English equivalents, and the translator of a realistic novel should not pare down such a book as this into a false propriety. There was no compulsion on her to touch the work at all. Miss Serrano, in her preface, says that she has "assumed the responsibility of softening here and there, and even of at times effacing a line too sharply drawn, a light or a shadow too strongly marked to please a taste that has been largely formed on Puritanic models."

She has indeed! Her Puritan hand has been very busy. I will not say too busy in every case; but it should be remembered by prim translators that the architecture of fiction is delicately built up, and that it is of masonry most lightly poised. It is possible to take away one single stone and bring ruin on the whole structure.

In the last sentence of the last page the translator has removed one such master-stone. Bazilio has returned from Paris, and, knowing nothing of the tragedy that has occurred, knocks at Luiza's door. He learns the story of her death. He is shocked, and for a moment or two dumb-founded. The reader is not aware of the full heartlessness, grossness, and baseness of the man till he turns to his companion with the remark: "Que ferro! Podia ter trazido a Alphonsine!" This phrase the translator has not rendered. Better to have left the whole work untranslated! It is the keystone of the arch.

Although Senhor Eça de Queiroz, as will have been seen, is a professing follower of M. Zola, he is too good a novelist to substitute in his pages a theory of life for life itself. The Zolaistic groove is too narrow for him, and he is for ever leaving it, daring at one time to be dramatic, at another to be deeply pathetic, sometimes even to be indignant with vice and meanness after a very un-Zolaistic fashion. Senhor Eça de Queiroz is still, fortunately for himself and us, a young man: he has a promising future before him. He has been well advised, perhaps, to enlist as a recruit under M. Zola. But these fore-said great qualities show that he has no need of a leader, and when he comes to add to them some little enthusiasm for what is high and noble, he will desert the realistic colours altogether and fight, as in literature every strong man should, for his own hand.

OSWALD CRAWFURD.

"HISTORY OF THE MONGOLS FROM THE NINTH TO THE NINETEENTH CENTURY."—Part III. The Mongols of Persia. By Henry H. Howorth. (Longmans.)

THE somewhat critical position of Persia at this time, and the Shah's actual presence in England, will doubtless attract special attention to the third volume of Mr. Howorth's History of the Mongols.

It deals with the history of the country from the time of the Tartar invasion under Hulagu, grandson to Jingis Khan, down to the appearance of Tamurlane. Since then, Persia has passed through many vicissitudes "of defeat and victory, of obscurity and glory." What promised to be a national dynasty was founded by Shah Ismail; and under the early Safwi or Suffavean rulers the country once more flourished. The greatest of them, Shah Abbas I., gave, says an English traveller, "a martial spirit to the people, polished their manners, and brought the governors of the provinces, who were before in great measure independent, into subjection." When this great prince, says the Frenchman Chardin, ceased to live, Persia ceased to prosper. Eastward, his empire stretched to the Oxus, and included Herat and Kandahar; on the west he drove the Turks from Azarbaijan, Georgia, and Bagdad. But, after the death of Sulaiman I., "the Lion of Persia"—whose favour the East India Company sought to gain by presents of sack, claret, and Rhenish "of the very best"—the power of the Suffavean dynasty rapidly decayed. For nearly eight years Persia was subject to Ghilzai invaders from Afghanistan, and then the Turcoman, Nadir Shah, became master of the country, though he can hardly be said to have ruled it. His death by assassination in Meshed was followed by a period of anarchy and confusion, until, after a brief struggle with their Zend rivals, the Kajar dynasty, now ruling, was established on the throne. And now once again Persia is threatened by an invasion—commercial and political, if not military—of a stronger power, which has made itself master of Turkestan. Whether the rivalries of Russia and England will lead to yet another division of the country, with the Russians supreme in the north—in ancient Media, that is—and with Southern Persia under a British protectorate, is hardly a fitting subject for discussion here. Still there are some connecting links between Mr. Howorth's narrative and the problems of to-day which may be pointed out. For instance, there is the account given of the capture of Khelat, now called Khelat-i-Nardiri, by Tamurlane—the place which the Shah, a few weeks ago, was reported, incorrectly, to have ceded to the Russians. The Khan of Gorjan, doubtless the Jahgurm of modern maps, had joined with his dependent, the Khan of Khelat, in defying Timur's authority; and Timur accordingly resolved to march against the stronghold. The Khan of Khelat sent messengers offering to submit, if Timur would come to the gates with only a small escort. Timur went accordingly, accompanied by only five horsemen, and very nearly fell into the ambush that had been laid for him. He then ordered an assault on the stronghold, and the rocky walls of Khelat were scaled by the hill men from Badakshan, who accompanied his army.

The golden prime of Tartar rule in Persia was reached in the reign of Ghazan Khan. As Mr. Howorth points out, this sovereign was in many respects the counterpart of Akbar. By oriental writers he is always exalted as the pattern of a wise ruler, and Mr. Howorth speaks of him as one of the most remarkable sovereigns the East has ever produced. He was the first of the Persian Ilkhans to accept Islam and to repudiate the supremacy of the great Khan of the Mongols. Among other things, he re-organised the fiscal administration, or rather introduced a regular system for the first time since the Tartar conquest.

"How are we," he said, "to bring into the paths of honesty these governors and tax collectors who have become habituated to exact more than is due, and to pay nothing into the treasury, who are always being tried and always secure exemption from punishment by a distribution of money; and when one of their colleagues is put to death, attribute it rather to his evil star, or to some one's malice. We must devise some plan by which the provincial governors shall be prevented from handling the public moneys, and the best way will be to take away their power of levying a single farthing."

The same abuses, in fact, were rampant in Persia as may be seen there to-day; and Ghazan Khan tried hard to apply a remedy. Settlement records were prepared showing the taxes due from each village. Forced requisitions were forbidden. Money lenders were circumvented by a decree making usury illegal, and advances for the purchase of bullocks and seed were granted from the treasury. More lasting than the laws he made were the magnificent buildings Ghazan founded at Tabriz, Shiraz, and Sultanieh. Unfortunately, it is impossible to test the account given by oriental historians of Ghazan's ability as a ruler by comparison with the evidence of European travellers; though many, doubtless, visited Persia at this time, and the itinerary of one of them—Geoffrey de Langley, who was sent with letters by Edward I. of England—is still extant. Otherwise, it might appear that Ghazan's achievements, whatever may have been his intentions, were a good deal exaggerated by his Mohammedan eulogists. Sir Oliver St. John, whose studies in Oriental history have been supplemented by a long and intimate acquaintance with the people of Persia and the neighbouring countries, insists in one of his too scattered essays on the absolute incapacity of the Turk for civil administration; and to this cause alone he attributes much of the weakness of Persia at the present day. When the rulers of the country were pure Aryans, as the Achaemenides and Sassanians, or semi-Aryans, content to govern by national methods like the early Suffaveans, Persia was prosperous. Under Turk or Tartar rule no dynasty lasted more than two or three generations, and the country was weak against foreign foes. During the period of Mr. Howorth's narrative, Persia was subject to rulers whom Sir Oliver St. John would class under the head of Turks. Then, as now, the growth of internal prosperity was checked by chronic misgovernment; while the country was always exposed, and in the end succumbed to attacks from outside. Hulagu's Amirs were brave soldiers, but they made corrupt and incapable rulers; and this is proved by the stringency of the reforms which Ghazan Khan found it necessary to introduce—reforms which were doomed to failure as soon as the reformer passed away.

It is impossible to give more than the faintest idea of the vast stores of information which Mr. Howorth's laborious industry has collected for his book. As in Parts I. and II. every page is crowded with facts and figures, and the reader who is unfamiliar with the main outlines of Persian history will often be puzzled to find his way. The perfervid energy of the Tartars, before they were enervated by contact with Persian civilisation, brought them into more or less violent collision with their neighbours on every side; and some of the most interesting portions of the volume refer to the victories of the Ilkhans in Armenia, Georgia, Syria, and Egypt. Mr. Howorth has also been at great pains to trace the history of the intercourse between Persia and Europe during the middle ages. The Tartars, both before and after their conversion to Islam, were anything but bigoted; indeed, their curiosity to know about strange people and outlandish manners made them very tolerant. Just as Akbar, the great Moghul, would listen to the learned men of his court arguing on religious questions, and as the Rajput chiefs of to-day are fond of hearing discussions between Brahmans, Mohammedans and Christians, so Hulagu was quite ready to permit the erection of Christian churches in his dominions, and at the same time to listen to the preaching of Tartar priests and magic workers. Ghazan Khan built Buddhist temples and became a Mohammedan for political reasons. The occult arts, especially alchemy, had a wonderful attraction for several of the Persian Ilkhans.

"In pursuit of this hobby," says the historian Rashid-ud-din, "Hulagu's servants burnt a great quantity of divers substances, and, without any real gain, caused volumes of smoke. . . . But all this produced nothing, nor could they show a single piece of gold or silver which they had made in their laboratories. The amount of money wasted in this search was enormous."

Arghun Khan tried to discover the elixir of life, and made himself extremely ill by drinking a decoction which a lama from Hindustan had prepared for him. Frightened by symptoms of paralysis, Arghun Khan sought council of his miracle-men and devil worshippers. They consulted the burnt shoulder-blades of sheep, according to the method of divination still practised in Mongolia, and decided that his sickness was due to sorcery, in which one of his wives was implicated. The young woman confessed to having employed a love charm, and she was accordingly drowned with all her hand-maidens. To Arghun's court came all the alchemists of the East; and one day when they were debating in his presence, he turned to a moolah of Shiraz, who was looking incredulous, and said:

"You who are a learned man believe because I am a Turk that these people are deceiving me; yet it is quite certain that there is a science of alchemy, and that there is some one who knows the secret. If I illtreat and put to death these ignorant people that one man will be afraid to come and see me."

Ghazan Khan, the greatest of the Ilkhans, seems to have been a practical chemist. Rashid-ed-din writes:

"Instead of wasting enormous sums like his predecessors, he rather devoted himself to the more practical part of making enamel, dissolving talc, melting crystal, making condensations and sublimations, and producing substances like gold and silver, saying his object was not to learn how to make these precious metals, which was a very difficult art, but to learn how to make various chemical experiments."

Mr. Howorth has now accomplished so much of his task that it would be idle, if not impertinent, to criticise such minor details as his system of spelling, occasional inaccuracies in matters of fact, and indications of a certain unfamiliarity with Oriental customs and manners. Mr. William Honeycomb, on a memorable occasion, told the members of his club, "with a little passion," that he never liked pedantry in spelling, that he spelt like a gentleman, and not like a scholar; but Mr. Howorth may plead a better excuse than this for not adopting any recognised system of Oriental transliteration. Enough was said, however, about his spelling when the earlier volumes appeared. Inaccuracies of fact in such an extended narrative are of course unavoidable, and are often no more than mere slips of the pen. For instance two separate dates are assigned for the death of Arghun Ata, the famous governor of Khorassan. It is more to the purpose to remember that Mr. Howorth's researches have enabled him to set forth, in a consecutive form, an enormous mass of information relating to countries and people whose history can no longer be neglected by Englishmen. Kingdoms ruled by descendants of Mongol or Tartar chiefs are being rapidly divided between two European powers; and their ultimate fate is one of the pressing questions of the day. If the lessons of the past afford any indication of the future, Mr. Howorth's history is invaluable.

STEPHEN WHEELER.

The Swiss Confederation. By Sir F. O. Adams and C. D. Cunningham. (Macmillan.)

THIS book has been written solely for the purpose of giving information; and in saying that it is a thoroughly useful book, we mean to give it very high praise. The authors have sought to present within the space of 300 pages a clear and accurate account of the institutions and public life of Switzerland. What Mr. Bryce has done on a large scale for a large country, they have done on a small scale for a small country; and they have succeeded admirably. As one might expect, theirs is a less attractive work than his. The subject, however, should interest everyone who, in these times of constitutional change, cares to form an intelligent opinion on political questions. Not only can we trace in Switzerland many of the stages in the growth of our own institutions, but we can find a good deal in the present frame of the Swiss constitution that may be of practical service to us. We could not have had a more useful supplement to The American Commonwealth than this modest work on The Swiss Confederation.

The Referendum, for instance, though it could not well become a regular part of our English system, unless in such matters as the application of the Free Libraries Act to particular districts, certainly deserves to be studied by everyone interested in democratic government. It will confirm the opinion of those who believe in popular moderation to find that in Switzerland "extreme measures, whether radical or reactionary, have no chance whatever of being accepted by the people." If the Referendum had existed in England, it would, no doubt, have acted in the same way. The people, voting "Aye" or "No," would certainly have rejected Catholic emancipation, and would probably have rejected compulsory education. Quite irrelevant considerations, however, sometimes appear to determine the result. Thus, the rejection in 1882 of a patent law, which was accepted five years later, is attributed to the fact that on the same day another law was submitted to the people containing an obnoxious compulsory vaccination clause. But, on the whole, the results would seem to show the exercise of a sound, temperate, and, politically speaking, final, judgment.

"As to the moral effect," say the authors, "which the exercise of this institution has had upon the people, we are assured that it is admitted to be salutary even by adversaries of democratic government. The consciousness of individual influence, as well as the national feeling, is declared to have been strengthened; and the fact of a large, and on several occasions, increased participation of the people in the vote is quoted as tending to prove that their interest in political questions is growing keener."

More closely bearing on our own political questions are the constitutional position and functions of the Federal Council, the relations of the cantons to the Federal Government, and the jurisdiction of the Federal Court. The exposition given in the work before us will be found sufficiently detailed for all ordinary purposes; but we may refer those who wish a fuller account of the Federal Court and its development to two elaborate articles by the Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge in the Law Quarterly Review (October, 1888, and April, 1889). It should not be forgotten that the court has not jurisdiction, as in America, to decide whether federal laws are constitutional or not: in the Referendum the people have the means of deciding anew for themselves. The Federal Council, which forms the Swiss executive, should excite the envy of those who bewail the evils of party government. Its members are elected for a period of three years by the Assembly, but once elected, it forms an independent body. It cannot dissolve the Assembly, nor can the assembly dissolve it. No adverse vote compels it to resign. And—perhaps, the most important fact of all—its members are not drawn from one political party. There is thus secured a great continuity in the executive government; while the nation need never lose the services of a competent and experienced man by the defeat of his party in the legislature. By the creation of such a body, as our authors say, Swiss statesmen have gone far "towards solving that important problem which has puzzled other democratic countries—viz., how to combine an efficient executive with democratic institutions." France has found, and we, too, shall find, that it is the greatest and most difficult of all state problems; and it may be that the solution lies in some adaptation of the Swiss idea. There is certainly no necessity in the nature of things that a cabinet should not only form the executive, but be also the directors of legislation.

The remainder of the volume deals, among other matters, with the army, religion, education, agriculture, commerce, and social movements; so that there is presented to us a complete, though brief, survey of Swiss public life, written in a spirit of warm appreciation of the many fine qualities of the Swiss people. Even those to whom Switzerland is a familiar place will learn much from its pages. We advise such of them as are serious-minded to take the book with them this autumn and read it on the spot.

G. P. MACDONELL.

Authors at Home. Personal and Biographical Sketches of well-known American Writers. (Cassell.)

HERE are twenty-seven brief sketches of some of the leading American authors of the day, by other American authors, some of whom are hardly less famous. The common object of them is to give "a closer and more intimate view of the authors sketched than their writings could possibly afford." We are taken, in imagination, to the homes of these authors, shown their drawing-rooms and their libraries, and permitted to converse (by proxy) with them about their career, their family, and their habits. All is done with the utmost good taste. There is nothing revealed that the most sensitive man and author could object to; and while praise is the universal note, there is uncommonly little "log-rolling."

As might be expected, the quality of the articles varies somewhat, but most of them are good. The sketch of Richard Henry Stoddard by Mr. Joseph B. Gilder—one of the editors of the able and enterprising New York Critic, from whose columns the papers are reprinted—is a model of its kind, quite a little masterpiece, which some of the other contributors would have done well to study. It is well packed with information, and yet sprightly and graphic. It makes us feel that, if we are not on intimate terms with Mr. Stoddard, we have, at any rate, been introduced to him in his own house and enjoyed the interview. Mr. Stoddard has a considerable collection of literary treasures, MSS. and books written by or once belonging to Waller, Gray, Coleridge, Burns, Keats, and others. The most valued of all his "literary relics" is "the veriest wisp" of light brown or golden hair which grew on the head of Milton. This relic has precious associations with other great men. In its time it has belonged to Dr. Johnson, Dr. Beatty, and Leigh Hunt. Leigh Hunt believed it to be from the lock attached to a miniature portrait of Milton "known to have existed in the time of Addison, and supposed to have been in his possession." It is a portion of the lock about which Keats wrote an ode and Leigh Hunt a sonnet. The other portion Hunt gave to Mrs. Browning.

Equally good are the sketches of Col. Higginson by Mr. George Willis Cooke, and of George William Curtis by Mr. George Parsons Lathrop. Both Col. Higginson and Mr. Curtis are instances of men of letters who have done substantial service in the world of politics. Col. Higginson was once a clergyman, then in the Civil War a soldier, leading the first regiment formed of negroes, and always a sturdy Radical. His life now, says Mr. Cooke, is "the quiet and busy life of the scholar and man of letters"; but he is a man of letters who "is intensely interested in all that pertains to his country's welfare, and all that makes for the elevation of humanity." Col. Higginson is an all-round man who, if he has not achieved brilliant distinction in any one direction, has succeeded in not a few, and has failed in none. It would seem that his bent is mainly literary; yet, as Mr. Cooke says, "quickly and keenly sympathetic with the life of his time, he will never permit the writing of books to absorb his heart to the exclusion of whatever human interests his country calls him to consider." Mr. Curtis is best known in England as the author of Prue and I, and of those genial discourses that proceed, month by month, from the editor's chair in Harper's Monthly; but he is known on the other side of the Atlantic as the author of works more important, though not more graceful, than these, and also as a public man of sterling merit and long-proved usefulness. In more than one revolt against corrupt government he has been a leader. He has always maintained his independence. He might, before now, have been minister to England or to Germany had he so chosen; but, says Mr. Lathrop, "his only political ambition is to instil sound principles and to oppose practical patriotism to practical politics." Mr. Lathrop also speaks of the example he sets of "indestructible dignity," and of a "delicately imaginative mind consecrating much of its energy to the public service."

Mr. W. H. Bishop's two studies give pleasant glimpses of the present editor of the Atlantic Monthly, Mr. T. B. Aldrich, and of his predecessor, Mr. William Dean Howells. Mr. Howells used to be a favourite here, but he has ruffled his British admirers of late by scoffing at their novelists and quizzing them about their "humour." He had his fun at our expense; and we seemed to justify his professed doubt about our sense of humour by taking him seriously when he set up Artemus Ward among the humourists and ignored Swift and Fielding and Sterne. His joke was a pretty good one, and it succeeded so well that his list of humourists seems defective because his own name is not there.

The paper on Walt Whitman is less satisfactory. The writer seems to know how to imitate Whitman's prose style. This style may pass in the case of Whitman himself, where it is characteristic; but when, as in the case of Mr. George Selwyn, it is affected, it becomes simply a slovenly and slangy want of style. The reader who tries to find in the article what manner of man Whitman is will surely be disappointed. Hardly more to be commended is Mr. W. Sloane Kennedy's pretentious article on Edward Everett Hale. It is a pity that this, in some respects, able person has such an objectionable craze for "fine" writing. He is one of a class of writers, to be found on both sides of the Atlantic, whose inordinate self-consciousness spoils their work. They forget that their subject is often likely to be more edifying than themselves. The world's absorbing interest does not centre in Mr. W. Sloane Kennedy, and he would be more admirable if he were less obtrusive. In the present case, the reader, who is naturally desirous to see distinctly the striking personality of Mr. Edward Everett Hale himself, is never permitted to lose sight and consciousness of the exhibitor.

The town of Hartford boasts three celebrities—Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, Mark Twain, and Charles Dudley Warner, who does the funny bits for Harper's Monthly and who has done superior work. Miss Alice Wellington Rollins, in her article on Dr. Holmes, is scarcely happy in her comparison of the "Autocrat" to an Aeolian harp; but, otherwise, the sketch is good. She lays stress on the kindly and sympathetic qualities of Dr. Holmes, pointing out, with justice, that there is no sting in his humour—"It is never we whom he is laughing at; it is simply human nature on its funny side." Other sketches include the veteran poet Whittier and the veteran historian Bancroft, Col. John Hay (of "Pike County Ballads" fame), John Burroughs (showing a man as pleasant as his books), George W. Cable, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, and Goldwin Smith—the only author not native to the States included in the series.

Readers of the volume will, I doubt not, heartily concur in the remark with which one contributor opens his article—"It was a happy thought that inspired the Critic's series of 'Authors at Home.'"

WALTER LEWIN.

A POLISH VISITOR TO SCOTLAND.

Odgłosy Szkocyi [Echoes of Scotland]. By Stanislaus Belza. (Cracow: Gebethner.)

SCOTLAND has so often been described that the book of M. Belza can hardly tell us anything new, although it may contain matter which is fresh to his own countrymen. Nor is there anything remarkable in the point of view from which he regards the country as a foreigner.

Our traveller arrives in England by way of Flushing and Queenborough, makes a short stay in London and then hurries to the "cold metropolis of the North." He passes York on his way, and has some curious things to tell us about it, among others, that it is to the English world what Rome is to the Catholic! In Edinburgh he describes all the well-known sights—St. Giles's, Knox's house, &c.—but the places connected with Sir Walter Scott and Mary Stuart especially allure him. We can perceive what a glamour the great novelist has thrown over all these localities. Our author makes pilgrimages to Abbotsford and Dryburgh, and goes as far north as Loch Katrine and the Trossachs. In the same way he traces many a spot which the unfortunate Mary has rendered celebrated, and a large part of the book is filled with her well-known history. But M. Belza does not neglect to see something of the manufacturing centres, and is delighted at meeting a Polish Jew at Glasgow in the person of a certain Abraham, the proprietor of an exchange office. They converse in Polish, which the Jew had not forgotten, although he had left his native country thirty years; and M. Belza compares him favourably with another Pole, whom some time previously he met at Stockholm, whither he had emigrated after the Hungarian war of 1849, and had entirely forgotten his native language. Our traveller does not forget to reiterate the old charges brought against the Scotch-Sabbatarianism and the like. He introduces a few anecdotes—some of which are ancient—such as that of the pious grocer who tells his apprentice to adulterate the sugar and then come to prayers. In the same way M. Max O'Rell in his book on Scotland has been giving us réchauffés of Dean Ramsay's stories.

Our author says nothing about the connexion which existed between his own country and Scotland from very early times. Poland swarmed with military adventurers, the younger sons of ancient families, who went thither to carve their fortunes with the sword. To this day many Scotch names are found in Poland. Before going to Russia the well-known Patrick Gordon offered his services to Sobieski. To come to later times, after the great emigration of 1831 many young Poles were educated at the University of Edinburgh. In 1828 Col. Ljach-Szyrma published some interesting letters on England and Scotland in Polish.

M. Belza seems to have a good knowledge of English literature, and writes very pleasantly. It only remains to add that the book is illustrated with some excellent wood-engravings.

NEW NOVELS.

With Everything against Her. In 3 vols. By Col. Cuthbert Larking. (Hurst & Blackett.)

The Queen Anne's Gate Mystery. In 2 vols. By Richard Arkwright. (White.)

To Call Her Mine, &c. By Walter Besant. (Chatto & Windus.)

Dr. Ramsau. By Georges Ohnet. (Chatto & Windus.)

Was She Good or Bad. By W. Minto. (Chatto & Windus.)

Robbery under Arms. By Rolf Boldrewood. (Macmillan.)

COLONEL LARKING is more at home in his descriptions of Indian life than in fictitious narrative. His Dandobast and Khabar was an excellent book of its kind, though its appeal was to the sportsman and the traveller rather than to that terribly exigent abstraction, the general reader. It is impossible not to note, in what is presumably his first attempt at fiction, that lack of the sense of proportion, that excessive verbosity, and that serene obliviousness of the demands of art, which constitute the bane of the majority of contemporary novels. Here, and in books of the same order, we have no touch with life; we merely listen to a passably interesting, but more or less inconsequent, relation of occurrences, personages, scenes, and circumstances, verbally put together in the same way as the Persian wonder-workers produce to order mats representing episodes of war or sport, out of bundles of many coloured rags which have to be utilized at random. In With Everything against Her, Egypt, Italy, and England, in succession, form a disconnected background, for there is no one artistic scene to this story of many lives. The plot, which is complicated without being adequately deceptive, is not, however, so commonplace as the style, which betrays frequent lapses in grammar and bristles with such banalities as "to get back" (for "to return"). Another grave fault, to which the writer of three-volume novels is particularly liable, is the introduction of what may be termed showman's English. Thus, for example, a few pages at the beginning of Col. Larking's third volume are devoted to an account of the Italian Government lottery system. "For the benefit of the uninitiated we will give a description of the way this lottery is played. Every Saturday," &c., &c. There could be nothing more hopelessly inartistic than this obtrusion of an author's personality as demonstrator of irrelevant matters. It seems the simplest of critical principles that nothing should be written in a novel which does not directly and in a sense necessarily bear upon the evolution of the story; but nothing, apparently, is more difficult of fulfilment. There is a legend of an Oriental monarch who speedily removed with a scimitar the heads of those unfortunates who became irrelevant and prolix in their narratives of the lives of his royal predecessors. The weary critic often envies that potentate, and in imagination wields with deadly effect that very conclusive scimitar.

Mr. Arkwright has wrought an ingenious tale of mystery; and, though it would certainly not have lost by compression, it is so naturally evolved that the reader will not be likely to grudge the occasional amplifications in which the author indulges. The central complication is skilfully led up to, and knot by knot the difficult tangle of the skein which enmeshes Harry Collingwood's life is undone. If the actions of some of the personages of the tale be sometimes inconsistent, the characterisation is, in the main, excellent. As is almost invariably the case with stories of this kind, too much is made of the murder trial; but possibly the critic is wrong in supposing that the public is bored by these monotonous trials in fiction, which in nearly every instance read as though excerpted from a newspaper. It is the human emotion, the terrible significance to the implicated persons, that is of enthralling interest, and that should afford matter for the art of the narrator to work upon—not the glib oratory and caustic persiflage of opposing counsel, the mere commonplace routine of legal procedure. To those, however, who obtain delight from the "mysterious murder and false accusation" kind of novel, The Queen Anne's Gate Mystery may be confidently recommended.

Mr. Walter Besant's new volume consists of three lengthy tales, which have already appeared as separate novelettes, so I need not now dwell upon them, save to say that To call Her Mine is almost, if not quite, as good as Katharine Regina, and that both are very distinctly better than Self or Bearer. Everyone now knows Mr. Besant's style, with all its virtues and vices: its pleasant ease, its vigour, its terseness, its uniformity, its lack of distinction, in a word, its mediocrity. There is a little too much of Man (with a big M) and of woman (with a small w) in this book, as elsewhere in his writings, and particularly in Katharine Regina; but much clap-trap sentiment may be forgiven a novelist who is in general so manly and downright, and ever the ready champion of chivalry and courage. This bulky volume should prove a real treasure-trove to those who welcome every word of the popular author of All Sorts and Conditions of Men.

None who may have read But yet a Woman will be likely to recall that story without pleasant memories. Prof. Hardy is a novelist who is also a literary artist. In the Wind of Destiny, as in the romance just alluded to, he proved that he possessed most, if not all, of the requirements of the writer who would win a reputation more durable than that of a season, or of a dozen seasons; and though his best known work is not without shortcomings—faults rather of tentative effort than of style or artistic judgment—its merits have undeniably raised high expectations. Passé Rose has come to justify these anticipations. It required courage and assurance to attempt a romance of life in the time of Charlemagne. The historical novel is at a low ebb. It is unpopular with the highly cultured reader, for it must almost inevitably annoy him with more or less gross and disillusionising anachronisms; it is wearisome to the mass of library subscribers, for it deals with episodes of no present significance and with personages of alien speech and manners; and it is of not very strong appeal even to those who love to have their wine of literature diluted with the water of instructive facts. No writer who has gained the ear of the public can afford to indulge in a historical romance unless he have very good ground indeed for his conviction that he can be weighed in the balance of public estimation and not be found wanting. It is all the more to Prof. Hardy's credit, therefore, that he has written a historical tale of the best class—a story that is as enthralling as the most exigent sensation-lover could fairly demand, and, in the main, as adequately depictive of the remote past as could be expected. In point of style, in delicate literary finish and strength of diction, no more able novel has reached us from America; indeed, it would be difficult to name any recent English production of the same class that could justly be compared with it. Passé Rose herself is a genuine creation. Anglo-Saxon fiction is the richer for this gracious and beautiful flower of a barbaric age. The epithet suggests one weakness in Prof. Hardy's book, for it is just this quality of barbarism that is lacking to his romance. He introduces barbaric colouring, it is true, and often with vivid effect; but in sentiment he is ever the very civilised modern man of culture. It is suggestive to consider how very differently the author of Salammbô would have treated this tale of the splendid, stirring, picturesque, cruel, chivalrous days of Charlemagne. We should have had more blood, the more frequent gleam of brazen shields in the light of whirled torches, the more frequent flash of swords and clamour of battle-cries; but, on the other hand, we should have had little of that delicate grace and beauty, that happy serenity, which distinguishes Passé Rose, and is so infinitely charming, and perhaps, after all, not less true to actuality. From first to last the story is thoroughly well-proportioned; not a page is unnecessary, not a sentence is prodigally expended. In a word, Passé Rose is at once a delightful—I might truthfully add, a fascinating—story and a work of art. As such it deserves a wide welcome; but, being a work of art, it will possibly fail to find many readers; and then—the author is living.

There is one very marked difference between Passé Rose and M. Georges Ohnet's new book, and that is the quality of style. It must be added, however, that I have read Dr. Rameau only in what seems to be the very accurate and spirited translation of Mrs. Cashel Hoey; possibly the original may be greatly superior, though, if this be so, Dr. Rameau must be a very unexpected advance upon Le Maître des Forges and its kindred. The story is a kind of French complement to Robert Elmore; much more artistically constructed, much more immediate in its appeal, though greatly inferior not only in style but in ethical significance and general impressiveness. The central motive is the enfranchisement of Dr. Rameau, through love and suffering, from the bondage of atheism; but students of humanity will be apt to be somewhat cynical as to the potency in real life of the means of conversion in the case of such a man as the celebrated physician, as depicted by M. Ohnet. In the hands of a skilled dramatic novelist, this story might have been wrought into a powerful and moving tale; as it is, it is probably the best production of one of the most popular of living French novelists. Dr. Rameau refuses to be won to religion by his beautiful wife, an ardent Spanish Catholic. Ultimately she is false to him; and, in the manner common to heretics as well as to the faithful, he visits the sin of the mother upon her innocent offspring. Finally he is brought to repentance, and becomes "a good man." This is but the baldest outline of a really very interesting story, but fortunately it is not upon its "religious" basis that it depends for its success. Mrs. Cashel Hoey's translation of Dr. Rameau should certainly be read by all who enjoy Ohnet's writings, but cannot do so in the original.

In these midsummer days, when nothing seems so desirable as indolence in leafy places or by cool waters, everyone likes to have a pleasant tale at hand—a tale that shall not be long and that shall enforce no mental exertion on the part of the reader. Those thus indolently inclined might with great advantage procure Prof. Minto's novelette, which fulfils the just mentioned requirements. Was She Good or Bad? cannot fairly be compared with its predecessors from the same pen. It is but a holiday entertainment for holiday folk. Neither in manner nor matter does it strike, or attempt to strike, any ambitious note; and if the critic cannot conscientiously hail it as a book of mark, he can at any rate praise it as an adroitly and happily written story of "confusions manifold."

It is not often that an Australian novel, an Australian romance by an Australian, is so well worth reprinting as Robbery under Arms. It is as picturesque and as true to the life it depicts as was Marcus Clarke's famous book, and in its descriptions of station and up-country scenes and incidents it is worthy of comparison with Geoffrey Hamlyn. The leading spirit is the celebrated "Starlight," the bushranger chief, whom Adam Lindsay Gordon has immortalised by an allusion in his lyric of "The Sick Stockrider"; but much of the charm of the romance is due to less obviously stirring themes. Possibly the book may prove too long, and the style just a degree too colloquial, to suit British readers as well as Colonials; but more probably it will prove a success here, as it has already done in Australia.

WILLIAM SHARP.

RECENT THEOLOGY.

The Diatessaron of Tatian: a Harmony of the Four Gospels compiled in the Third Quarter of the Second Century. Now first edited in an English Form, with Introduction and Appendices. By the Rev. Samuel Hemphill. (Hodder & Stoughton.) The Diatessaron of Tatian has been the subject of much learned discussion of late years; but there had been no attempt, until the appearance of this work, to reproduce the text in English, nor has there as yet been a translation of Zahn's learned monograph on the subject. Prof. Hemphill gives only the fragments preserved in Ephraem's commentary, as translated by Moesinger, without any attempt to supplement them from the other sources made use of by Zahn. He has, however, had the benefit of the Arabic Harmony, edited and translated by P. Augustinus Ciasca, for presentation among the jubilee offerings of Pope Leo XIII. last year; but this work—drawn from two MSS., of which an interesting account will be found in the introduction—owing to the revisions the text had evidently undergone between the fourth and the tenth centuries, is of much less critical importance than might have been expected, and Prof. Hemphill thinks it enough merely to indicate its contents by references to our canonical Gospels. There is no doubt, however, that it is Tatian's Diatessaron translated from the Syriac in the eleventh century, and it has a value of its own as an independent testimony to the scope and arrangement of Tatian's work. "The strong Curetonian element present in the Ephraem fragments seems to have been almost entirely eliminated," so that while the Arabic "probably represents Tatian's patchwork in its true proportions, and gives us a correct view of the arrangement of the evangelical narratives, it cannot be said to preserve the text which he used, or the curious and original turns which he gave to the work of the sacred writers. For these we must go back to the Ephraem fragments and the Gospel citations of Aphraates."

It is the use made of P. Ciasca's translation that gives its special value to the present work as a contribution to our knowledge of Tatian. Otherwise, Prof. Hemphill will readily admit it cannot compare in learning and thoroughness with Zahn's monograph; and especially must the absence of the fragments contained in the Homilies of Aphraates—"the only ones," the author himself remarks, "which do not come to us through the medium of a translation"—be regretted. Prof. Hemphill's excellent introduction, however, in which he gives a vivid sketch of "the man Tatian," and argues convincingly that his Harmony was written in Syria after his return to the East, deserves attention. Several appendices also contain valuable matter; and his work, upon the whole, is undoubtedly one to be gratefully received by students of early Christian literature.

The Classical Element in the New Testament considered as a Proof of its Genuineness. With an Appendix on the Oldest Authorities used in the Formation of the Canon. By Charles H. Hoole. (Macmillan.) Apart from any apologetic purpose, an investigation into the classical element in the New Testament, in competent hands, could not fail to prove instructive; but how far it would avail as evidence of the date or genuineness of any book may be doubtful. What inference, for example, could be drawn from the name Alexander, which is as old as Homer and in common use to-day, or from Damaris, which is not classical at all? Of course, these are extreme cases; but, unless the object is to show that the New Testament was not written at times to which no one ever referred it, very little can be learned from a name. In the present work the apologetic purpose is prominent, and the writer does not always leave the impression of dealing quite fairly with controverted points. This is particularly the case with his treatment of the chronological difficulties in Luke, under the names of "Lysanias" and "Quirinius," where he rather ignores than discusses the alleged discrepancies, without, however, making his own statement agree with the evangelist's. Again, he quotes the passage of Josephus referring to Christ without any intimation that its authenticity has been questioned; and in speaking of the Athenian inscription noticed in Acts, he tells his readers that Jerome does not cite it accurately, though the probability is that the inaccuracy is with Paul's reporter and not with Jerome, who had every motive to bring his version into agreement with that of St. Luke. Still, Mr. Hoole has done what is in many respects a useful work. He distributes the classical element under the following four heads: (1) the classical proper names, (2) the official titles and legal expressions, (3) the quotations from classical writers, (4) the inscriptions; and he deals separately with each. An appendix is added, which is also divided into four sections. It contains the earliest quotations from the New Testament, the passages mentioning Christianity in the classical writers, the chief authorities used in the formation of the canon, and specimens of spurious documents claiming to be of the first century. From the list of classical names we notice the omission of the Greek "Andrew," and from the passages mentioning Christianity the brief references to the Christians in Epictetus and M. Antoninus.

The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel and other Critical Essays. Selected from the Published Papers of the late Ezra Abbot. (Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.) By the death of Ezra Abbot, of Harvard, in 1884, the world lost a ripe Biblical scholar, and a textual critic of acknowledged accuracy, ability, and fairness. The present volume of Critical Essays, edited by his successor in the Bussey professorship of New Testament criticism and interpretation at Harvard, Dr. J. H. Thayer, shows him also to have been a man of extensive learning, and a keen, though always courteous, controversialist. The first paper, on the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, deals mainly with the external evidence, and more especially with one branch of that, namely the use of the Gospel by Justin Martyr. On this point the paper may be considered complete. The question, indeed, is now scarcely an open one. That Justin was acquainted with the Fourth Gospel is at present almost universally acknowledged; but this he might have been without acknowledging it as an apostolic work. Dr. Abbot, however, contends that it was included by Justin in his "Memoirs of the Apostles"; and his arguments on this behalf, and his replies to the objections of the author of Supernatural Religion and other hostile critics, are certainly of great weight, if not, as many will think, conclusive. But a yet more important paper, and one bearing on a question which is perhaps to a greater extent still sub lite, is that on the reading, "only-begotten God," in John i. 18. It seems strange indeed that so manifest an Arian gloss should have found defenders in our day, and not only so, but that it should have been welcomed as a bulwark of orthodoxy; but no doubt its introduction into their text by Profs. Westcott and Hort gave it a weight which it would not otherwise have possessed. Dr. Abbot subjects the whole of the evidence to an exhaustive analysis; and, having shown how utterly erroneous is the supposition, derived originally from Wetstein and taken on trust by one critic from another, that the reading θεός is supported by a great majority of the ancient fathers, both Greek and Latin, arrives at the conclusion that both the external and internal evidence, when fairly stated and weighed, is decidedly in favour of the reading υἱός. There are also learned critical discussions of other well-known disputed texts—"The church of God" in Acts xx. 28; "our great God and Saviour," or "the great God and our Saviour" (Tit. ii. 13); and a particularly full and able one on Romans ix. 5, in which the writer contends strongly for the interpretation which makes the concluding words a doxology. It is a curious misdirection of the odium theologicum, it may be noticed, to denounce this interpretation as a Socinian gloss, as the late Dean Burgon did; the fact being that it was expressly rejected by Socinus. These essays, of which we have only mentioned some of the more important, have all been published before, but many of them in periodicals difficult of access. It is a good thing to have them brought together in a form in which, it may be hoped, they will have some permanence. The book is a boon to Biblical scholarship.

Of the Imitation of Christ. By Thomas à Kempis. A Metrical Version. By Henry Carrington. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.) The appearance of a Metrical Version of the Imitation of Christ, following so soon after the edition of the book "in Rhythmic Sentences," which we have quite lately reviewed, is a significant fact. It shows that the book is being widely studied and used. And the authors of these two volumes will not have spent their labour in vain if they help to extend the influence of the book, fitted as it is (more than is usually recognised) for high and low, for men of culture and for the imperfectly educated alike. But the task which Mr. Carrington has set before himself is a difficult one. All translation, indeed, whether from one language into another, or from one style into another, requires special gifts. For the version to be really good, there must be a combination of exact accuracy, command of language, taste, and skill. But the task here has difficulties of its own. The subject is one requiring the utmost reverential care. And in the Imitation passages from Holy Scripture are continually embedded, which should, so far as possible, be retained in their exact form. And further, there is in the original work a peculiar rhythmic style, so that in several MSS. (as noticed in the ACADEMY of June 15), the name "Musica Ecclesiastica" was attached to the book. And this simpler rhythm is missed by the reader when the work is presented in a more systematically rhythmical form. How conscientiously Mr. Carrington endeavours to adhere to the original words may be seen by a single instance. It is taken from the opening of the second Book. The original passage, according to the prose translation published by Messrs. Rivingtons in 1864, is as follows:

"The Kingdom of God is within you," saith the Lord. Turn thee with thy whole heart unto the Lord, and forsake this wretched world; and thy soul shall find rest. Learn to despise outward things and to give thyself to things inward; and thou shalt perceive the Kingdom of God to be come in thee.

"For the Kingdom of God is peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," which is not given to the unholy.

"Christ will come unto thee, and show thee His own consolation, if thou prepare for Him a worthy mansion within thee."

In Mr. Carrington's version the passage is given thus:

"God's Kingdom is within you," saith the Word, Turn wholly heart and soul unto the Lord, And to this wretched world no longer cling; This peace and comfort to thy soul shall bring. All outward things condemn, the inward prize, Then shall God's Kingdom in thine heart arise. For peace, joy, comfort in the Holy Ghost, These constitute God's Kingdom, which is lost And forfeited by sinners. Christ will come And deign within thy heart to make His home, And all His consolation show, if there A fitting habitation thou prepare."

Where deviations do occur, this seems to us to be mainly owing to the exigencies of verse, and, still more, of rhyme. And it is owing to the same cause that, in some cases, the vigour of the original is not quite reproduced. We can well imagine the sense of pleasure and refreshment with which the author would turn from time to time from ministerial work to the task of re-casting the words of Thomas à Kempis into rhythmical form. And many, we think, will find a pleasant and profitable occupation in taking the original work, whether in the Latin or in one of the English editions, and comparing it with the rendering into verse which Mr. Carrington has produced. They will often meet in this work with short pointed passages which will imprint themselves on the memory from their rhythmical form, and so recall in their daily life the words of the original to their minds. The volume is beautifully printed.

The Church of Scotland in the Thirteenth Century: the Life and Times of David de Bernham, of St. Andrews (Bishop), A.D. 1239 to 1253, with a List of Churches dedicated by him, with Dates. By William Lockhart. (Blackwood.) The title of this book is very attractive. A picture at once graphic and accurate of the ecclesiastical life of Scotland in the thirteenth century would be very welcome. But Mr. Lockhart's work does not answer this description, and is, in truth, thoroughly unsatisfactory and disappointing. It surely adds nothing to the vividness of our conception of the thirteenth century, though it helps to elongate the attenuated matter which the author has in hand, to be told that in the thirteenth century

"the great battles of Bannockburn and Flodden Field had not been fought. Dante, Wickliff, Luther, Knox, Shakespeare, Galileo, Newton, Scott, Burns, and other illustrious individuals, were only to be names of the future; whilst as regards the physical sciences, and the applications of steam, magnetism" but why should we occupy space with a picture of what the thirteenth century was not? Of similar strain is a passage from a sermon of Venerable Bede to illustrate the kind of sermons preached in the thirteenth century! We have a summary sketch of the life of "Dominic, or St. Dominic, as he is sometimes called," as well as of "Francis, the founder of the Franciscan Order," who "became religious almost to insanity." We are also given information about "Albertus Magnus, or Albert the Great, as he is called," and various extracts are made from Mosheim. The only valuable pages of the book are simply transcribed bodily from the Pitaligo Press edition of De Bernham's Pontificale. Mr. Lockhart has written a book that affords in almost every page where he is original rich material for mockery. With what delight Dr. Maitland, the Lambeth Librarian, would have pounced upon this prey! But the world is now too busy to allow us to roll this deliberately like a sweet morsel under our tongue. We cannot in these days prolong our amusement, but must gulp it all down at once.

Our Inheritance: an Account of the Eucharistic Service in the First Three Centuries. By S. Baring Gould. (Skeffington.) This volume, though not without many meritorious features, will suffer the fate that commonly belongs to the attempt to occupy the middle space between the scientific and the popular. Mr. Baring Gould very modestly professes to aim at producing only a popular account (so far as any treatment of the subject can be popular) of the early forms of the Christian Liturgy; but there are several parts of the treatise that may be read with interest and advantage by those who have made a more particular study of the liturgical remains of Christian antiquity. In this country more especially few of our liturgical students have examined the relations between what we know of the Jewish temple and synagogue services and the forms of early Christian worship. Mr. Baring Gould will have done good service if he calls the attention of English scholars to the need of a more thorough investigation of this relationship. Mr. Baring Gould has been obviously "bitten," as other capable men before him have been, by "Hebrew parallelism," and cannot restrain himself from seeing "parallelism" as a substantial factor in the structural arrangement and literary style of the ancient liturgies. The acknowledged characteristic of Hebrew poetry may indeed have well had its influence upon the rhythmic beat of the elevated prose of the Hebrew liturgies, and also upon the early Christian services, if derived from the former; but Mr. Baring Gould will only bring his theory into contempt by such extravagancies as are propounded in chapter vi. Thus, it would seem, according to Mr. Baring Gould, that the events in the life of Jesus took place in a certain order in accordance with the principle of an "introverted parallelism." Though it would amuse our readers, it would occupy more space than it deserves to exhibit here the scheme by which Mr. Baring Gould attempts to make good his position. Unhappily, such a treatment of the subject cannot fail to throw suspicion upon the author's views on other matters. Has the preparation of twelve volumes of the Lives of the Saints unsettled Mr. Baring Gould's judgment and rendered him incapable of estimating evidence?

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS's health, though still precarious, is slowly improving. The stroke of paralysis which he suffered on Sunday last was not in itself dangerous; but his general health had for some time been bad, and his present condition is seriously complicated by several weaknesses. Nevertheless his doctor, Mr. Beard, seems not without hope of his complete recovery; and since his attack some of his friends, Mr. Holman Hunt and Mr. Hall Caine among others, have found him, notwithstanding relapses, in complete possession of his best powers. His new story, "Blind Love," lately begun in the Illustrated London News, and written within the last half year, shows all his old mastery of the art of exciting interest.

SIR W. W. HUNTER has undertaken to edit for the Clarendon Press a series of little monographs on Indian history, which are intended to occupy a position intermediate between personal biographies and formal chronicles of events. The general idea is that each volume should describe some important epoch in Indian history, treated from the point of view of the statesman who most impressed his individuality upon the period. For example, the rise and culmination of the Mughal Empire will be shown under Akbar; its decline and fall under Aurangzeb. The volume upon Dupleix will tell the story of the struggle between the English and the French for ascendancy; that on Mount Stuart Elphinstone will describe the settlement of Western India after the overthrow of the Mahratta confederation; that on Dalhousie the final consolidation of the Company's rule. It is hoped that some of the volumes will be ready for publication by the beginning of next year.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW will publish next week Englishmen in the French Revolution, by Mr. J. G. Alger, which is based upon much personal research among unpublished documents both at the Record Office and in Paris. Besides incorporating two articles that originally appeared in the Edinburgh Review, dealing with the early days of the Revolution and the Terror, chapters are added about the prisoners of war, the opening of Paris by the peace of Amiens, and the subsequent imprisonment of visitors in France by Napoleon. Attention has been given not only to spectators, deputations, and victims, but also to those writers who sympathised with the downfall of the ancien régime.

MR. JOHN S. FARMER, author of "Americanisms—Old and New," is now engaged upon a slang dictionary, which, both by its comprehensiveness and by its historical treatment, is intended to supersede all previous undertakings. It is described as a dictionary of the heterodox speech of all classes of society, from the publication of Harman's Caveat; or, Warning for Common Cursetors (1566) down to the present time. It will include the jargon of sport; the cant, patter, and flash phrases of the criminal and disreputable classes; and also the unwritten colloquialisms of society; the arts, industries, and professions. The method of treatment will be historical, giving first the etymology, and then illustrative quotations in chronological order, together with synonyms and foreign equivalents. The whole will form three volumes, handsomely printed on foolscap quarto; and it will be issued, in a limited edition of 500 copies, to subscribers only, who should address themselves to Mr. Farmer, 6 Arthur Street, London Bridge.

PREVIOUS to his departure for a tour in Australia, Prof. Wallace, of Edinburgh University, prepared a new edition of his Farm Live Stock of Great Britain, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Oliver & Boyd. The work has been entirely recast, is double the extent of the former edition, and is illustrated by 100 phototypes by Angerer & Göschl, of Vienna, from photographs taken from life of picked specimens of the various breeds of live stock in the British Isles.

A VOLUME entitled Blooms and Brambles: a Book of Verses, by Mr. Edgar Fawcett, of New York, is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock for early publication.

THE popularity of Walden has induced the publisher to add another of Thoreau's volumes to the "Camelot" series. A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers will appear on July 25, with an introduction by Mr. Will H. Dircks.

MESSRS. EGLINGTON & Co. will publish early in the autumn two new novels: A Romance of Posilipo, by Mrs. Thos. Woollaston White; and The Fatal Link, by Bevis Cane.

MR. BARSTOW will have ready in a few days two short stories by Mr. W. B. Wallace, entitled "The Clue of Ariadne" and "After Gaia," which will appear in a single volume.

IN continuation of his issue of Count Tolstoi's works, Mr. Walter Scott will publish at the end of this month Anna Karenina, in two volumes.

MAXWELL GRAY, author of "The Silence of Dean Maitland," has written a short story of Alpine adventure for Cassell's Saturday Journal, which will appear in the number published on July 17 under the title of "The Mysterious Guide."

MR. MACKENZIE BELL has written for the American Magazine of Poetry a popular article on Mr. Theodore Watts, to be prefixed to one of the amplest selections from his poems which has yet appeared.

THE Sun has this month passed into new hands, and will henceforth be issued by Mr. Alexander Gardner, of London and Paisley. With the commencement of a new volume in October, special features will be introduced; and at the same time will appear the opening chapters of Dr. George MacDonald's new story, which will be continued throughout the year, simultaneously with another serial by Miss E. M. Marsh, entitled "Her Golden Crown."

THE article, entitled "Some Economic Aspects of the Eight Hours' Movement," in the Westminster Review for this month, is by Mr. H. de B. Gibbins (of Wadham College, Oxford), who is at present engaged on a sketch of the Growth of English Industry for the Co-operative Annual.

THE Shah has honoured Mr. C. E. Wilson, sub-librarian at the Royal Academy of Arts, and lately University Teacher of Persian at Cambridge, by accepting a Persian poem composed by Mr. Wilson, which is printed in another column of the ACADEMY. The Grand Vazir, in a letter of acknowledgment, has informed Mr. Wilson that the Shah was pleased to express a high opinion of the merits of the poem.

MR. CHARLES EDWIN VAUGHAN, of Balliol College, Oxford—a nephew of Dean Vaughan—has been elected to the chair of English language and literature at the University College of South Wales, which is vacant by the appointment of Prof. Ker to succeed Mr. Henry Morley at University College, London.

THE death is announced of Mr. Franz Thimm, the well-known foreign bookseller of Brook Street, New Bond Street. Mr. Thimm was himself both an author and bibliographer. It is understood that he has left in MS. a continuation of his Shakespeariana from 1564 to 1871, and also large materials for a bibliography of Goethe. Mr. Thimm died on July 6, in the seventieth year of his age.

THE library of the late Mr. John Eglington Bailey, F.S.A., of Manchester, which realised over £2600, gave an opportunity for creditable displays of public spirit. Mr. Henry Bodington purchased the extensive collection of books on English shorthand, and has presented it to the Manchester Free Library. Messrs. Taylor, Garnett & Co., the proprietors of the Manchester Guardian, bought the splendid "Thomas Fuller collection" as a gift to the same institution; and various MSS. were obtained for presentation to the Chetham Library.

In the article on "Marlborough" in the Encyclopaedia Britannica it is said:

"For a year or two after the Restoration, John Churchill went to St. Paul's School, and there is a tradition that during this period he showed the bent of his taste by reading and re-reading Vegetius De Re Militari."

As a matter of fact, we believe that no actual proof has hitherto been produced even for the first of these statements. Mr. Gardiner, however, the chronicler of the school, was recently fortunate enough to discover contemporary evidence for it, as well as of a tradition not quite identical with the other. Among a collection of papers that have descended through private hands from Postlethwayte, high master from 1697 to 1713, he found a series of Latin speeches delivered by the captains of the school at the Apposition. In the speech for 1702 occurs the following passage:

"Hic Marlburus ab ipso Caesare Gallos domare et a Gallorum injuriis vicinas gentes tueri didicit."

MR. ROBERT BUCHANAN has issued in pamphlet form (George Redway) a letter addressed to the Home Secretary "concerning the proposed suppression of literature." By this he means the recent condemnation of Mr. Henry Vizetelly for publishing translations of certain novels of M. Zola. Putting aside the general issue—which involves some considerations that Mr. Buchanan seems to ignore—we gladly endorse Mr. Buchanan's generous tribute to the long list of services Mr. Vizetelly has rendered to literature in the past, as author, editor, journalist, artist, and—we do not shrink from adding—publisher.

THE new volume of the "Lotos Series" (Triibner) is entitled Essays on Men and Books: selected from the Earlier Writings of Lord Macaulay, with Critical Introduction and Notes by Dr. Alexander H. Japp. We cannot praise either the selection or the notes. The present volume, which is to be followed by a second, contains the essays on Clive, Milton, the first only of the two on Chatham and Byron; the second will give those on Warren Hastings, Bunyan, and Barère. Such a selection stands self-condemned, alike for what it joins together, for what it separates, for what it includes, and for what it omits. The notes are (fortunately) very few and very short; but space has been found for the portentous statement that Macaulay is wrong in describing Fort William as "lower down" the Hoogley than Chandernagore; while Macaulay's manifest mistake in saying that "Clive had advanced to Cossimbuzar" before the battle of Plassey is left uncorrected. Dr. Japp has further thought fit to omit certain passages in the essay on Milton, defending himself in the following remarkable sentence:

"We justify ourselves on such grounds for a few deletions: without which it strikes us that the Essay actually has more unity and completeness."

ON Monday last, July 8, a question was asked in the House of Commons concerning the exclusion of novelists (other than historical) from the benefits of the Civil List Pension Fund, in continuation of a correspondence on the subject conducted by the Incorporated Society of Authors, which was referred to in the ACADEMY of last week. In his reply, Mr. W. H. Smith quoted from the statute under which this fund is administered (1 Vict. c. 2, § 6):

"That the pensions which may hereafter be charged upon the Civil List revenues shall be granted to such persons only as have just claims on the royal beneficence, or who, by their personal service to the crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of their sovereign and the gratitude of their country."

Mr. Smith further stated that the "regulations" referred to would be more properly described as "notes of practice," made many years ago by private secretaries for the guidance of the minister responsible. He declined to make them public; but he summarised their purport as follows:

"In considering the claims of necessitous persons for pensions within the comparatively small amount at the disposal of the First Lord, regard is had to the nature of the services to the Sovereign and the country which constitute the ground on which the claim is based; and in respect to literature it has been held that those departments of study and research which add to the stock of knowledge, but which are frequently unremunerative to the writers, constitute a stronger claim on the bounty of the State than the authors of novels possess, who, while they contribute largely and most usefully to the recreation of the public, are believed, as a rule, to obtain a considerable pecuniary return for those labours if their works possess merit."

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Archaeological Review for July, which concludes the third volume, is a double number, consisting of no less than 138 pages; but this amount is obtained not by increasing the number of articles, but by augmenting their length. Mr. Cecil Smith, of the British Museum, continues the series entitled "Recent Archaeological Research," dealing with ancient Greece. Though he starts from Winkelmann, he treats the subject not so much as a chapter in the development of fine art, as supplying the materials for reconstructing the prehistoric contact of nations. In his view, the excavations of Schliemann have started a new era by revealing the Asiatic origin of the earliest Greek civilisation. In the list of books prefixed to the article it is noticeable that not one is by an English author, though Mr. Smith fully recognises the work of Prof. Ramsay, Mr. Petrie, and other English explorers. Of the other papers it is not easy to give a brief summary. Mr. O. E. Pell, who has before written on measures of land in Domesday, here seeks, with an elaborate array of tables, to bring under a single scheme all the standards of weight in ancient and modern times. Mr. G. L. Gomme concludes his essay on "Totemism in Britain," arguing that the greater part of the folklore associated with animals and plants is probably to be referred to the pre-Aryan inhabitants of the island. Mr. R. Brown, jun., summarises arguments that will be familiar to readers of the ACADEMY in favour of his theory that the Etruscan numerals are explicable from other "Turanian" languages, though he modestly disclaims all pretension to have solved the Etruscan problem. Finally, the fullness of the index deserves a word of praise.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHAUCER'S "COMPLAINT TO HIS LADY."

Cambridge: July 9, 1889.

In my edition of Chaucer's Minor Poems, I printed a piece which I called "A Complaint to his Lady," and I claimed this for Chaucer.

Dr. Furnivall has made a most interesting discovery, which goes far to confirm this. It is a great pleasure to me to find that I had claimed this piece for Chaucer only last year, and already further evidence has turned up. I think this should beget confidence in my judgment.

Dr. Furnivall's discovery is that there is a second MS. copy of this poem, in MS. Phillipps 9053. It has an additional stanza; and at the end of the poem is a remark which Dr. Furnivall reads as "dan Chaucer Lauceire" (?) the last word being doubtful. We take the right reading to be "dan Chaucer Lantour"—i.e., l'autour, the author. But whether this be so or not, the fact remains that here is MS. authority for attributing the piece to Chaucer; his name is legible, at any rate.

I have already said (Pref., p. xlvii.), that the poem might be incomplete in MS. Harl. 78. Here, again, I was right. Chaucer's name is not at the end of that copy, precisely because the copy is incomplete. The poem is attributed to Chaucer by Shirley and by Stow, as I have already said. Stow's testimony is worthless, but Shirley's, as we know, is of great value.

I am sure readers will be glad to see the newly-found last stanza. Ten unknown lines by Chaucer do not turn up every day.

The spelling of the MS. is so bad that I amend it as below. The first line is No. 124.

But I my lyf and deeth to yow obeye,
 And with right buxom herte I holly preye,
 As [is] your moste plesure, so doth by' me;
 Wel lever is me lyken yow, and deye,
 Than for to anything or thenke or seye
 That mighte offenden yow in any tyme;
 And therefore, swete, rewe on my peynes smerte
 And of your grace granteth me som droppe,
 For elles may me laste blis ne hope,
 Ne dwelle inwith my trouble carful herte.

The MS. readings are as follows: 124, lif; deith; obey. 125, buxum hert holy I prey. 126, omit is; youre most. 127, For wele leuer. 128, thynk; say. 129, yow myght offenden. 130, smert. 131, grauntith. 132, ellis; last no blisse. 133, withyn; careful hert.

I may note that holly (with long o) is our "wholly"; and that inwith (common in Chaucer) is required instead of "within," in order to elide the final e of dwelle. Trouble is here an adjective, and means "troubled." It furnishes one of the internal evidences, being a Chaucerian form ("Clerkes Tale," E. 465).

Very interesting are two curious rimes. These are "by me," "tyme," as in the "Can. Yem. Tale," G. 1204; and "drope," "hope." The latter is quite right; for the o in Mod.

E. "hope" has been lengthened, and was originally short. The A.S. dropa, hopa, formed a perfect rime; and the two words rime together in Gower's Conf. Amantis, ed. Pauli, ii. 286.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

A RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR IN ENGLAND IN THE REIGN OF GEORGE II.

London: July 9, 1889.

Being a Reader in International Law at the Imperial University of Warsaw, and at present examining the documents relating to the mission of Prince Antioch Cantemir as Russian Ambassador in England from 1732 to 1738, I have found some letters written by Prince Cantemir which I believe to be hitherto quite unknown. Two of them I venture to send for publication in the ACADEMY, with some comments taken from unprinted sources in the Record Office and the British Museum.

"Prince Antioch Cantemir," writes Lord Harrington to the English Resident at St. Petersburg, "arrived here last week in the quality of the Czarina's Resident, and a day or two ago had his first audience of his Majesty, by whom he was received in a very gracious manner." The young prince was charged to obtain some able British officers for the reorganisation of the Russian Navy, which was falling into decay after the death of Peter the Great. Having agreed to that effect with a certain Capt. Mathews, he asked the Duke of Newcastle to procure the royal permission for Capt. Mathews to enter the service of the Russian Government.

"My Lord Duc,
 "Votre Excellence sans doute sera informé que j'ai eu la gracieuse permission du Roy d'engager deux officiers de la marine au service de l'Impératrice ma Souveraine. En conséquence je suis convenu avec M^r le Capitaine Mathews qu'il iroit à St. Petersburg pour y regler en personne ses conditions. Mais comme on lui a dit qu'il ne pouvoit prendre la service étrangere sans une permission du Roy par écrit il en avoit supplié My Lord Harrington [Harrington] qui partit sans le lui avoir obtenu. Je supplie donc Votre Excellence d'en supplier de ma part la Reine; et je ne doute pas que Sa Majesté n'aura point de difficulté de le lui accorder. Mon homme à ordre d'attendre les ordres de Votre Excellence dont je suis avec toute l'estime imaginable,

"My Lord Duc,

About this time the English ambassador at Constantinople, Lord Rinnoull, was intriguing against the Russian and Dutch courts, and was frequenting the company of the French minister.

"I am extremely sorry," writes the Duke of Newcastle [Holles] to Lord Kinnoull, "to be obliged to acquaint you that His Majesty has very lately received fresh complaints from the Imperial Russian and Dutch Ministers, Who all agree, that your whole conduct shews a manifest Partiality, in favor of France, and that the Consequences of it must at last be very hurtfull to the interests of the Imperial and Russian Courts."

For these instructions Prince A. Cantemir expressed his gratitude in the following letter:

These letters, short as they are, throw some light on the diplomatic relations between England and Russia in the first half of the eighteenth century.

B. ALEXANDRENKO.

SOME OBSCURE WORDS IN MIDDLE ENGLISH.

London: June 22, 1889.

In the romance of Alexander and Dindimus the word jaudewin (or jandewin) occurs as a contemptuous epithet applied to Jupiter in a passage in which the heathen gods are held up to ridicule. The same word is found (spelt jaudewyne) in a quotation given in Halliwell's dictionary, where it is applied, with other terms of abuse, to a Lollard. The word has not, so far as I know, hitherto been explained; Mätzner marks it as of unknown origin. I would point out that Littré gives Jean des vignes ("John of the vineyards") as meaning a bumpkin, a simpleton.

Gower, in the Confessio Amantis, vol. i., 230, has a good deal to say about "a craft which cleped is facrere." Mätzner explains this, with obvious correctness, as the art of dissimulation, but throws no light on the etymology. I think facrere is clearly faire croire, "make believe." Gower himself says, "And thus facrere maketh beleve."

The glossary to the Morte Arthure (E.E.T.S.) contains a supposed word eyne, explained as a narrow passage, with an etymological suggestion (A.S. engu) which is phonetically impossible. The fact is that eynis is an editorial misreading for eyuis, and the word is simply "eaves"—here used in its well-known sense, "edge of a wood." The n and the u in early English MSS. are often quite undistinguishable. Another instance of their confusion is the word enest, which occurs several times in the Cursor Mundi. It should be evest, the Anglo-Saxon æfest, malice.

In the glossary to the Alliterative Poems, edited by Dr. Morris, the word lysoun is explained as "trace," but no derivation is given. The passage says that the men of Sodom, struck blind by divine judgment, could find no lysoun of Lot's dwelling. I feel doubtful about the etymology, but would suggest the O.F. lusion, "shining," and render the word as "glimpse."

The word cury, cookery (as in the title of the well-known book "The Form of Cury"), is wrongly assigned by Mätzner to the Latin cura. In one of the translations of Higden the word appears as keveri, which is obviously from the Old French queu-x, cook. I have failed to find queuerie in Old French, but it probably existed. The word was apparently supposed by English writers to be derived from cura, as "cure" occurs in the Liber Curae Cocorum with the same sense.

In Stratmann's dictionary the words luc from the O.E. luc (neuter), a gift, offering, and laik from the O.N. leikr (masculine), play, sport, are treated as identical, though from the examples referred to it appears that the two remained distinct in sense. Similarly the (originally) strong verb laiken (rarely laken), to play, is treated as identical with the weak lāken, to offer, sacrifice, which is derived from lāc. I should be glad of further light on the mutual relations of these words. At present the view which appears to me the most probable is that they are all derived from the root lāk (as in the verb to like), which, I am inclined to think, must in Original Teutonic have had the two allied senses "to resemble" and "to please." On this view the etymological notion in O.E. lācan, to play, O.N. leikr, sport, Gothic laika, a dance, O.H.G. leih, music, would be that of taking pleasure (not of "leaping," as often supposed), while lāc, a gift, would mean "that which gives pleasure, propitiates." In O.E. the masc. lāc, the formal equivalent of O.N. leikr, seems to be represented only by the suffix -lāc, the modern -lock in wedlock. I do not think that the sense of this suffix is derived from the sense "play" (and certainly not from that of "offering"), but that it has reference to the root in the sense of "resemblance," as in the adjective like and the noun lie, body. The suffix -ledge in knowledge (M.E. cniwēlēche) is not formally identical with -lock and O.N. -leikr, but with the O.N. -leiki (the O.E. equivalent of which would be -lāra), and, perhaps, with the M.E. substantive lēche, appearance, pretence, which is plainly related in sense to the adjective like. It may be remarked that the O.E. lāc, medicine, which Bosworth treats as identical with lāc, "offering," and with the suffix -lāc, is from a different root. The phonology of this word is obscure, as the vowel would normally be æ. Perhaps the ā may be due to the confusion with lāc, offering, or to the influence of the verb lācian.

* In this place the letter is very much damaged.

THE TRIPARTITE LIFE OF ST. PATRICK.

Oxford: July 4, 1889.

With reference to the discussion recently carried on in the ACADEMY respecting the Rolls' edition of the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, I have lately taken occasion to consult the Bodleian MS., Rawl. B. 512. One result has been to find that, in my rash reliance on the published text, I aggravated the shortcomings of the transcriber. The following shows the extent to which I have unwittingly done him injustice:

Having got so far, I had the curiosity to turn back and collate the print with the opening folio of the MS. Life. The subjoined lists will be of comfort to students who cannot have the originals always at hand. To simplify them, I discriminate the Irish and Latin:

B. 488, a MS. . . which is now in the Bodleian library" (p. cxxviii). I had the MS. under my hand yesterday, and it struck me it would be of interest to put the matter to the test.

The foregoing comes not inopportunistically just now to offer fresh proof at first hand of the futility of striving to set up a dictatorship in the domain of Celtic philology.

Scripture Natural History: the Animals mentioned in the Bible. By Henry Chichester Hart. With many Illustrations. (Religious Tract Society.)

THIS is an excellent little work. It forms one of the interesting series of the society's "By-paths of Bible Knowledge," and is a suitable companion of the numerous other manuals of the same series written by competent scholars whose names are a sufficient guarantee for their high value.

Mr. Chichester Hart is the author of "A Naturalist's Journey to Sinai, Petra, and South Palestine," published in the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund

* The reading ni is quite plain. Two similar examples are found in aniberniam, next line but one (l. 30 of column); in occurs in Constantino[poli] (l. 29).

(October, 1885), itself a useful contribution to our knowledge of the natural history of those countries. Having had the advantage of a lengthened tour in Bible lands and with a familiarity with the works of other writers on Scriptural natural history, Mr. Hart has been able to give a succinct account of the various animals mentioned in the Bible.

The work consists of 225 pages. The different animals are treated in alphabetical order without any reference to their position in the animal kingdom; then follows a classified list of animals arranged in their scientific order, another list of Scripture references, and an index.

There are a few points in the book where, I think, it would be desirable either to correct or modify certain statements, and to this task I will confine myself. On the well-known passages (Prov. vi. 8; xxx. 25) about the ant said to lay up food in the summer for winter's sustenance, Mr. Hart remarks, "Such is, at least, the obvious implication contained in the text" (p. 15). The late Mr. Moggridge has clearly shown that some species of ants do lay up summer stores for winter use; at the same time there is nothing to prove that such storing-up properties are intended in the texts alluded to. It is not so much the foresight of the ant as its industry that is commended. Several commentators have failed to see this "obvious implication." On p. 18 we must ask, if it is "safe to conclude that Tarshish was the old name of Ceylon or some part of it," how can it be "possible for it to have been an intermediate trading-place which drew its supplies from India"? Surely, the dog-headed baboon, sacred to Thoth and common on the Egyptian monuments, is the Cynocephalus hamadryas, Lin., and not the Gelada Ruppellii (p. 19). The akhashteranim of Esther viii. 14 is not rendered "swift-steeds" in the Revised Version, but "used in the king's service"—i.e., "royal," probably from an old Persian word (p. 47). With regard to the camel being unknown to the early Egyptians because it is nowhere figured on the monuments, Mr. Hart follows Victor Heyn, who says that the camel was first introduced into Africa as late as the third century of the Christian era. It is not safe to speak positively on a subject where we have only negative evidence to deal with. Although no figure of the camel is known to occur on the monuments, there is at least one Egyptian word, Kamār (r=l), which most probably does denote this animal. Mr. Le Page Renouf has kindly given me all the extracts supposed to refer to the camel in Egyptian texts, from which I think it probable that this beast of burden was known to the old Egyptians; and this is in accord with the Biblical statements (see Gen. xii. 16; xxxvii. 25). Be this, however, as it may, is it not too much to say that the remarkable fact that the camel was not introduced into Africa until the third century of the Christian era is proved by the evidence we possess? (p. 51).*

* Since the above was written I have discovered an interesting passage in Strabo (Geogr. xvii. § 45, ed. Kramer) which clearly shows that the camel was known to the Egyptians and employed by them as a beast of burden in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus (born 309 B.C.), and doubtless long before his days. This King of Egypt opened a high road from Myos Hormus on the Red Sea,

* MS. form is hrt, with second down-stroke of r prolonged in a curve over t, and the straight horizontal line = n placed overhead.

Instead of Bos bubalus for the Indian "buffalo," I would suggest Bubalus bubalus, modern zoologists maintaining a generic distinction between Bos (ox) and Bubalus (buffalo) (p. 55). I think there can be no doubt that the rir Khalâmûth of Job vi. 6, notwithstanding the Jewish writers and the Targum, denotes not "the white of an egg," but the "juice of purslain"; the expression is definite, not used "merely to convey the idea of insipidity" generally, but specially that of purslain, according to an Arabic proverb, "more foolish [insipid] than purslain" (p. 62). Habba (p. 91) is not applied to the elephant in the Assyrian inscriptions; this error occurs also in Canon Tristram's Nat. Hist. of the Bible (p. 81). Abba is the Accadian name of the camel, and is equated with the Assyrian gammalu (Heb. gâmal) in the inscriptions. Mr. Hart does not approve of the reading of the Revised Version in Mat. xxiii. 24: "Strain out a gnat." The idea, he says, is "that of making an effort or straining at the act of swallowing things" (p. 114); but how can one possibly get this throat-choking idea from the Greek verb δωλίζω "to filter"? In Psalm xlv. 8, "out of the ivory palaces," &c., palaces are interpreted as meaning "some sort of boxes or chests inlaid and veneered with ivory" (p. 92); but surely hékâl cannot have the meaning of "a box." The rendering of the Revised Version seems the correct one—"Out of ivory palaces strunged instruments [minni] have made thee glad." The 'alûkâh of Prov. xxx. 15 probably denotes some vampire-like monster, such as the ghoul of The Arabian Nights; and this explanation should have been mentioned, although certainly something may be said in favour of the horse-leech (p. 133). The fable that the pelican opened its breast with its beak and "fed its young with its own blood, which seemed to derive support from the red tip of the end of the bill" (p. 177), did not originally refer to the aquatic pelican, but to the vulture; and the "life-rendering" pelican as an emblem of the Christian Church is almost always figured as a vulture or an eagle. "The sea-monsters that draw out the breast and give suck to their young" (Lam. iv. 3) refer to jackals (Heb. tannim, the true reading), and not to any air-breaking aquatic mammal (p. 220). The Revised Version has the correct translation.

I have noticed the following errata: "Gypoëtus" instead of "Gypaëtus"; "Chysoëtus" for "Chrysaëtus" (p. 88); "Circocëtus" for "Circæstus" (p. 90); "bubalcus" for "bubulcus" (p. 125); "Sir E. Tennant" for "Tennent" (p. 174); "Dr. Brehm" instead of "Dr. Brehm" (p. 178); "selao" for "selao" (p. 181); "ammodytes" for "ammodytes" (p. 192); on p. 196 read "Josh. vi. 4"; and, on p. 210, read "rupes-tris" instead of "rupertris."

across the desert, to Ooptos on the Nile, which continued for ages the route by which Indian and Arabian merchandise was conveyed to Alexandria. "Formerly," says Strabo, i. e., before the time of Philadelphus, "the camel-merchants [οἱ καμηλο-ἐμποροί, i. e., those who carried their goods on camels] travelled by night, directing their course by the stars, and, like sailors, carried their water with them; but now reservoirs [ὄρεα] are provided and deep wells sunk," &c.

I repeat that Mr. Hart's volume is much to be commended; and I hope that it will soon reach a second edition, then the few errata can be corrected, and the suggestions I have here made be considered.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TEUTONIC KINSHIP OF THE SCYTHIANS.

Settlington Rectory, York: July 8, 1890.

It may be admitted that the Scythian name has been applied by ancient writers to Teutonic tribes; but it by no means follows, as Mr. Karl Blind contends, that all Scythians were Teutons. Pliny (N.H. iv. 25 [12]) was clearly conscious that the Scythian name, prisca illa appellatio, was loosely used; and Orosius reckons Alans, Huns, and Goths, among the Scythian tribes.

We must not look for scientific ethnological precision in early geographers; and the true solution of the controversies as to the ethnic affinities of the Scythians seems to be that the term was used either geographically, or as an equivalent of what we should call "nomads," and included tribes some of which were Iranian, others Turkic, Mongolic, Slavic, or Teutonic. Similar fruitless discussions as to the ethnic affinities of the Pelasgi are now abandoned in favour of the generally admitted conclusion that the word was loosely used by classical writers as an equivalent of what we should call the "aborigines" or the "ancients." Similarly, "Moor" meant merely a dark man; "Indian" the natives of Brazil, Chili, Cuba, or Virginia; and the word "nigger" is now popularly applied to negroes, Parsees, Hindus, Dravidians, Papuans, and Australians.

OBITUARY.

ARTHUR AMIAUD.

It is with a shock of pain and surprise that I have heard of the death of M. Arthur Amiaud, which took place at Paris on May 30. M. Amiaud was a rising orientalist whose Assyriological works had already placed him in the first rank of Assyrian scholars. A pupil of Prof. Oppert, he had devoted himself, like his master, to the decipherment of the early Accado-Sumerian monuments of Telloh; and it is in great measure to his labours that we owe our present knowledge of these interesting texts. His translations of them are being published in the new series of Records of the Past, which I am editing for Messrs. Bagster & Sons, and I received the last instalment of them from him only a few days before his death. His introduction to the translations in the first volume of the new series is a masterpiece of sound learning and judicious insight. M. Amiaud's death was hastened by overwork. Like his illustrious fellow-countryman, François Lenormant, whose loss is still deplored by oriental archaeology, he endeavoured to compress too much into the narrow compass of a young man's life. The knowledge that has perished with him can be appreciated only by those who have worked in the same fields of research. To the study of the language and monuments of pre-Semitic Chaldea his untimely death is a severe blow.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE annual general meeting of the Marine Biological Association was held in the rooms of the Royal Society on June 26. In the absence of Prof. Huxley, the chair was taken by Sir

E. Bowman; and there were present, among others, Lord Walsingham, Prof. Flower, Prof. E. Ray Lankester, Admiral Sir Erasmus Ommanney, Mr. Gassiot, and Mr. Crisp. The report of the council shows that a most satisfactory amount of work has been done at Plymouth since the laboratory was opened at the end of June last year. Studies on various matters connected with the fishing industry are being carried on under the instructions of the council—the most important being the study of the life-history of the common sole, by Mr. Cunningham, and an investigation on the sense-organs of fishes, by Mr. Bateson, which it is expected will throw new light on the bait question. Other naturalists, among whom Mr. Weldon may be specially mentioned, have utilised the laboratory for carrying on independent biological researches, and much valuable work is being done. The director (Mr. Bourne) reports that the arrangements at the laboratory are very satisfactory, and that the arrangements for the circulation of sea-water in the aquarium have worked well during the year. A substantial increase has been made in the library, a complete set of the Challenger publications, presented by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, being the most noticeable additions to its shelves. With one exception, the officers, vice-presidents, and council are the same as last year. Mr. Crisp has been compelled by increasing pressure of work to resign the post of hon. treasurer, which he has held with so much profit to the association since its foundation. His place is taken by Mr. E. L. Beckwith, formerly a prime warden of the Fishmongers' Company; and Mr. Crisp retires to the council vice Mr. W. Caine.

In connexion with this subject, we may mention that Prof. E. Ray Lankester, the hon. secretary of the Marine Biological Association, has just republished (Churchill), in handsome quarto form, with lithographed plates, two memoirs on Rhabdopleura and Amphioxus, which originally appeared in the Quarterly Journal of Microscopic Science; and that the July number of the English Illustrated Magazine contains a popular account of the St. Andrews marine laboratory, by Mr. E. E. Prince.

THE tenth session of the "Congrès International d'Archéologie préhistorique" will be held in Paris, commencing on August 19. The meetings will take place in the Collège de France, under the presidency of Prof. A. De Quatrefages. Eight subjects are formally proposed for discussion, dealing chiefly with quaternary man. Englishmen desirous of joining the congress should send the fee of twelve francs to the treasurer, the Baron de Baye, 58, Avenue de la Grande-Armée, Paris.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

WE quote the following from the July number of the Babylonian and Oriental Record (David Nutt):

"There is at last, it appears, a probability of some valuable light being thrown upon the decipherment of the Hittite hieroglyphs. The sculptured remains found by Mr. O. Puchstein at Sinjerli in Western Armenia are accompanied by bilingual inscriptions in cuneiform and hieroglyphic characters. The smaller monuments have been removed to Berlin, and casts of the larger ones have been taken; and the inscriptions are being studied by the German Assyriologists. The script of the cuneiform texts approaches that of the Cappadocian tablets discovered by Prof. Ramsay at Kaisariyeh, thus confirming the view expressed by Prof. Sayce and Mr. Boscawen that in these inscriptions we have the remains of one branch at least of the Hittite language. There are, no doubt, other places in Asia Minor where such bilingual monuments exist; and it is to be hoped that diligent search will be made for them."

THE current numbers of two German periodicals (the Berliner Philologische Wochenschrift and Lehrproben und Lehrgänge) contain notices of Prof. Sonnenschein's "Parallel Grammar" series. In the latter paper Dr. Hornemann, of Hanover, discusses the idea of parallel grammars in detail, and demands a similar series for German schools, expressing the highest approval of the methods followed in the English series. In the former Dr. F. Müller, of Salzwedel, reviewing the Latin Grammar alone, says that in clearness and accuracy it leaves "scarcely anything to be desired."

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

VICTORIA INSTITUTE.—(Annual Meeting, Monday, July 1)

SIR GEORGE STOKES, president, in the chair.—After the reading and adoption of the report, an address by Prof. Sayce was read by Dr. Wright. It gave a description of what has become known as to the conquests of Amenophis III., the palace and its archives, which have only lately been discovered, and which Prof. Sayce went last winter to investigate on the spot. Of the tablets and inscriptions, he said: "From them we learn that in the fifteenth century before our era—a century before the Exodus—active literary intercourse was going on throughout the civilised world of Western Asia, between Babylon and Egypt and the smaller states of Palestine, of Syria, of Mesopotamia, and even of Eastern Kappadokia. And this intercourse was carried on by means of the Babylonian language, and the complicated Babylonian script. This implies that, all over the civilised East, there were libraries and schools where the Babylonian language and literature were taught and learned. Babylonian, in fact, was as much the language of diplomacy and cultivated society as French has been in modern times, with the difference that, whereas it does not take long to learn to read French, the cuneiform syllabary required years of hard labour and attention before it could be acquired."—A vote of thanks was passed to Prof. Sayce for his address, to Dr. Wright for reading it, and to the president.

SIR GEORGE STOKES, president, in the chair.—Mr. Naville read a paper upon "The Historical Results of his Excavations at Bubastis." He reminded his audience of the interesting reference to the words of the Prophet Ezekiel as he stood by the river Chebar, reading the whole passage (xxx. 13-18), studied as it is throughout with names of the great Egyptian cities, Noph, Pathros, Zoan, Pelusium, the northern stronghold of Egypt, with Aven or Heliopolis and Bubastis last of all, and the topic of which he was chiefly to speak. Having again read the last of the six verses, "The young men of Aven and Pibeseth shall fall by the sword," he reminded his hearers that Heliopolis was well known, but where, he asked, is Pibeseth (Bubastis)? He then described the site which he has restored to history after a long night of gloom by such stubborn will and thorough success. He pitched his tent there, along with his friend Mr. Griffith, in the spring of 1887, and at once began the fruitful diggings. The first try showed the temple was not lost. There turned up hidden heaps of granite blocks and colossal columns, reminding him of what had been seen at Zoan by Mariette. It cost the winters of 1888 and 1889 to lay all bare. To assure themselves nothing was lost, they pulled down the heaps of stones piled up by the fall of the walls of the two halls. Rolling and turning every block gave them inscriptions and monuments invaluable. A granite shrine 200 yards long yielded fragments of Hathor's (the Egyptian Venus) head and shattered statues. The temple could be planned; it had four halls of different date. The first from the east, perhaps the oldest, was entered between two enormous columns, with palm capitals. Outside the door were two great Hyksos statues; one was now in the British Museum. Beyond was a second hall, also very archaic; since Osorkon II. it was named the Festive Hall in memory of a great sacred fête. Further west still was the most luxurious part of the temple; a hall propped on pillars, with lotus or palm leaf capitals, and on pillars capped by a finely-chiselled Hathor head; the best specimen is in the Boston Museum. The temple ended in a very large room, the largest area of the four. This was never finished, but at the end was Pasht's shrine; fragments are in the British Museum. Save Zoan, a city very like Bubastis, none in the Delta has yielded so many monuments, spanning so many centuries of such varying epochs from the great fourth dynasty down to the Ptolemies. Mr. Naville examined most carefully the colossal architraves on which the name of Ramses II. has been engraven in such utter obliteration of the rightful owners that it is often hopeless to restore the stolen property. Yet Mr. Naville has spared no pains to do so wherever it has been possible, and his triumphs in this way have been most cheering, and that in seemingly quite hopeless cases. They have helped to fill not only monumental gaps, but also many a blank left by our Greek and other literary sources. The contributions in this way furnished by Bubastis were simply marvellous. To show these and parallel successes Mr. Naville reviewed Manetho's thirty dynasties from the second, including the Pharaoh Sathenes, whose monumental escutcheon is preserved in the Oxford Museum, to the thirtieth, and even the Ptolemies, and beyond them to the Roman rule of Augustus.

FINE ART.

THE ART MAGAZINES.

THE experiment of giving a chromo-lithograph with art magazines is again tried this month by the Art Journal. The reproduction of Miss Maude Goodman's "Little Chrysanthemum" is pretty enough, but not so good as the omnipresent "Bubbles." We should advise that this class of illustration should be left to Messrs. Pears and the Christmas numbers. The most notable items in the letterpress are "Corot," by Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, who writes with a technical knowledge of the methods and aims of the modern school possessed by few critics; and the opinions of a French "artist of eminence" on the British Fine Art Section at the Paris Exhibition.

MR. ALFRED DAWSON is to be congratulated on his fine engraving, in the Portfolio, after the well-known Pieta by Francia in the National Gallery. The expressions of the heads are admirably preserved. There is not so much to say in praise of Mr. Cameron's etching of Perth. We observe that the Countess E. M. Cesaresco's interesting account of the Lake of Isco is illustrated with pretty little drawings by Mr. R. L. Seeley.

THE Magazine of Art has an etching after a picture by Mr. Tom Graham called "A Passing Salute." It has apparently taken two artists (Messrs. H. Massé and A. Withers) to complete this not very interesting plate. Some of the woodcuts are much better, as M. Jonnard's "Snake in the Grass" after Sir Joshua Reynolds, and those by Mr. Center in the article on "Current Art." The special feature of the number is an account of Prof. Herkomer's "Music Play," written and illustrated by himself; but Mr. J. M. Gray's account of John Brown, the Scotch artist (1752-1787), is of perhaps more permanent interest.

THE contest of cartoons between Michel Angelo and Leonardo da Vinci forms the subject of a study by M. Eugene Müntz now appearing in L'Art, which is otherwise mainly occupied by the International Exhibition. In the last number (603) Mr. G. de Lériss continues his papers on watercolour, and M. A. Hustin his on the painters of the century. A powerful etching by M. L. C. Penet, after a picture of an old woman making out an account, by Ribot, accompanies this number.

THE LONDON GROUP OF SECRETAN PICTURES.

THE group of pictures from the Secretan Collection which have come over to be sold in London on Saturday may be divided into three classes: Dutch pictures of the great Dutch epoch—the seventeenth century; French pictures of the period of Watteau; and French pictures that are wholly modern, the work of the so-called "Romanticists" of only the last generation. But as will readily be apparent, each class is represented by but a very few canvases.

There is noticeable among the Dutchmen—after an Isaac Ostade that is fairly luminous and beautiful—the work especially of Hobbema. This realistic painter of Dutch lowland scenery—of coppice, and marsh land, and wide-stretching plain—has here two pictures. One of them—"Landscape with Cattle and Figures"—was last in the San Donato collection. The figures are attributed to Adrian Van de Velde. The tone of the picture is on the whole brown; the landscape, in the main, wooded and marshy. The other Hobbema—"View of a Water Mill and adjoining Cottages"—is an extremely important example of the master. It was in the Hamilton Palace collection, and was among the "Cent Chefs d'Œuvre" shown in Paris a few years ago. Admirable and intricate as it undoubtedly must be pronounced in subject and in lighting, it is at bottom far less masterly than the great Hobbema—"The Avenue at Middelharnis"—which, through the wise purchase of the Peel collection, now many years since, adorns the National Gallery.

We pass to the French pictures. The earlier period—the period of Watteau—is represented by four examples of various size and quality from the hand of Watteau's daintiest but not most masculine follower, Jean Baptiste Pater. "A Camp Scene" (No. 1) shows how the painter followed his master in scenes of military life as well as in those of elegant junketings. It is full of action and vivacity. A second "Camp Scene" (No. 2)—showing some sixteen people, reposing, standing, or flirting, near the tents and the camp fire—is an equally tiny and an equally expressive panel. No. 3, though agreeable, is not so fine a picture as No. 4; but it is at all events what it calls itself—it is a true "Fête Champêtre." Whereas No. 4 is rather a bathing scene, in which the ladies are not unwilling to take light refreshment when they are but momentarily tired of the pool or the stream; or, it may be, are not unwilling to trifle with a favourite dog, or with each other or with their own beauties. The feeling of the artist and his dainty accomplishment are made manifest through every inch of this most characteristic work—never, perhaps, better than in the exquisite harmony of white and silver-grey in the incomplete attire of the plump young woman crawling up the bank from the water. And elsewhere there are the noble reds, the golden browns, the embrowned greys, of a painter whose vision of colour was almost as luxurious as it was refined.

With the examples of the modern French "Romanticists" we come upon an art not subtle and delicate like Pater's and Watteau's; but very often violent, very often self-assertive. The chief exception is to be found, of course, in the art of Millet—overrated, very likely, like the rest, but at all events reticent and self-possessed, and suggesting always a reserve of strength it makes no effort to display. "Le Vannier"—the winnow—(No. 15) proves easily enough, to the expert, Millet's never-obtruded knowledge, his refined sentiment of reality, his almost poetic yet never unveracious vision of the country life of every day. But there is a single Troyon—"The Heights of Suresnes" (No. 17)—which shows what "Le Vannier" after all does not quite show—a great man at his greatest. The light and shade fall first on brown and tawny and white cattle in the foreground; then on a reach of the Seine river, greenish-silver; on the many-arched bridge in middle distance; on the extended plain, and the smiling coeaux. Here, unquestionably, is Troyon at his very best—Troyon grappling successfully with a theme which would have taxed even Turner's art and have satisfied his ambition. With the Delacroixs and Décampes we come among that order of painting which, however brilliant particular examples of it may be, commends itself most to the unversed in the truest achievements of art—to the violent, whose temperament unfortunately incapacitates them from receiving art in its refinement; to the narrowly-informed, who are attracted by showiness and smartness and by the unremitting evidence of exuberant self-satisfaction. About Décampes and Delacroix much sturdy nonsense has of late been written. It will shortly, of course, be forgotten. Décampes's "Court-yard" (No. 12)—a scene with the rich and fierce light and the sombre shadows of the East—is as merely forcible as it is possible to be. It is, indeed, distinctly admirable in its own limited way. Delacroix, in "Christopher Columbus at the Monastery" (No. 13)—with the figures and the story somewhat unimportant against the impressive lighting of the white and blue wall—is at all events tolerable. In "The Giaour," however (No. 14), he is chiefly restless and self-assertive, theatric and sensational. Here, as often, Delacroix's violence of colour and action is unredeemed by beauty or by thought. A few people in England, and rather more in Scotland, just at present, are suffering from the fever of "Romanticism." They swallow the bad with the good. They mistake a disease for a revelation. Their malady will run its course; and those of soundest constitution will come back to us, clothed and in their right minds, and on the way, perhaps, to be ready for the reception of the more refined of English art—the art of Wilson and Turner, of David Cox and Dewint.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF PREHISTORIC TIME IN EUROPE.

Stockholm: July 6, 1889.

In the ACADEMY of June 15, Mr. Henry Bradley has had the kindness to speak in a friendly way of my book, The Civilisation of Sweden in Heathen Times, for which I thank him. There are only two points with respect to which I should like to make some remarks.

Mr. Bradley says, that "it is rather disappointing to find that the author's views as to the absolute chronology of the three great culture-periods—which differ very widely from the theories maintained by earlier authorities—are stated without the slightest indications of the nature of the grounds on which they are based."

Mr. Bradley certainly admits that it did not belong to the plan of my book to give more than the results of my researches into the prehistoric past of Sweden. It would have been quite another book had I tried to explain also the grounds on which these results are based.

As to the chronology, this was not necessary, because I had already given a full account of that important question in my work, Om tidbestämning inom bronsåldern med särskildt afseende på Skandinavien ("On the Chronology of the Bronze Age, with Special Reference to Scandinavia"; Stockholm, 1885). In The Civilisation of Sweden (p. 46) I refer to this work, of which a résumé, with all the plates, was published in the French review, Matériaux pour l'Histoire de l'Homme (March, 1886).

The chronology of the first iron age in Scandinavia—including the chronology of the runic inscriptions—I have treated in a paper on the age of the runes, inserted in the Review of the Society of Antiquaries of Sweden (Stockholm, 1887). A German translation of this paper was published in the eighteenth volume of the Archiv für Anthropologie (Brunswick, 1888).

Mr. Bradley says also that "a half millennium is the smallest measure of time with which prehistoric archaeology can at present reasonably attempt to deal." I hope that everyone who has taken notice of the above-mentioned papers will agree with me that a half millennium is not the smallest measure of time for the prehistoric archaeologist when treating the bronze and the iron ages. I think that half a century—or, for the more remote periods, one century—can be used as such a measure.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE Royal Historical and Archaeological Association of Ireland will hold a meeting at Limerick next week, beginning on Wednesday, July 17, and lasting for three days. Among the places to be visited is the ruined Dominican abbey of Kilmallock, with numerous altartombs (including that of the famous White Knight), all of which are now in a more or less dilapidated condition. Following the method previously adopted in several similar cases, the Association have had plans and a report prepared for the preservation of these ruins, and invite subscriptions to make up the sum of £50 required. We are glad to see that the number of candidates for election at this meeting of the association amounts to no less than seventy-five.

MR. HENRY BLACKBURN has issued (Chatto & Windus) an Illustrated Catalogue of the paintings, drawings, and sculpture in the British fine-art section of the Paris exhibition. If some of the finest works are not here represented, and if those that are seem familiar, the little volume nevertheless forms an interesting memorial of an interesting collection, and a worthy companion to the Catalogues Illustrés, of which Mr. Blackburn claims to be the inventor.

THE Armourers' and Braziers' Company have decided to hold in their hall in the City of London, in March next, an exhibition of modern armour and blades, and of art work in brass and other yellow metals. The object of the scheme is to encourage British craftsmen, apprentices, and designers to produce really first-rate work.

WE have received the Discurso of Dr. D. J. Vilanova y Piera on his reception into the Royal Academy of History in Madrid, with the reply of Cánovas del Castillo. The discourse of Signor Vilanova is on prehistoric or proto-historic Spain, and is an excellent summary of recent discoveries. The speaker maintains that there is no break between the mesolithic and neolithic periods, but a continual indigenous development, without any necessary intervention of foreign races.

* See a review of this book by Prof. G. Stephens in the ACADEMY of May 8, 1886.

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

MDME. SARAH BERNHARDT selected the part of Lena Despard in the French translation of Mr. Phillips's "As In a Looking Glass" as the character in which to re-appear in London on Tuesday night. It must suffice for the moment to say first that her reception was enthusiastic, that her art has lost not a jot of its reality, her method nothing of its flexibility and its force. And secondly, that the death-scene—in pleasing contrast with a death scene generally—was remarkable for its self-control and quietude of power. M. Berton was likewise well received. The programme for next week is sufficiently varied.

WE saw the other night, with a great deal of interest, "Jim the Penman" as it is now performed at the Shaftesbury Theatre, where the management of Mr. Willard and Mr. Lart has in it, seemingly, every element of stability. To begin with the thing which is not the most important—yet which has its importance, after all—the piece is admirably mounted: a succession of rich and thoroughly tasteful interiors pleasing the eye. As regards the play itself, it is, of course, late to criticise it in great detail; but the playgoer may be reminded that, while from its theme, and from the method selected to treat the theme, it lacks pure beauty of diction and the ready engagingness of comedy, "Jim the Penman" does, nevertheless, hold the spectator's attention from the first moment to the last. It is very strong in construction, and in its principal character it presents a sinner not wholly undeserving of sympathy—an erring mortal, indeed, instead of a demon. Coming to the cast of the play as it is given at the Shaftesbury, when one has said that the part of the ingénue is performed quite without distinction, one has pointed out the only weak spot; and—for we would by no means be too harsh—even that spot is never weak to the point of offensiveness. The three performances which live in the mind are those of Mr. Willard, Mr. Mackintosh, and Lady Monckton. Mr. Mackintosh is now seen for the first time. As the Baron Hardfeldt, he is a grimmer and perhaps even more potent ruffian than Mr. Beerbohm Tree. He is consummate in absence of conscience; rich in his capacity for iniquity. Lady Monckton gives, as she has always given, singular directness and reality to the sufferings and suspicions of the woman who has unwittingly espoused an expert in forgery. She is not here required to do what she did not long ago in "The Panel Picture"—go as near as possible to actually saving a play no human art could rescue from collapse; but she is none the less of infinite service. Still, the great performance of all is Mr. Willard's, which we like not because it is immediately striking—it does not take much for an actor of Mr. Willard's decisiveness and nervous force to be immediately striking—but because it is true to the very depths of the character he depicts, and is just as delicately artistic as it is convincing. In his dealings with his abandoned and tyrannical confederate, in his dealings with the daughter he is tender to, and the wife who is much to him, Jem Ralston, as Mr. Willard represents him, comports himself to the life. And Mr. Willard's death-scene is a lesson to very many of his fellow players—a lesson in reality and dignity. It is not long drawn out. The actor shows no sign of being loth to have done with it—of nursing and prolonging its every moment. It is impressive in its quietude, and, so to speak, in its ease. But the whole performance is remarkable, and this is but a worthy end to it.

"THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL" is irresistible; and it was as much from expectation of pleasure as from sense of duty that we spent an hour or two in watching what proved to be not a brilliant performance of it at the Vaudeville on Wednesday morning. The rehearsals seemed—in the case of one or two actors at least—to have been somewhat insufficient; and with one or two others again it was felt that something more than rehearsals—a change of personality as much as a change of method—was required for the perfecting of that which was amiss. The occasion was the matinée of Mrs. Horace Nevill (Miss Annie Rose). The lady—who is comely and spirited, but who wants, it seems, certain of the traditions—played Lady Teazle, and played it by no means badly. But the stage of the Vaudeville has seen, in its time, Lady Teazles gayer, lighter, more spontaneous. Still, the last need not be judged severely. The representative of Lady Sneerwell wanted “mellowness of sneer,” and the representative of Mrs. Candour had not quite the requisite amount of cordiality and gush. Maria was played prettily and earnestly by Miss May Woolgar Mellon. Among the men, he who was chiefly lacking was the Joseph Surface. This gentleman had no finish, and no subtlety. The Charles Surface of Mr. Fuller Mellish was no doubt a young performance. Still, it was elegant and sympathetic. There was in it the making of a good Charles Surface. The representatives of Crabtree and Backbite were somewhat rough. Mr. Fred Thorne's Sir Oliver and Mr. Maclean's Sir Peter Teazle were on the other hand sound and discreet performances, judicious in conception and ripe in method.

MR. EDWARD R. RUSSELL, the well-known editor of the Liverpool Daily Post, has just republished from his newspaper “Shakspeare as a Playwright” and “Macbeth Re-visited.” These are articles with all the conclusions of which we do not feel bound to agree, but they are at least things written with intelligence and knowledge as well as enthusiasm, Mr. Russell being undoubtedly among the closer students of the acted drama.

MUSIC.

VERDI'S “OTELLO” AT THE LYCEUM.

It is more than two years since Verdi's latest work was produced at La Scala, and now it is to Mr. M. L. Mayer that the English public is indebted for the performances of “Othello” now taking place at the Lyceum Theatre. Singers, chorus, band, conductor, scenery—everything has been brought from Milan except La Scala itself; and a theatre of that size is certainly necessary for a singer of such power as Signor Tamagno, and for the stage effects especially of the first and second acts.

The art work of Verdi may roughly be divided into two periods: to the former belong “Il Trovatore,” “La Traviata,” and other operas hujus generis; to the latter “Aida” and “Othello.” When, nearly eighteen years ago, “Aida” was given at Cairo, the composer was said, by certain critics, to have written that work under the influence of Wagner; and the same thing is now being repeated with regard to “Othello.” Anything that savours of personality in art is objectionable; and it would perhaps be better to note the simple fact that Verdi of late has shown a greater regard for dramatic truth, and a greater desire to make the orchestra play an important rôle in opera.

A composer depends for success to a very great extent upon his librettist, and in Arrigo Boito Verdi selected a man who understood what to do and how to do it. It is interesting to see how respectfully he has evolved an opera-book from the play of the dramatist.

Certain alterations were advisable, others necessary. A word of praise must also be said respecting the excellent English version of the late Dr. Hueffer. In many places he has been able to incorporate the actual words of Shakspeare. The first act opens with the landing of Othello at Cyprus. There is always something more or less conventional about the musical description of a storm; but there is a stroke of genius in the opening bars, when with terrific force the dominant discord of the eleventh strikes the ear. The prayer for the safety of the galley “that Venetia's fortunes carries,” and afterwards the jubilant shouts of the crowd, are graphically portrayed. In the “bonfire” chorus, the drinkin^g song of Iago, and the music during the fight between Montano and Cassio, there are many points worthy of mention; but the magnificent duet between Othello and Desdemona brings the act to an effective and dramatic close. Both here and in many other portions of the work the music reflects the meaning of the words and the movements of the actors; or, rather let us say, the various elements are not mechanically mixed, but really combined. In the second act Iago tempts Cassio to speak with Desdemona, and on the departure of the latter Iago gives us his “Credo”; and for this addition the librettist may well be excused, for the bitter words assigned to the Ancient have inspired the composer. The musical setting of “Credo” is indeed striking. In the ensuing dialogue between Othello and Iago there are some masterly touches, and the “Jealousy” theme with its consecutive fifths and octaves stands out with singular prominence. Boito, wishing to offer some marked contrast to the exciting scenes of the tragedy, here introduces a gift-offering procession of men, women, and children. They are seen at the back of the stage surrounding Desdemona in a garden which is separated from the front hall by glass doors. The light Volkslied choral music is suitably accompanied by guitars and mandolins. This forms a very pretty picture; and, owing to the glass partition, the voices have a soft, veiled sound. The “handkerchief” scene gives rise to a clever quartet. Then we have the furious rage of Othello and the devilish craft of Iago presented with terrible reality. The passage in which the latter describes the talking of Cassio in his sleep is a remarkable one. In the third act, Othello listens to the conversation between Iago and Cassio, but in this scene did not seem to us very impressive. The arrival of the ambassadors leads to a fine tableau, and the concerted music is skilful and imposing. As the curtain falls, Iago stands with his foot on the body of the prostrate Othello. In the last act, Desdemona sings her pathetic “Willow” song, and offers up a gentle prayer to the Virgin. The entry of Othello previous to the final catastrophe has already become famous for the mysterious passage for the double basses.

We have said nothing about the orchestration, one of the most notable features of the work. Not even in “Aida” has the composer displayed such genius. And this will, perhaps, be the best place to speak of the admirable playing of the Milanese orchestra under the direction of the world-famed conductor, Signor Faccio. Signora Catanéo, who made her first appearance in England, is more satisfactory as an actress than as a singer. She was heard at her best in some of the quiet passages in the love duet of the first, and in the prayer of the last act. When, however, she rose from her knees to acknowledge the ill-timed applause of the public, the whole charm of the scene was broken. Signor Tamagno (Othello) has a magnificent organ, though perhaps the quality of voice is not all that could be desired. Some of his high notes told with thrilling effect.

The impersonation of Iago by M. Maurel was, however, the chief feature of the performance. His singing was good, but his acting marvellous. His face is all movement, and he attracts as much attention when he stands listening as when he is actively engaged. We were, indeed, sorry to see so clever and intelligent an actor yield to the wishes of the public and repeat the soliloquy in the second act. The other rôles were in more or less competent hands. The choral singing was excellent.

The performance of the opera was, then, on the whole, one of exceptional merit. Amid so much that was new and attractive, it is difficult to say exactly what the future of this work will be. As given on Friday, July 5, it was undoubtedly a brilliant success; but when it has lost the éclat of novelty we fancy that, while in no whit inferior to “Aida” in dramatic interest, the music, with the exception of some special pages mentioned above, will be found less characteristic than that of the earlier work. Its qualities are at times negative rather than positive. And then, if we mistake not, the best comes first. The first two acts impressed us more than the last two.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE programme of the second concert of the Hyde Park Academy of Music, at Steinway Hall, last Thursday week, included some interesting choral music. Hofmann's clever Cantata, “Song of the Norns,” and selections from Signor Mancinelli's Oratorio, “Isaiah,” were sung in a most careful and intelligent manner. The voices are well trained; and the conductor, Mr. H. F. Frost, has a clear, decisive beat. The pianoforte solo of Miss C. Enriquez deserves mention.

MR. SIMS REEVES gave a concert at St. James's Hall on Saturday afternoon. The room was crowded; but this was by no means surprising, for the concert-giver had provided an unusually attractive programme. Mdlle. Marie van Zandt and Mdme. Antoinette Stirling, and Messrs. E. Lloyd, Ben Davies, and Foli contributed songs; and Mdlle. Hélène de Duncan, a young lady pianist from the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, made a very favourable début in some Chopin solos. But, in addition to all this, Mr. Henry Irving recited “The Dream of Eugene Aram,” and Mr. Toole amused the audience with “Trying a Magistrate.”

ON the same afternoon Mr. Max Heinrich, with the assistance of Herr Schönberger, gave a second concert at Prince's Hall, which was very successful. Miss Lena Little sang charmingly.

M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN gave a third Chopin recital at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon, and once more proved himself an admirable interpreter of the Polish composer's music. His rendering of the “Funeral March” Sonata was exceedingly fine. The A flat Ballade was given with wonderful finish and charm. We wonder what authority M. de Pachmann has for the added notes in the Etude in F Minor. The audience was most enthusiastic, and at the close of the performance the pianist was presented with a laurel wreath.

THE Richter series of concerts came to a close on Monday evening with a performance of Berlioz's “Faust.” Mrs. Mary Davies was the Margaret and Mr. E. Lloyd the Faust. Mr. Pierpoint sang the Brander music well; and Mr. Max Heinrich was exceedingly good in the part of Mephistopheles, though, perhaps, a trifle tame. The choir left much to desire, but the orchestral playing was very fine. The conductor was much applauded at the close.

THE performance of Hermann Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," by the pupils of the Royal College of Music, at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, on Wednesday afternoon, deserves special mention. Sir George Grove and Dr. Stanford may be congratulated on selecting a work which, since its production by the Carl Rosa company in 1880, has been singularly neglected. It may be that the piece is more remarkable for lyric charm than for dramatic power, but it is full of interest. The performance was one of considerable excellence. Miss E. Davies (Katherine) and Miss M. Davies (Bianca) sang and acted exceedingly well. The former shows aptitude for the stage, and the latter has a pleasing voice. Mr. L. Pringle was very successful as Hortensio. The Petruchio (Mr. J. Sandbrook) and the Baptista (Mr. C. J. Magrath) also did well. The choral singing was bright and tuneful, and the general ensemble good. Dr. Villiers Stanford conducted the performance with his usual care and intelligence.

LITERATURE.

FRANCE AND THE FOUNDATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Histoire de la Participation de la France à l'Établissement des États-Unis d'Amérique. Correspondance Diplomatique et Documents. Par Henri Doniol. (Paris: Imprimerie Nationale.)

THIS book is one of that class whose scale and outward appearance may well excite the envy of English historical students. The object and scope of the work is clearly set out in the preface: "L'œuvre accomplie par le cabinet Maurepas d'abaisser la Grande Bretagne en assurant le triomphe de l'insurrection des États-Unis n'a pas encore eu l'historien." M. Doniol in this work, not yet complete, aims at supplying the want. He also aims, so he tells us in the same preface, at clearing the subject from a delusion which has hitherto obscured it, "la légende de La Fayette." "La légende c'est La Fayette entraînant subitement tout le monde en se jetant en mer au mois d'avril 1777; c'est l'élan qu'il suscita obligeant soudain à tout concéder et à tout résoudre." French intervention, M. Doniol points out—and his whole work illustrates the truth of his view—was not the act of any enthusiastic knight-errant or any theoretical worshipper of human rights. It was the deliberately considered work of French statesmen—one may indeed say of one French statesman, Vergennes, who saw in the rebellion of the colonies an instrument which he could turn to the injury and even destruction of the hereditary enemy of France. At the same time it must be said that M. Doniol rather overrates the extent to which "the La Fayette legend" has found currency. No one could read the American diplomatic correspondence, edited by Mr. Jared Sparks, without coming to the same conclusion as M. Doniol. The same view is not merely accepted, but very clearly and emphatically set forth, by Mr. Lecky in those admirable chapters in which he deals with the War of Independence. What M. Doniol has done is not to unearth a new truth, but to illustrate it far more fully than had been within the reach of previous writers. He shows us not only the general result of Vergennes's diplomacy, but every stage by which that result was reached. Consequently, that part of his work which is most novel is hardly that which is most interesting to American or to English readers. We had already ample materials for following the dealings of Vergennes with the American commissioners, and for tracing the stages by which avowed sympathy and secret encouragement passed into open alliance. What this book does reveal is the succession of difficulties which beset Vergennes, and the patient determination with which he overcame them. To control the indiscretions of generous enthusiasts like La Fayette; of meaner partisans, half patriots, half intriguers, like Beaumarchais; to rouse a lethargic king, moving, as Hotspur has it, "a dish of skimmed milk with an honourable action"; to overcome the jealous suspicions, the irritable arrogance, and, it must be added, the regard for international equity, which kept back the Spanish court from cordial co-operation with France: these were the barriers to success which Vergennes had to break down. It is, indeed, on what may be called the European, as distinguished from the American, side that M. Doniol's work has most novelty and interest. One sees that the alliance with the colonies was only one incident of a complex drama wherein almost every European power played, or threatened to play, a part. This side of his subject M. Doniol has brought out with great clearness.

In some measure his book gives one the impression of having fallen between two stools. One hardly knows whether to regard it as a history or a magazine of documents. The amount of criticism and the extent of the connecting narrative makes it much more than the latter. Yet if it is to be regarded as a history, and judged by ordinary rules, it is overlaid with extracts from original authorities. It is, in fact, what the Narrative and Critical History of America is—an attempt to combine in one work a history and a collection of historical authorities. One result of this is that the order of thought is sometimes sacrificed to the order of time. It would have tended to greater clearness if the negotiations between France and Spain could have been treated more continuously. But it is only just to M. Doniol to say that, if the threads of his narrative sometimes cross one another unnecessarily, all is done that can be by clearness and precision of style to keep them distinct in the readers' mind.

Of moralising there is little in M. Doniol's work; yet that little is enough to show, what indeed is implied in the general tone of his work, approval and even admiration of Vergennes. "La justesse et la persistance y étaient, toutefois une grande probité aussi" (vol. i., p. 12). Is it mere English prejudice which makes it somewhat difficult to recognise the "grande probité"? Take M. Doniol's own account of the attitude of Vergennes in December 1776:

"Répondant à la communication officielle des succès du Général Howe, il ajoute à l'expression des banalités dont la diplomatie use dans les cas pareils tout ce que la préoccupation de ne pas découvrir la France pouvait dicter de protestations cherchées" (vol. ii., p. 107).

In a note on the very same page M. Doniol quotes the instruction given by Vergennes to De Noailles, the French ambassador in London. The London Chronicle had asserted that Silas Deane, one of the American agents in Paris, had been allowed to arm privateers in the French ports. De Noailles is instructed to contradict this: "Vous ne devez pas même hésiter de la qualifier de mensonge impudent et grossier." How did matters really stand? Earlier in the very same month, Deane was sending to a correspondent in America an invoice of arms, clothes, and ammunition for thirty thousand men and two hundred cannon, and asking, "Do you want heavy iron cannon, sea-officers of distinction, or ships? Your special orders will enable me to procure them." Was the French government so ill-informed that it knew nothing of these things, or so weak that it could not hinder them? But, in truth, the connivance with Deane's schemes was only the fulfilment of a policy which Vergennes had laid down more than a year before. In a memorial, drawn up, indeed, by another hand, but of which M. Doniol says—"Si un secrétaire écrit, c'est en réalité M. Vergennes qui parle," the French course of policy is very plainly announced.

"Il est donc essentiel que la France dirige dès à présent ses soins vers ce point de vue. Elle doit alimenter le courage et la persévérance des insurgés en les flattant de l'espoir d'une assistance efficace lorsque les circonstances le permettrait" (vol. i., p. 247).

A passage in a memorial written by Vergennes in 1777 illustrates, perhaps even more forcibly, the manner in which he understood the obligations of good faith.

"Il a été prudent dans le principe de n'administrer que des secours médiocres clandestins, et susceptibles d'être désavoués, lesquels pouvant suffire pour nourrir dans les Américains l'espoir d'une assistance plus relevante, et pour les affermir dans leurs principes de résistance. . . . Mais ce qui était prudent et suffisant dans le commencement deviendrait insuffisant et pernicieux si la France et l'Espagne n'adoptant pas une méthode plus analogue à la grandeur comme à leur intérêt, se contentaient d'assister sourdement et d'une manière étroite les Américains" (vol. ii., p. 462).

To deceive the representatives of a friendly power was undignified; that is all. The public morality of 1776 was far higher than that of 1689; but one cannot read Vergennes's despatches without being reminded of Macaulay's description of Avaux:

"One sentiment was to him in the place of religion and morality, a superstitious and intolerant devotion to the crown which he served. This sentiment pervades all his despatches, and gives colour to all his thoughts and words. Nothing that tended to promote the interests of the French monarchy seemed to him a crime. Indeed, he appears to have taken it for granted that not only Frenchmen, but all human beings, owed a natural allegiance to the House of Bourbon, and that whoever hesitated to sacrifice the happiness and freedom of his own native country to the glory of that house was a traitor."

In exactly this spirit Vergennes speaks of any attempt on the part of the colonists to make separate terms with England as "le plus noire des ingratitude." So, too, he formulates the whole duty of man: "Un bon François ne connaît de véritable intérêt que la gloire de son maître et la dignité de son couronne." It will, perhaps, be unjust to Vergennes's shrewdness to quote, as a like illustration of moral perversion, a passage in which he assures Franklin that "les Anglois l'important aussi éminemment sur nous par l'expérience de la mer et la science des manœuvres que nous l'importons sur eux par la noblesse et le disintéressement de nos vues" (vol. ii., p. 115). We may doubt whether Vergennes deceived himself. We may be very sure that he did not deceive the shrewd old citizen of the world to whom he wrote.

No doubt there was in France side by side with this, among such as La Fayette, a sympathy with men striving in the cause of freedom—a sympathy largely based on ignorant sentiment, largely tinged with the artificial classicality of the last century, yet real and generous. But it was the craft of the diplomatists, not the zeal of the enthusiasts, that determined the attitude of France. And almost every page of M. Doniol's work shows one how exclusively French diplomatists looked on the claims of America as an instrument for weakening England. They were firmly convinced that a reconciliation between England and her revolted colonies could only be cemented by a joint attack on France. It was far from being the wish of Vergennes that the colonies should receive their liberties in any way which did not exhaust and embarrass England. Thus, in February, 1777, he writes to the Spanish ambassador—"Nous sentons parfaitement tout l'avantage de la durée de cette guerre dont la prolongation heureuse ou malheureuse ne peut que contribuer à l'épuisement de l'Angleterre" (vol. ii., p. 179). In the same spirit he writes: "Ne nous en plaignons pas; ci n'est pas un spectacle affligeant pour les Deux couronnés de voir l'Angleterre se déchirer de ses propres mains" (ii., p. 36); and again, "Laissons les Anglois travailler eux mêmes à leur propre destruction" (ii., p. 248).

The policy of France assuredly answered its designed end in making the gulf between England and her revolted colonies impassable. In courting, even in accepting, the French alliance, the colonists were practically declaring that their position was changed. They were no longer discontented subjects with specified and limited grievances for which they needed redress. They were active belligerents, taking part with a power which was scheming for the invasion and detachment of Ireland, which did not shrink from the prospect of kindling a servile insurrection in the West Indies.

Such a work as that of M. Doniol, as a matter of course, abounds with subjects of incidental interest. Such, for instance, is that strange scheme for making the revolted colonies into a stadtholderate under the Count of Broglie—a scheme gravely entertained by Kalb, one of the chief French supporters of America. When we see how the follies of George III. had filled the Americans with a morbid dread and hatred of monarchy; how distasteful to them was even that amount of irresponsible power which was vested by the constitution in the president; how it needed all Washington's deserts and services, his unique position and more unique character, to overcome the scruples of his countrymen—we see how little the French partisans of America knew of the nation with which they were dealing. It is also an incidental illustration of like ignorance that Vergennes should have imagined that the two Adamsses, John and Samuel, were brothers.

Vergennes, indeed, had enough insight into the condition of the colonies to perceive the inevitable conflict of interests between north and south. But, at the same time, his deductions have been strangely falsified by events. A peaceful South dependent on commerce, an aggressive and belligerent North, was what he pictured to himself:

"Leurs intérêts ne sont pas plus uniformes que les climats sous lesquels les respirent. Le Sud et le Nord différent essentiellement; le premier foiblement peuplé, la culture y étant abandonnée à des nègres ne pouvant pas être régie par un esprit d'agrandissement et de conquête, le commerce doit être son principe et sa fin: les colonies du Nord peuvent être dirigées par des principes et des vues différents; un climat âpre, un sol pénible à féconder, une population abondante, effet de la frugalité et du travail, tout cela peut y porter l'esprit d'émigration et de conquête" (vol. ii., p. 466).

It hardly needs to be wise after the event to see the errors in Vergennes's estimate of the south. How could that oligarchy with its squirely tastes, its free wasteful outdoor life, its love of landed property, and its contempt for manual labour, become a trading community? Its industrial system was fatal to the development of any varied commerce. There was nothing in the habits of the people or the geographical conditions of the country to encourage the formation of cities.

M. Doniol, too, furnishes not a few vivid illustrations of the difficulties which beset the path of Washington. So full and decisive has been the verdict of history that it is difficult to imagine the time when a well-informed French envoy could write of Conway, Lee, and Miffling as the victims of personal intrigues set on foot by the jealousy of Washington. Yet such, it is plain, was the view of Gerard in 1778, though it was a view which a more familiar knowledge of American politics untaught him. Again, nothing could well have been more imbecile than the conduct of Sullivan and the other American generals who had to co-operate with D'Esterade. The inability of the French fleet to effect anything was mainly due to the incapacity of the colonists. Even if it had not been so it would have been clearly the wise course of the Americans, as far as might be, to take the blame on themselves; to do everything in their power to soothe the susceptibilities of a nation whose alliance was absolutely needful to them. Yet, instead, they attacked D'Esterade for his failure, and for the change of policy which it involved, with an acrimony which, with a man of more susceptible or jealous temper, might have been fatal to all future co-operation.

J. A. DOYLE.

An Exploration of Dartmoor and its Antiquities, with some Account of its Borders. By J. Lloyd W. Page. (Seeley.)

DARTMOOR is a fine place for a walking tour, and it can only be satisfactorily "done" on foot. You want a good stick, a good map (Mr. Page's is not a good one for the purpose—accurate, no doubt, but needing a microscope), a pocket-compass, a good pair of what Prof. Rolleston used to call "mountain legs," and boots free from those steel nails which are fatal to cliff-work. Thus provided, if you get clear weather (a big "if" in most seasons) you are independent of guides, Perrott of Chagford included, and need never fear being so piggy-led as to find yourself "stogged" by daylight or shelterless at nightfall. Of course the cyclist may see a good deal of the moor from the roads, several of which cut across its corners, while two—that from Tavistock to Ashburton, and that from Moreton Hampstead to Devonport—run right over it. Even the railroads, with their doublings and their viaducts (the Meldon, for instance, 160 feet above the West Okment), seem planned for the sight-seer's benefit. But this is only superficial work. To do the thing thoroughly you must cross bogs, and scramble among "clatters," and climb tors; and your best way will be to fix yourself either on the moor or in one of the villages on its immediate border. Very primitive these are, or were. In one they showed me a splendid wheelbarrow, the "Red Rover," provided by the squire's compassionate forethought to carry home those who on Saturday night were drunk and incapable. And very beautifully situated they all are; for the borders are far more picturesque than the moor itself. I always found them "stuffy" (they mostly lie low); but then I have only tried them in July, when the air is heavy almost everywhere. Princetown is a better place for one who means work and does not mind dreary surroundings. It offers the best of air, a good view, and a central position, within easy reach of Wishtman's Wood, of Great Mistor, and Stapleford, of Merivale Avenue, and of the less known avenues on Hartetor. And Dartmoor would repay a sojourn at a far worse place than the "Duchy" inn. It has two charms: it is sui generis, like Land's End, where you never think of asking yourself "are these cliffs as high as those I have seen elsewhere?"; and, like the Wicklow country and the Eifel, it is not on too large a scale for the foot-traveller. This is a great point. Of what part of the Scotch Highlands can you say it? Even in Connemara the distances are too great. Nay, on the Donegal coast, where more perfectly than elsewhere in the United Kingdom you catch the "two voices, one of the sea, one of the mountains," I fear if you eschewed cars you would have now and then a somewhat blank day. On Dartmoor, weather permitting, you are always within reach of something, and there is something to suit every taste; while, as for the tors, their "mural jointing" gives them a peculiar character. They are not a bit like the rock-masses in the Saxon Switzerland, nor like the Eifel craters (though volcanic ash, Mr. Page is careful to tell us, is found on Brent Tor)—like nothing save their brother "carns" whose battlements break the dreary monotony of the Cornish inland.

Over this interesting country Mr. Page is a very good guide. He knows every inch of it; and, without being a bit scientific, he points out everything, even the difference between granite and granulite. You would probably leave him at your inn; Baddeley's South Devon is a handier book. But if you patiently read him over-night, jotting down the places you mean to see next day, you will end by seeing everything. He makes, as everybody does, a few slips. A Westcountryman should not talk of whin (p. 81). London Bridge, I am almost sure, is not of Dartmoor granite, but of the syenite from Mount Sorrel. "Rogues' Harbour inn, on Brent Tor Down," where Salvation Yeo slew the king of the Gubbins, cannot be the same as "the Dartmoor inn on the slopes of Great Nodden" (p. 107), for this latter is north of Lydford, the place which Amyas Leigh and his party were making for from the south, when night overtook them. The spelling "Damnonii" is, I take it, a solecism; and why does Mr. Page call the "holed stones" dolmens? Dolmen is his "cromlech" (the cromlech is properly a stone circle). In Cornwall holed stones are maen-an-tol.

These, however, are trifles. On megalithic antiquities (of which he should have given a catalogue with sketch map) Mr. Page wisely abstains from dogmatizing; almost his sole assertion being that "cromlechs" were not universally covered in with earth. He sees that jew's (i.e., miner's) houses, Gubbins' huts, shepherd's shelters, and British dwellings, are wholly undistinguishable; all you can say is that nothing can be safely called British which is not close to a stone circle, or a trackway, or an avenue. He gives up the Druids. I wonder will they ever be restored as the kings have been whom Niebuhr deposed? Drew Steignton he names from one Drogo, who also (I believe) is accountable for Stanton Drew, the stone circle between Bristol and Bath.* Rockbasins he is convinced are due to weathering. How dare he quote Mrs. Bray after flinging to the winds her pet theory? No doubt some rock basins are wholly natural. You find them all over the millstone grit of the Derbyshire border. Glacial action, too, they say makes them whenever a little hard lump is left to be washed round and round in a soft place on the flat rock. The "pots" ("jingle pot," &c.) in the rocks near Settle have a similar origin. But, not having the Geologist for 1859 to refer to, I wish we had been told whether Mr. Drake had any other proof of the "basins" being artificial than that apocryphal story of the bullock, carved, along with a set of them, on the very hard Blackstone rock (p. 16). What a wicked mason that was who destroyed the said bullock, &c.! Too late even for "the Dartmoor Monuments' Protection Society" to do anything there, though there is plenty of other work for it to do, and though it should recommend quarriers to spare the most striking "clatters." Mr. Page laments the destruction thus wrought (p. 143). The Duchy might easily interfere with advantage to all concerned, for the "moor stone" (surface granite) is notoriously of poor quality, whereas by cutting a few inches below the turf good stone could be got without "selling the picturesque at so much per cubic yard." To return to rock basins. Natural they may be, but that is no reason why they were never touched up and used for religious purposes. In a review of Montelius's Civilisation of Sweden I read the other day (ACADEMY, June 15) that

"the cup-shaped hollows in the roof-stones of graves are called elf-mills and offerings are still secretly made in them, whether to or for the dead, or merely because of the name, is uncertain."†

* Does Stanton always mark such remains? At Stanton Harcourt are two menhirs marking the battle in which fell two British kings.

† Montelius notes that "the gallery graves are just like Lapps' dwellings, though the skulls found in them are mostly Teutonic." The question is: Do such galleries lead to a kist or set of kists or to a dolmen?

So with regard to stone circles and other megaliths, they are almost undoubtedly sepulchral. If any faith is to be put in Irish legends, this is proved from a multitude of megaliths of all kinds—e.g., by those round Carrowmore, co. Sligo, so well described by Col. Wood Martin. Here the fights of Moytura, &c., are traditionally connected with some of the most striking remains. The circles and avenues on Dartmoor we cannot connect with even a legendary chieftain. They may mark battles; more probably they are the burial-places of clans. This is one way of accounting for the enigmatic avenues. From Chûn Castle, near St. Just in Penwith, is an avenue (a very poor one compared with Merivale) to Chûn "Quoit," marking, perhaps, the funeral way. The Hartertor avenues, not far from Crazywell pool—"Dartmoor's one lake," Cranmere having ceased to deserve the name—end in a "pound," enclosing nine hut circles (p. 148). Between Scorhill and Tenworthy circles there is a distinct avenue over two miles long. I have sometimes wondered if the Merivale lines ever stretched to Dunna-ford "pound," which, now modernised into what the word usually imports, may once have surrounded a hut village. But the almost certainty that these megaliths mark burying-places surely makes it almost certain that they were also often used for sacrificial purposes. Arkites and serpent-worshippers, and Baal-priests and Druids (if you mean elaborately dressed gentlemen like him who figures in Sir F. Palgrave's History), may all be left to Mrs. Bray and the pre-diluvians; but still it is a fact that, with or without ritual, men "ate the offerings of the dead" beside or inside their forefathers' tombs. Mr. Page seems unwilling to admit this.

Into his guesses about Dartmoor names I will not pretend to follow him. The subject is one for experts like Prof. Rhys, who also could speak with authority on the inscribed stones (three in Tavistock), and whether they really show traces of Ogham writing. On the Cornish inscribed stones I do not remember that any Ogham has been suspected.* All I object to is making up a name piecemeal out of a Celtic and a Teutonic word. Nor do I think Bowerman (p. 219) can be vawr maen (big stone). In putting the adjective last the Celtic was more inflexible than the French. Of the pisgies (pixies) Mr. Page says disappointingly little. His folk's-tale about the eye salve is found in half-a-dozen forms in Irish fairy-lore, and may be read word for word in a Cornish collection, St. Ives taking the place of Moreton. He seems ashamed of believing in pisgies, quoting Brand, who says "puokes anciently signified little better than the devil." Yet he does appear to believe in the white bird of the Oxenham, whose place, close to South Zeal, lies on the north-eastern edge of the moor. And he cannot quite give up the Phenicians in Cornwall, though he will not say they came to Dartmoor. Of the Jews and their farming the tin, and whether they "streamed" or mined, and if they worked themselves, as in Cyprus, or hired labour, he tells nothing but the bare fact that they were there till their banishment in Edward I.'s time. It is a subject by itself; and yet there must be something about it for those who, like Prof. Thorold Rogers, know where to look and how.

But though he could not be expected to go into Anglo-Jewish history, Mr. Page might have given us better stories. His best he owes to Mr. Hawker, of Morwenstow, who used to say, "so honest are the moorfolk that only one Dartmoor farmer ever had any trouble in catching his beasts, and that was because they strayed into the middle of Cornwall and were found grazing under Bodmin Goal." The old old joke, "that Peter and Mary Tavy be summoned into court" was surely not worth recording. How much better to have given us something from Coaker, the Dartmoor postman-poet. He quotes one grim verse from Capern, postman-poet of Exmoor, about the yeth hounds hunting unchristened babies; and I am grateful for the extracts from the too much-neglected Carrington, but I should like to see a little of Coaker.

However, it is ungracious to pick out shortcomings in what is, as I said, in its way, a very thorough and practical book. Mr. Page will be an excellent companion of an evening, when one is not inclined to be over-exacting, least of all as to the meaning of Moorland names, or the genesis of rock-basins; and it is great praise to him that he has self-restraint enough to be suggestive, in the sense of leaving moot questions unanswered.

HENRY STUART FAGAN.

A Window in Thrums. By J. M. Barrie. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

UNLIKE most sequels, A Window in Thrums is a decided improvement upon Auld Licht Idylls. That is so, no doubt, because it is not so much the sequel as it is the complement of its predecessor. While Auld Licht Idylls was by no means devoid of a genuine appreciation of the pathetic side of lives spent in hard and dreary struggle (testa the story of Cree Queery and Mysie Drolly), humour was its note—humour both of the unconscious sort, which is displayed in accurate character-photography, and of the self-conscious kind, which takes the form of seeking for and exhibiting the bizarre, and of which there is an excess in that very clever but also somewhat artificial book, When a Man's Single. In A Window in Thrums, on the other hand, "the true pathos and sublime of human life"—unsung, scarcely wept, but silently honoured—stands first; its comedy occupies but a subordinate place. Not that this comedy is poor; on the contrary, Mr. Barrie's special gift as a humorist (I use "gift" advisedly) was never seen to better advantage than in some of the chapters in his new book, such as "The Power of Beauty," "A Humorist on his Calling," and "A Home for Geniuses." But the humour which is to be found here is but the lace—although it is what dressmakers and their devotees distinguish and gloat over as "real lace"—on the dress, it is not the dress itself. One is grateful to Tammas Haggart for occasionally putting in an appearance and correcting those of his friends who are not such authorities on Burns, Miltiades, or human nature generally, as himself. But it is not of Tammas Haggart that one thinks when he has laid down A Window in Thrums; it is of Hendry McQumpha, and Jess and Leebie, in the one-storey house, "whose white-washed walls, streaked with the discolouration that ruin leaves, look yellow when the snow comes"; of Joey killed twenty years ago; of Jamie in London, worse than dead to his parents; of "the awful ordeal which was gone through after the sweet untarnished soul of Jess had been given back to God." In no book, without exception, that I am acquainted with, is justice done so at once so amply, and so artistically as it is in A Window in Thrums to the life of the humble poor (who are also the moral aristocracy) of Scotland, with its not undignified reticence, its patient stoicism, its always high and often sweet delicacy, its mystic and generally inarticulate religion, which yet gives it homogeneity, and makes of it one long and "faithful prayer." It may be hoped that Mr. Barrie has closed the Thrums chapter of his literary career, even if he has not realised or idealised all his early experiences. He can hardly improve on this book. He might "fall away" like his own Jamie McQumpha.

Although A Window in Thrums may be read in instalments, like Auld Licht Idylls, and although there are chapters in it, like "Preparing for Company," "A Home for Geniuses," "A Humourist on his Calling," and "How Gavin Birse put it to Mag Lownie," which can be read and enjoyed apart from the book itself, yet, taken as a whole, it is most remarkable as indicating its author's capacity to write fiction—a capacity which was certainly not demonstrated by When a Man's Single. To all appearance there is no plot to speak of. Yet under all the humour, and pathos, and character-study of A Window in Thrums there runs a plot. Almost the moment one gets into Hendry McQumpha's house, one is conscious that some tragedy is in the distance; and after a chapter or two, a suspicion dawns on the mind that Jamie, Hendry's son, will in London come morally to grief. Poor Jimsy Duthie and his epic poem in twelve books the one original character in which is the devil, whose portrait "received the approval of the Auld Licht minister"; Gavin Birse, with his query, "Marget Lownie, I ha'e a solemn question to speir at ye, namely this, 'Will you, Marget Lownie, let me, Gavin Birse, aff?'; the home for geniuses, whose "superintendent would allow them one glass o' toddy every nicht, an' mix it himsel', but he would never let the keys o' the press, whaur he kept the drink, oot o' his hands"—the innumerable and tantalisingly quotable excellences of this book, so inadequately expressed by the phrase "good things," lead silently and inevitably as Fate up to the last chapter, where weak Jamie McQumpha, the excuse for whose sin against the clearest light is that "a woman has played the devil with his life," comes back to Thrums, to find the father, mother, and sister, whom he has neglected, all dead. The last chapter, in which Jamie appears quivering with Johnsonian, nay with Euripidean, remorse, is the best in A Window in Thrums; and I know nothing better of the kind in present-day fiction. Most earnestly is it to be hoped that a writer who has the faculty displayed in this book will not, like so many of his contemporaries, dissipate it in pot-boiling on a colossal scale.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

TWO VOLUMES OF CLARK'S "FOREIGN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY."

A New Commentary on Genesis. By Franz Delitzsch. Vol. I. Translated by Sophia Taylor.

A Manual of Biblical Archaeology. By C. F. Keil. Vol. II. Translated and edited by the Rev. Alex. Cusin. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

Nor long ago Major Conder proposed to convert critics who reject the traditional account of the authorship of the Pentateuch by setting them on camels. The camel corps of the gallant explorer seems likely to receive a new recruit in the person of Prof. Franz Delitzsch. In the introduction prefixed to the first volume of his New Commentary on Genesis this eminent Hebrew scholar tells us that "the Pentateuch, though coming down to us—so far as its foundation is concerned—from the days of Moses, is, as to its present form and final redaction, post-exilic" (p. 14).

Moreover it

"is composed from documentary sources of various dates and different kinds which critical analysis is able to recognise and distinguish from each other with more or less certainty" (p. 53);

the analysis adopted being in the main that of Wellhausen, although a more ancient origin, and, above all, a much higher historical value, are assigned to the different documents than that critic would agree to. The importance of this admission lies in the fact that Prof. Franz Delitzsch is a very orthodox theologian, and one who regards Genesis as being from a religious point of view the most important book in the Old Testament. Hence, while not claiming inspiration for the separate documents of which the Pentateuch is composed, he holds that those writings were worked up into a harmonious whole under the direction of a mental influence which may appropriately be called inspiration (p. 53). He sees that the historical truth of Genesis is radically incompatible with certain scientific theories widely accepted in the present day; but it is the theories, not the Scriptural narrative, that he gives up. His conservatism in this respect offers a singular contrast to the liberality of his views on Biblical criticism, and to the attitude ordinarily adopted by English theologians in dealing with the same subject. Many of our Broad Churchmen will read the following declaration with surprise and pain:

"If it were true that geology can follow back the age of the earth for myriads, nay millions of years (Lyellism), and that man was in the struggle for existence developed from the animal world (Darwinism), if in the place of the childlike innocence of the first-created pair we have to place the cannibalism of the half-brutal manhood of the stone period, and in that of the divine re-elevation of the fallen the gradual upward steps of self-culture during ten thousand years, then indeed, we admit it without reserve, the Christian view of the world is condemned as from henceforth untenable" (pp. 57-8).

Yet it remains doubtful how much of the Biblical narrative Prof. Delitzsch is prepared to uphold as historically true. He seems to admit that the chronology of Genesis is entirely artificial, or, in plainer language, fictitious. He has grave doubts about the alleged longevity of the antediluvians, though apparently unaware that Prof. Owen has proved it to be inconsistent with physiological laws; but he is prepared to concede them a lifetime of more than two centuries, since, "according to Riley, Prince Puckler, and others," that age is not uncommon in "the Arabian deserts of Africa" (p. 212). Perhaps the interior of the Antarctic continent may yield a crop of tricenarians, since, according to Herodotus, the most wonderful things are generally found at the extremities of the earth. Passing to the deluge, we are told that for the whole earth to be covered with water up to the highest mountain tops is "physically and geologically inconceivable." By "the whole earth" of the Biblical narrative we are to understand only the inhabited part, and by the inhabited part only Mesopotamia—a word traditionally comforting to the religious mind. But why, then, the necessity for an ark? Why could not Noah and his family have been saved, like Lot, by a timely flight from the scene of the coming catastrophe? And even admitting the incredible assumption that the human race had, during a period estimated on any reckoning at several centuries, not spread beyond the limits of a single narrow district, is it to be supposed that there was any single species of quadruped or bird similarly restricted in its range? Did ravens and pigeons in particular fly no further than the lower valley of the Euphrates? Prof. Delitzsch recommends an attitude towards the Holy Scripture that shall be "free but not frivolous" (p. 56). The word in the original is probably "frivol," the favourite epithet with orthodox Germans for the persons whom Dr. Wace and his kind call infidels. "Frivolous" in its proper English sense seems more appropriate to such evasions and subterfuges as this.

Although the English translation of Prof. Delitzsch's commentary has been made from what was practically a revised version of the original work, the proof-sheets themselves do not seem to have been submitted to his inspection, as sundry misprints occur in the German proper names, and in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew quotations. The translator, like many others of the same class, seems totally unpractised in the art of English composition, and even ignores its common courtesies by reproducing the unceremonious references of the original to "Henry Rawlinson" and "the Scotchman Rob. Smith" (pp. 353 and 368). Nor is servile literalism an invariable guarantee for accurate rendering. In one place we find it gravely stated that the Egyptian priests knew nothing about the mouth of the Nile (p. 130). In another we are told that "it was with the Kimmerians, who had returned from Thrace, that Asarhaddon came in collision about 675, and gained, in alliance with Asurbanipal, a great victory over the Gyges [sic] of Lydia about 662 (see Ed. Meyer, Gesch. i. 546)" (p. 308).

Prof. Delitzsch could not have written such nonsense as this. At any rate, what Meyer says is that Asarhaddon came into collision with the Kimmerians in 675; that these invading barbarians were defeated at some time later than 662 by Gyges, who was at that time the vassal of Asurbanipal, Asarhaddon's successor; but that Gyges, having subsequently thrown off his allegiance to the Assyrian king, was defeated and slain by the same irrepressible Kimmerians at some unspecified time. Again, we learn, à propos of Melchizedek's Salem, that there is "a village of Sâlim, which may be observed on the road from Nâbulus to Beisan after a ride of fifty German miles (Bâdeker, p. 231)" (p. 408). Commonsense might have suggested that the position of a place in a small country is not generally determined by stating that it is over 230 English miles from some other place; and on referring to Bâdeker we find that the distance in question is only fifty minutes. Prof. Delitzsch probably wrote 50 M., which the translator uncritically supposed to mean German miles.

Unlike Prof. Delitzsch, the late Dr. Keil was a traditionalist of the most unbending orthodoxy. He believed that the Deluge was absolutely universal; that the objections to the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch had been satisfactorily answered by Hengstenberg; that it is an open question whether demoniacal possession does not still occur. How far this point of view affects the value of his researches in Biblical archaeology was considered in a review of the translation of the first volume of his work on the subject which appeared in the ACADEMY of May 12, 1888. The criticisms there offered are applicable, though in a somewhat less degree, to the second and concluding volume, dealing as it does with subjects less open to controversy than the religious legislation of the Hebrews. Many among ourselves will perhaps regret to find that, according to Dr. Keil, not only was marriage with a deceased wife's sister permitted by the Levitical law, but marriage with a niece as well (pp. 159 and 162). In style Mr. Cusin's translation is greatly superior to that of his predecessors; but it detracts considerably from the usefulness of the work that he has simply transcribed the German and French equivalents for the Hebrew weights, measures, and coins given by Dr. Keil, instead of replacing them by their English equivalents. Our theological students are likely to know quite as much about talents, shekels, and cubits as about Paris grains, Dresden pounds, and Rhenish inches. In the few instances where English equivalents have been supplied, they seem to have been rather carelessly calculated. For instance, three-quarters of a German mile equal three and a half English miles, not four miles as here stated (p. 233); and on no reckoning does the Roman as equal "about 5 pounds" (p. 245). The expression in the original was probably "Pf."—the abridgment for Pfennige. But perhaps the printer may be to blame here.

ALFRED W. BENN.

The History of Wool and Wool-Combing. By James Burnley. (Sampson Low.)

MR. BURNLEY'S is not a "prentice hand" in the writing of industrial history, and he has an interesting topic in the woollen trade. Although the book is a large one, it is not quite so large as its title; for a really complete history of wool would need both a greater canvas and minuter details than Mr.

Burnley's book supplies. He has not even superseded his predecessors, Bischoff and James; but many things have happened since they wrote, and some of the more important of these many things Mr. Burnley has recorded in a clear and interesting fashion, and with an apparent mastery of the subject due to patient investigation and practical knowledge.

The book opens with chapters on "the raw material," on "wool and its uses in ancient times," on "the growth and vicissitudes of the wool industries." These, while perhaps sufficient for the general reader, are not at all exhaustive of the material. The fact is that the ancient history of wool has yet to be written in the spirit of scientific archaeology. It is with the fourth chapter that Mr. Burnley's real strength shows itself. After a lucid explanation of the manufacturing processes he sketches the successive inventions by which the woollen industry has been entirely transformed. The first impulse of change came from an unlikely quarter, and was due to the inventive genius of a doctor of divinity. Whatever may be thought of Cartwright as a poet or a theologian, there can be no doubt of his far-reaching genius as a mechanic. The natural result of the introduction of machinery was the decline and fall of hand combing and of the hand comber, and the transition was not accomplished without suffering and evil. After Cartwright came Josué Heilmann, another born inventor, whose complicated effects were produced by the conscious application of mechanical principles of remarkable simplicity. The method of Heilmann's wool-combing machine is indeed said to have been suggested to him by the sight of his daughter combing her long hair before the cottage mirror. Like so many other inventors, Heilmann did not live to enjoy the prosperity he helped to create. Simultaneously with his experiments, Mr. S. Cunliffe Lister and Mr. G. E. Donnisthorpe were at work; "and," says Mr. Burnley, "there is little doubt that they reached pretty much the same or equal results about the same time." This is just to all. The latest great name in the history of wool is that of Mr. Isaac Holden, M.P., of whose remarkable career Mr. Burnley has given a deeply interesting narrative. That the inventor of the lucifer match should be an active member of the present House of Commons is a statement that has an incredible sound. His great contribution to the wool-combing machine was the "square motion—viz., striking a fine comb into the beard near to the comb head, and at once pushing it away from it to avoid locking. 'The whole secret of the invention,' says Mr. Holden, 'lay in this discovery—the necessity of pushing away quickly, so simple at first sight, but difficult to conceive and appreciate at that early period; and, though so apparently simple, it was the result of much continued thought. This point being seen, the mechanical arrangement to do it was easy of application by cam or tappet by any ordinary mechanic, as is evident by the numerous modes of doing it which I afterwards patented.'"

There is an account of the "Noble Machine," which was, it is claimed, really an invention of Mr. Donnisthorpe's; and there is a list of the patented inventions used in England since the time of Cartwright. The chapter in which Mr. Burnley gives his own

"summaries, comparisons, and conclusions" as to the history of machine wool combing, from Cartwright's conception of its practicability to the present day, is the best in the book, and is written with judicial care. The illustrations consist of mechanical diagrams, portraits of Cartwright, Heilmann, Lister, Donnisthorpe, and Holden, and an engraving of Elmore's well-known picture of "Heilmann's Inspiration."

The mechanical details, which necessarily occupy a large share of Mr. Burnley's attention, will not have an equal attraction for all readers; but few who take up this handsome volume will fail to be interested by the story, not without romance of its own, of the enormous development and extension during the present century of one of the oldest of human arts and one of the earliest of British industries.

Lady Car is a new and good specimen of the improved work which has recently resulted from Mrs. Oliphant's reversion to the practice of writing short stories. In a one-volume book her besetting sin as a novelist—the sin of putting the reader off with an almost absolutely otiose second volume—is impossible, and her workmanlike faculties of construction and considerable, if recently somewhat monotonous, gift of character-observation have full play. Lady Car is a book both pathetic and amusing, though really Mrs. Oliphant is becoming too much of a Gratien du Pont reversed in the unmitigated blackness of her views of mankind, and especially of male-child-kind. The story "hitches on" to a former tale of her own and recounts the gradual disillusion and shocks by which Lady Car, who had apparently escaped from the storms of her first married life to the happy haven of a comfortable second marriage with her first love, is shattered until she, so to speak, goes down in port. The only point in which the novelist rather fails to enlist our sympathies is in her appeal that we shall share Lady Car's disappointment in her second husband. The poor man seems, by Mrs. Oliphant's own confession, to have been a gentleman, a man of tact and wit, exceedingly fond of his wife, very gentle and kind to her, tolerant of her cubs of children, and by no means injudicious in managing them. But his wife, it seems, began to be heartbroken because he, having planned a book on "Social Economy" in his silly youth, did not write it in his sensible middle age. Thus was one of the greatest negative benefits—the not-writing of rubbish, which nineteen books on social economy out of twenty must be by the law of things—requited! What poor Mr. Beaufort began with his virtue the children finished with their vices. Tom Torrance is perhaps a little too like Tom Gradgrind with a difference, but Mrs. Oliphant has been very successful in the picture of the cub unmitigated. His sister Janet is a more dubious study, but the way in which she, too, martyrises poor Lady Car is excellently drawn.

Some American novel readers, we believe, declare (perhaps speaking as foxes who have never succeeded in growing tails) that English novels about country houses are ipso facto unreadable. These stern persons will lose something if they decline Mr. Sturgis's book on the score of its title—which, by the way, for a wonder, happens to correspond with the contents. There is a love story, of course, but the country house is really the chief theme, and its occupants are interesting. Lord Hackbut, who denounces the democracy with sufficient vigour and most undeniable truth; Dora Rutherford, the young married woman who "frequently felt an inclination to scream but repressed it"; Mrs. Dormer, the elderly ditto, whose views as to women accompanying men on shooting parties will win the enthusiastic adhesion of all shooters—these are agreeable figures enough. The hero Archie, Lord Lorrilaire (why not Capillaire at once?), a young man newly promoted from ranching to vast estates, and extremely uncertain what to do with them and himself, is, in the main, an excellent fellow, though a very little of a prig. Many generations of the jeune premier have we known, from those young persons of Scott's—of whom Mr. Thackeray (acknowledging the impossibility of his wish) thought that he should like to be "mother-in-law to several of them"—downwards. But a poorer creature, on the whole, than the young man who cannot take the goods the gods provide him because he is not sure whether he is a Tory or a Liberal, and is uncertain about the rights and duties of property, never entered the head of novelist. We should like to be heirs to several such young men. Mr. Sturgis, however, to do him justice, has made his Archie much more manly than modern. The old-farce-tragedy of the virtuous young woman (Dora) trying to convert the unvirtuous young man (a certain Leonard Vale, and a very sorry scamp too) is brought in well enough as an episode; and there is a journalist named Radley Beck, who ought to be impossible, but, unluckily, is not. Archie once thought of cow-hiding Mr. Beck. It is a great pity that he did not do it.

We have, we think, read better books of Miss Carey's than The Search for Basil Lyndhurst. To begin with, there is too much of it. It wants (to use a metaphor which frequently occurs to the critic of novels) "squeezing out." In the second place, the search occupies too small a part of the book. In the third, the two deaths (for to that exorbitant extent does Miss Carey abuse the lady novelist's license to kill) which contribute the pathos are, the one quite unnecessary and the other rather disagreeable. Miss Carey is not the first person who has made her heroine devote herself in all good and honour to a husband and wife, making her also come in for the reversion when the wife is killed off. We hope we shall not be misunderstood if we say that this kind of waiting—even unconscious waiting—for dead women's shoes is only excused by a touch of passion which would do doubt shock Miss Carey. But the details of the book are better than the general scheme. Aline Lyndhurst, the unhappy wife, who is a kind of Lady of Burleigh with a curse of dipsomania on her, would be pathetic if she were less painful. The heroine, Olga Leigh, despite the rather unpleasant part she is made to play, is a pleasant girl, and deserved something better than her widower, who is not to us pleasant at all. It is perhaps worth noting that a good character in the book admired the Epic of Hades.

In Doctor Glennie's Daughter some fine old ingredients are mixed and served up once more not too pleasantly. Why the bad young man who wanted money misbehaved to Doctor Glennie's daughter, when not misbehaving to her would have made him a rich man; why the good young man married her in circumstances which he did not know, but which he must have been a very odd person not to find out; how Dr. Glennie, who is represented as a good old man, brought himself to palm off his daughter on the good young man: these are questions which would have to be answered before we could take much interest in the plot of the book, which is a dramatic rather than a literary plot. Other interest it has little or none; but Mr. Farjeon is a pretty sure workman for his own public, and, after all, that is not an inconsiderable thing.

The Open Door is that of suicide; and the question of the book is whether the hero, a young Austrian count, hopelessly crippled in a steeple-chase, will take advantage of it or not. It is needless to say what influence prevents him. The story has merits; but Miss Howard should have compressed it, and especially have remorselessly "cut" a great deal about a dog called Mousey. He is not an unamusing dog, and a little about him would have been welcome enough; but we have very much more than a little.

We quoted above a certain expression of American opinion about novels of a certain kind of English life. There is, we believe, reciprocity in this matter, some English readers, at any rate, declaring that they cannot away with the curious pictures of American town life—not in the great cities, which Miss Warner brought into fashion many years ago. Rachel Armstrong is one of these—an odd representation of a life which is neither familiar enough to have the interest of familiarity, nor exciting enough to have the interest of excitement. There is, however, a person in it, Virginia Howard—she is not the heroine—whom we rather like, and there is a slight sketch of a naughty bishop which is delightful. The bishop of American fancy, with touches of the Jesuit, temp. "Charlotte Elizabeth," is great fun.

Mr. Francis Francis's Mosquito: a Tale of the Mexican Frontier, contains some lively frontier sketches, illustrated by much cowboy anecdote, some of it new, and all of it spiritedly told. All this is good. The inspiration, however, which made Mr. Francis engraft this on a sort of Bret-Hartish (Mr. Bret Harte will not grudge us the adjective) story of a modern Ayacanora, with the poetry knocked out of her and cowboy prose substituted, and this, again, on a fragment of a Whyte-Melville novel of English life, is dubious. Few English girls, we should think, would care to allow their lovers a kind of married interlude with even Ayacanora, and then, when Ayacanora is cleared out of the way, to take Ayacanora's leavings comfortably back to their bosoms. At any rate, the practice, though angelic, strikes us as a little undignified, while the fact of "Squito" (Mosquito, christened Rafaela) being really attached to some body else, does not improve matters.

It is very hard to find anything to say of Mrs. Lovett Cameron's novels. Of picking small faults there would be no end. A writer who says that a chariot was to some one "what a mitre is to a bishop, or a wig to the Lord Chancellor, a sort of insignia of office," sadly needs a little instruction; and one who, on the same page, makes her heroine say to a countess, "Your ladyship is very good," wants more. If Frederica Clifford said this to Lady Holt "sarcastic," she was impertinent; for she was a girl of twenty, and it was their first introduction, and it was in her own house. If she thought that one lady usually calls another lady "your ladyship," she was painfully ignorant. But this sort of game is not worth marking down, much less wasting powder on; and the book, as a whole, fulfils its purpose well enough, no doubt.

Of Hilary St. John, on the other hand, though it has some faults of the same kind, better things may be said. It is quite certain that an old lady of seventy, however eccentric she might be, would never say to her niece, "It was rough on Mr. Stafford Hilary." The phrase, even if she knew it, would simply refuse to come to her tongue. The story, however, is better than the style; and the fashion in which the old lady just mentioned (who would certainly have slain Mrs. Price on the spot for putting "rough on" into her mouth) managed to reform her scatter-brained niece is cleverly imagined and well told, though we fancy the experiment would, in real life, be rather a dangerous one. The hero-victim of this experiment (the nature of which we shall not reveal), the Reverend Norris Stafford, is a rather new kind of curate; and we had not thought it possible that a new kind of curate should be invented.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

CLASSICAL SCHOOL-BOOKS.

An Intermediate Greek-English Lexicon, founded upon the Seventh Edition of Liddell and Scott's Lexicon. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) Concerning this book it will be sufficient to quote from the preface, signed by Dean Liddell, who has, we understand, performed the laborious work of compilation with his own hand. It is an entirely new abridgment, being made from the latest edition of the large lexicon (1888). The matter contained in it has been greatly increased (1) by giving fuller explanations of the words, (2) by inserting the regular forms of moods and tenses more fully, (3) by citing the leading authorities for the different usages, and (4) by adding characteristic phrases. Generally speaking, words used only by late writers and scientific terms have been omitted. But from Homer downwards to the close of classical Greek, care has been taken to insert all words. Besides, there will be found words used by Aristotle in his moral and political treatises, by Polybius and Strabo in the books generally read by students, by Plutarch in his Lives, by Lucian, by the poets of the Anthology, and by the writers of the New Testament. With regard to etymology, the dean has adopted what we venture to consider the judicious plan of limiting himself to the domain of the Greek language, printing the primitive words in capitals, giving references in the case of derivatives, and marking compounds clearly. In brief, this new edition will supersede its predecessors by its greater thoroughness, rather than through any novel features.

Teaching of Composition. By Arthur Sidgwick. (Rivingtons.) It was hardly necessary for Mr. Sidgwick—especially in the published form of this interesting lecture—to give (pp. 1-2) statistics to prove that he is acquainted with the art on which he is lecturing. The educational world knows his books and his gift for composition, and testimonials of experience are superfluous. But his views on his art cannot fail to be instructive. Here (e.g., on p. 18) he definitely throws verse-writing out of the general curriculum:

"If I could have my way, I would have us cease to teach verses, as a staple of instruction, even in the classical schools. The languages can be learnt without them; and where we are straitened for time to teach the needful, writing poetry in dead languages is too expensive a luxury."

Not so, would be the possible reply, if in this way the best part of those dead languages—viz., their poetry—can be best appreciated and assimilated. No doubt, we can spare the art of verse-writing in dead languages, regarded by itself; but we cannot spare their poetry, nor any means of realising it to the full. And surely it is not necessary that Mr. Sidgwick should knock down such men of straw as the theory that verse-writing is meant to teach us to write poetry. Not writing, but comprehending and feeling, is the object. The error has lain in supposing that verse-writing was the only means, or the best for all alike, to that object. What is curious, is to find so resolute an iconoclast of verse-composition, on p. 18, turn into a fanatical devotee of prose composition, on pp. 31-2:

"The education of reasting can be properly got from classical prose-writing alone. It is hardly an exaggeration to call classical prose composition the microcosm of a liberal education. I would almost say, if it were not likely to be thought an extravagant claim, that there are few purely intellectual qualities developed by most of the ordinary studies of a school or university, of which at least the germs may not be evoked and assisted by classical prose composition."

We must frankly avow our impression that this is a partial truth pushed to the verge of an absurdity. Classical prose-writing is, in our opinion, a difficult and stimulating discipline of the mind, having a very good effect in clearing away the habit of muddled and slovenly thinking. It is not a panacea, full of the germs of intellectual salvation. But, while we cannot agree with the theoretical level that Mr. Sidgwick assigns to his art, his practical suggestions for its attainment are admirable. On p. 33, for instance, there are some really golden hints for the teacher, on the larger points which require dwelling upon—order, connexion, metaphors—always a trap to the youthful traveller—and the abstract and concrete, which Mr. Sidgwick well and rightly calls "a vast topic, which really involves the chief part of the difference between dead and living tongues." This lecture, with the kindred one on "Stimulus," are indispensable aids to the often weary process of composition-teaching—a process which we are glad to see Mr. Sidgwick thinks (p. 34) should be as individual as possible, whatever labour it may involve.

Translations into Latin Verse. By Herbert Millington. (Bell.) The headmaster of Bromsgrove has a lingering tenderness, as may be seen from his preface as well as from his translations, for the art of classical verse-writing which Mr. Sidgwick has just anathematised. Mr. Millington has found that

"no portion of our work here at Bromsgrove has been more fruitful of intellectual results than the one hour a week, to which an ever-widening curriculum has confined the lesson in Latin verse."

We can well believe that, without drawing from it the inference Mr. Millington would have us draw. The truth is, an able man not only teaches well the subject he enjoys, but he teaches well through those subjects. We should judge, for instance, from this book that Mr. Millington had a keen appreciation of poetry. Such a man, through the medium of a Latin verse hour, will send a thrill of literary perception through his abler pupils: So much the better; but let it not be supposed that Latin verse is the only method of doing so. There is no question of the grace and elegance of these versions; and the only reason against publishing them is certainly not their demerits, but the fact that there is really overmuch published translation. Every new book of this sort drives teachers more and more into difficulties in finding virgin soil. Versions are innumerable, and to fall back on obscure and second-rate originals is bad for boys. Nothing can be much neater than the version here of "Lady Clara Vere de Vere" (p. 31); "You held your course without remorse" appears in true Horatian neatness "Cursum insolentem currere pertinax." But we do not quite like for "The grand old gardener and his wife" "At par Sabelorum illud agrestium," which misses the full meaning too palpably; we should prefer even a frigid classicism about Deucalion and Pyrrha. We observe (p. 7, st. 3; p. 8, st. 3; p. 35, st. 2; p. 83, st. 2) that Mr. Millington does not shrink, as Horace mostly does, from hiatus between ll. 3-4 of the Alcaic stanza. In rendering Mr. Bourdillon's pretty verses to Mr. Matthew Arnold (p. 3) the twelfth line, seems to us to miss the point; which is not "Have you found the old types of strength and beauty strong and fair?" but "Have you found new types of them?"

"Strenuus Alcides, candida visa Venus?"

Crustula. By E. A. Wells. (Rivingtons.) This unpretending little book contains Latin and Greek unseen passages for use in "lower forms," and seems to be the work of a really good teacher. In these days of competitive scholarships, easy "unseen books" are become a necessity, and Mr. Wells has met the need admirably. The scholarship of the book seems adequate; but the practical utility is, to our thinking, the great merit.

Lucretius V. Edited with Introduction and Notes by J. D. Duff. (Cambridge: Pitt Press Series.) It is a work of peculiar difficulty to make Lucretius intelligible to schoolboys. His oddly perverse deductive explanations of natural facts, his old-fashioned Latin, his queer prosody, are so many stumbling blocks. Munro's great edition is too big; its scientific corrections are too few and too curt; the very punctuation is strange, and the English jerky and sometimes obscure. With all its merits, then, it is hardly suited for school use, and the editors of this series have done well to issue a small part of the De Rerum Natura with simple and generally adequate explanations. Yet even a few more notes would not be superfluous. On ll. 284, 754, it is hardly enough to say that ei is always a spondee in Lucretius. A young reader wants to be told how and why it is a spondee. On l. 754 we wonder why Mr. Duff departed from Munro's rendering, "keep off from the earth his high-exalted head," and translates "on the earthward side" (of the sun). Of course the moon is on the earthward side of the sun at a solar eclipse, and this version is grammatically possible; but it seems less simple, and it is against the poet's habit of epexegetis, of saying nearly the same thing in two different sets of words. The short introduction is a model of what introductions to school editions should be. It explains Lucretius's principles of taste, shows his place among the various streams of literary tendency of his day, and points out his relation to Vergil.

The Ion of Euripides. By M. A. Bayfield. (Macmillan.) We are rather glad that the Ion should receive attention from the able co-editor of the Septem contra Thebas. It is a play not only of high poetic merit, but full of topographical interest in relation both to Athens and Delphi. With respect to the latter point, there is, we think, some confusion in the extract printed on pp. x.-xi. If the Castalian stream flows southward to the Pleistis, its left bank cannot be the western bank. And the "modern village of Kastri" certainly stands on the right of the stream that descends between the Phædriades. We rather agree with Mr. Bayfield where he says (Pref., pp. v.-vi.) that some discussions of moot points are healthy and helpful for young learners, though undoubtedly they used to be absurdly overdone. On the other hand, we would limit more severely than Mr. Bayfield does what we may call lexicon notes. For instance, the word παρθένευμα is construed twice over within fifty lines (ll. 1425, 1473). The notes on ll. 154, 158, 166, 328, 456, 526, 944, would be better away, so far as the construes are concerned. We notice, too, a bad misprint (η for ε) in the note on l. 256. But the notes, except for the obtrusion of these construes, are good and useful, if a trifle too full; and the appendix (pp. 164-8) very useful. In our judgment, the stage directions are unnecessarily full; and this has led to the actual text being printed in a Greek type which, though beautifully neat and clear, is certainly a little too small.

Messrs. GINN & Co.'s "College Series of Latin Authors" (Boston, U.S.A., and London) has received a useful accession in Prof. Kellogg's edition of Cicero's Brutus. The treatise is not so commonly read in English as in German schools, owing probably to the lack of any English edition worth mentioning; but it is highly instructive, and by no means uninteresting. Prof. Kellogg has the first qualification for an editor of the Brutus: he knows the De Oratore well. He has used with judgment the best German editors, and his commentary is sound and helpful. The book is well furnished with introductions, critical notes, and index. The main fault to be found with his annotations is that they are sometimes too compressed, and a little scanty—a fault which many teachers will think leans to virtue's side. But a very slight additional space would have enabled the editor to give the point of quotations, which are left as bare references, certain not to be looked up by the average student. A note might have been given on "superiorem Lycurgum" (§ 40), on "regnante Græcia" (§ 41), on "fuit M. Crassi quasi secundarum" (§ 242), and on "initio ætatis" (§ 281). "De dolio" is not well translated "from the jar," which is meaningless to an English reader; and so sound a scholar as Prof. Kellogg ought not to have slipped into "triumviri." But, on the whole, the notes are thoroughly trustworthy. The book is beautifully and correctly printed—"Periolem" (§ 27) is, perhaps, the only misprint; and it is cheap. There is a curiously ill-placed metaphor in one sentence in the introduction. "There are a few traces of carelessness in style; but who that has read Cicero's letters would wish him to wear a strait-jacket?" This article of dress, though needful in some painful circumstances, is not generally supposed to help to precision of expression. Nor is there much resemblance between Mr. Matthew Arnold's attacks upon the Philistines, and the pamphlet of Caecilius κατὰ τὴν φρυγίαν (p. 21—where the reference should be not to Or. 8. 25, but to Dr. Sandys's note on that passage).

Sophokles' Antigone. Für den Schulgebrauch herausgegeben von Friedrich Schubert. (Wien und Prag: Tempsky.) This is a little edition of a sort which might well be commoner in England. It has a clear and well-printed text; no textual notes whatsoever, but a concise introduction (pp. vii.-xiv.) to the history and development of the Greek drama, the Life and Works of Sophocles, the "Economy" of the drama, preparatory remarks on the Antigone, with dramatic analysis (pp. xv.-xviii.). At the end (pp. 49-56) there is a conspectus of the metres used in the play, and an appendix on the Athenian Theatre and its management. The book is brightened by several pictures, including the "Lateran Sophocles," and (at p. 56) a good representation of the Dionysiac Theatre, and various illustrative masks and figures. In other words, not "help to construe" is to be found in this book, but something of an intellectual background for such lads as are content to learn the actual language, slowly but surely, by grammar and dictionary. This method—rapidly expiring, under the weight of over-editing and translating, in England—still, it would appear, finds favour in Austria.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE Life of Earl (Lord John) Russell, by Mr. Spencer Walpole—which has already been announced in the ACADEMY—is now well on its way through the press. The author has had the advantage of referring to the diaries which Lord John kept as a boy at school, and during his early visits to Spain, Portugal, and Italy. He has also had unrestricted access to his official and private correspondence during his long life, and to other confidential documents in the possession of the family. It is believed that the work will throw new light on many incidents connected with the Melbourne, Russell, and Aberdeen administrations. It will form two volumes, and will be illustrated with two portraits.

WHEN Mr. Kennan saw the Armfeldt family at the mines of Kara, which he is now describing in the Century Magazine, he promised that he would call upon Count Leo Tolstoi, upon his return to Russia, and describe to him their life and circumstances. As is well known, Tolstoi is opposed to every form of force; and when Mr. Kennan saw him many months later, he manifested a decided disinclination to listen to accounts of the sufferings of the political convicts in Eastern Siberia. He stated that, while he felt sorry for many of the politicals, he could not help them, and was not at all in sympathy with their methods. They had resorted, he said, to violence, and they must expect to suffer from violence. The circumstances under which Mr. Kennan felt compelled to destroy the letters which were given him by politicals at the mines of Kara, will be detailed in the August Century.

A MEMORIAL to the Home Secretary, from literary men and others, praying for the release of Mr. Henry Vizetelly, publisher and author, has already been signed by the following, among others: Sir Algernon Borthwick, Sir E. W. Watkin, T. P. O'Connor, G. A. Sala, Archibald Forbes, Sutherland Edwards, the Hon. Lewis Wingfield, the Hon. Roden Noel, the Hon. F. C. Lawley, Walter Besant, Henry Irving, Leslie Stephen, Edmund Yates, Dr. R. Garnett, Frank Harris, A. W. Pinero, J. Addington Symonds, Havelock Ellis, Arthur Symons, Ernest Rhys, Grant Allen, Alex. C. Ewald, Augustus Harris, Linley Sambourne, Max O'Rell, Miss Harriett Jay, Mrs. Lynn Linton, Robert Buchanan, and J. S. Cotton. Forms of the memorial may be had from Mr. Ernest Vizetelly, 52, Lebanon Gardens, West Hill, Wandsworth.

DR. BLYDEN, of Liberia, the author of Christianity, Islam, and the Negro Race, has arrived in London on his way to the United States, to fulfil an engagement to lecture for the American Colonisation Society. He can be addressed at his publishers, Messrs. W. B. Whittingham & Co.

THE following are some of the forthcoming volumes in the series called "The Story of the Nations," published in this country by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin: Sicily, by Prof. E. A. Freeman; The Corsairs, by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole; The Balkan States, by Mr. A. J. Evans; Russia, by Mr. W. R. Morfill; The Roman Empire, by Mr. H. F. Pelham; The Byzantine Empire, by Mr. C. Oman; The Franks, by Mr. James Sime; Vedic India, by Mdme. Ragozin; and Buddhist India, by Prof. Rhys Davids.

WE understand that twelve of the earlier volumes of the series have already been translated into Spanish.

THE first volume of Mr. Henry Dunning Macleod's Theory of Credit (to be completed in two volumes) will be published by Messrs. Longmans next week.

MR. EDWARD STANFORD has in the press a book by Mr. W. Henry Barneby, entitled The New Far West and the Old Far East, which will give an account of recent travel and observation along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and thence by Japan, China, Ceylon, and Egypt, back to England.

THE next volume of the "Canterbury Poets" will be Selections from the Greek Anthology. The editor is Mrs. Graham R. Tomson; and among the translators are Sir Edwin Arnold, Dr. Richard Garnett, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. W. M. Hardinge, Lord Neave, and Miss Alma Strettall.

MR. W. E. FOSTER has just completed an illustrated History of Whapload Church and Parish, in Lincolnshire, which will be issued very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. DIGBY & LONG will publish immediately a new translation, in English twelve-syllable rhyming verse, of Victor Hugo's Ruy Blas, by Mr. W. D. S. Alexander.

MESSRS. OLIPHANT, ANDERSON, & FERRIER, of Edinburgh, announce a new volume by the late Rev. Hugh Stowell Brown, of Liverpool, entitled Manliness, and other Sermons, with a preface by Dr. Alexander MacLaren, of Manchester. The same firm have also in preparation Life Stages: their Duties and Opportunities, by the Rev. James Stark.

SIR JULIUS VOGEL's novel, A.D. 2000, has been a great success in the colonies. One retail bookseller at Dunedin (New Zealand) ordered 500 copies; but this number was exhausted within a few days, and a special cable sent to Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. for a further 600 copies. By the same cable an order was received for 600 copies of In Australian Wilds, issued by the same firm.

As several inquiries have been made whether there is likely to be a cheap issue of Michael Field's Long Ago (reviewed in the ACADEMY of June 8), of which the limited edition has all been sold out, we are requested to state that the author has no present intention of issuing the book again in any form.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

Scribner's Magazine for August will celebrate Lord Tennyson's eightieth birthday, which occurs in that month, by publishing two portraits of him engraved from photographs, taken in 1877 and 1888, also pictures of his houses in the Isle of Wight and Surrey, with an engraving of his favourite lane. The same number will contain a short essay by Dr. Henry van Dyke on Tennyson's earliest poems published with his brother; and the end paper, by Prof. T. R. Lounsbury, of Yale, will discuss Tennyson's attitude towards life in youth and old age, under the title of "The Two Locksley Halls."

THE August Century—the midsummer holiday number—will contain, besides the first chapters of a new serial, by Mr. Joel Chandler Harris, two short stories, "The Haunted House in Royal Street," by Mr. George W. Cable; and "A Positive Romance," by Mr. Edward Bellamy, author of "Looking Backward."

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

PROF. JOHN W. HALES—who has been for many years professor of English at King's College, London, and also repeatedly examiner in English to the University of London—has been appointed to the Clark lectureship in English literature at Trinity College, Cambridge, formerly held by Mr. Leslie Stephen and Mr. Edmund Gosse.

WE understand that Prof. R. Y. Tyrrell, of Dublin—whose name has been mentioned in connexion with the vacant professorship of Greek at Glasgow—has decided not to offer himself as a candidate. He prefers to remain at Dublin, and await his time for election to a senior fellowship at Trinity College.

A MEETING was held in Trinity College, Cambridge, last week, at which the Master presided, when a small committee was appointed to issue a circular inviting subscriptions for obtaining a portrait of Dr. Henry Jackson.

A COMMITTEE is being formed at Cambridge to support the candidature of Mr. F. J. H. Jenkinson, fellow of Trinity College, for the office of university librarian, which will become vacant on October 1 by the resignation of Prof. Robertson Smith, and the election into which must consequently take place not later than October 15. Members of the senate who are willing to join the committee are requested to send their names to one of the undersigned: H. S. Foxwell, St. John's College; Arthur Tilley, King's College; R. St. John Parry, Trinity College.

MR. T. HUDSON BEARE, of the Heriot-Watt College, Edinburgh, has been appointed professor of engineering and mechanical technology at University College, London, in succession to Mr. Alex. B. W. Kennedy.

ON June 27, at the centenary festival of St. John's College, Annapolis, Maryland, the degree of Doctor of Science was conferred upon the Rev. W. C. Winslow, of Boston, vice-president of the Egypt Exploration Fund, in recognition of his efforts for the promotion of scientific exploration.

THREE new fellowships, of the annual value of 450 dollars (£90) each, have recently been founded at Harvard, where there are now twenty fellowships and twenty-eight scholarships, of the total value of 16,500 dollars a year, at the disposal of the graduate department.

THE library of Yale College has received from an anonymous donor a complete set of the publications of Prince L.-L. Bonaparte on the languages and dialects of Europe, and on Basque in particular, numbering altogether about 350 pieces.

LAKE FOREST UNIVERSITY, at Chicago, has received endowments to the total amount of 700,000 dollars (£140,000) within the last three years.

THE last number of Hermathena—the organ of Trinity College, Dublin (London: Longmans)—contains several articles of varied interest. In classical philology, we have "Observations on the Fragments of the Latin Scenic Poets," by Prof. Arthur Palmer, chiefly textual emendations of Ribbeck's edition; "Ciceroniana," by Prof. R. Y. Tyrrell, dealing with the later books of the Letters to Atticus; a few "Nugae Aeschyleae," by Mr. J. B. Bury; while Mr. L. C. Purser publishes an example of the continuation of Henry's "Aeneidea," which he has taken up (with Prof. Palmer) on the death of Prof. Davies, of Galway. In ancient history, Prof. J. P. Mahaffy discusses the lost work on agriculture of the Carthaginian Mago, pointing out that none of the few passages from it that have survived refer to the cultivation of wheat by slave-labour, and arguing that the Greek translation of it was, perhaps, made in connexion with the colonising plans of C. Gracchus. In ancient philosophy, there is a paper by the late Prof. Thomas Maguire, on "Aristotle's Induction," criticising the views of Sir W. Hamilton and Grote. In theology, the Rev. Dr. J. Quarry sends some critical notes on the two last books of the Clementine Homilies; and the Rev. Dr. John Gwynn gives a further extract from an unpublished Syriac MS. relating to Hippolytus, with an autotype of one of the pages of this MS. (Rich 7185). Finally, Prof. Barstable contributes some "Economic Notes," dealing with Adam Smith, J. S. Mill, and Henry Sidgwick. Hermathena will henceforth be published on May 1 of every year, each number containing from 128 to 160 pages, and the price being from 2s. to 3s.

AMERICAN JOTTINGS.

MISS AMELIA B. EDWARDS, we learn from the American press, is already engaged to give courses of lectures next season under the auspices of Yale, Columbia, Princeton, Michigan, Wesleyan, Pennsylvania, and other universities, and by invitation from various colleges, including the female colleges of Vassar, Wellesley, Bryn Mawr, Wells, and Elmira. Among her lectures in New York are six in one of the theatres by invitation of the Archaeological Institute of America, and one in a large hall before the American Geographical Society; in Boston the lectures will be under the auspices of the Museum of Fine Arts; in Baltimore before the Peabody Institute; and in Washington by invitation of the Smithsonian Institution and eminent gentlemen of that city. The list consists already of about sixty lectures, and about two hundred invitations from all quarters have been received by the American agent. Preference is being given to the educational centres.

COL. T. W. HIGGINSON has been appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts to write an official record of the services in the civil war of the soldiers and sailors who came from that State. A period of five years has been allowed to him for the task.

It is announced that Mark Twain's new book, to be published in the autumn by Messrs. Charles L. Webster & Co.—in which firm Mr. Samuel L. Clemens is himself the senior partner—will be a satire on English nobility and royalty, entitled "A Yankee at King Arthur's Court."

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN, & Co., of Boston, announce a new biographical series of "American Religious Leaders," the first volume in which will be Jonathan Edwards, written by Prof. A. V. G. Allen.

M. DE KÉRATRY has received from the French government a commission to study the various questions relating to the law of literary property in the United States.

THE thirty-eighth meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science will be held this year at Toronto, beginning on August 27.

DR. W. E. SIMONDS, of Cornell University, has published a monograph upon Sir Thomas Wyatt and his Poems (Boston: Heath), in which he endeavours to set the poems in a true order, and to extract from them confirmation for the theory that Anne Boleyn was the object of Wyatt's love.

THE New York Nation for July 4 contains a very unfavourable review of Mr. Farmer's Americanisms—Old and New.

PROF. W. J. ALEXANDER, of Dalhousie College, Halifax, Nova Scotia, has just published at Boston, U.S.A., another "Introduction to the Study of Robert Browning," which the poet's discriminating admirers will, we think, hold in esteem. It claims, on the one hand, that of our seven nineteenth-century poets—Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron, Shelley, Keats, Tennyson, Browning—"Browning is the greatest man," whatever the rank that will be ultimately assigned him as a poet. On the other hand, the book states plainly Browning's shortcomings, and sets forth the causes of them. Prof. Alexander, while a strong admirer, is a reasonable one. He also gives the fullest analysis and clearest explanation yet printed of "Sordello." Whether his quotation of several complete poems brings his book under the prohibition of our copyright law is not for us to enquire. Mr. Browning himself would doubtless interpret the law liberally in such a case.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

"AURORA LEIGH."

SEE you this jewel, flashing forth its fire
From many facets; shooting coloured rays Whose light the power of long-quenched flame displays,
And to a royal casket might aspire?
Gems such as this, before they shine, require
The patient watchful toil of many days,
And each reluctantly its worth betrays
For anxious eyes to see and to admire.

So was this woman's love for long concealed;
She, with her keen clear sight, could understand
But half its power, till pain had well revealed
It to her, leading her with tender hand
To her own Romney, who the compact sealed
That bound those two with an unbreaking band.

FREDERICK J. PAPE.

OBITUARY.

SIR JAMES PICTON, F.S.A.

SIR JAMES ALLANSON PICTON, who died at Liverpool, on July 15, was a native of that city, where he was born on December 2, 1805. He had a successful career as an architect and surveyor, but always gave much time to public work, to which of late years he had devoted himself exclusively. He entered the Liverpool municipal council in 1849, and under his guidance that city founded its grand library, art gallery, and museum. The munificent donations of the Earl of Derby (the "naturalist earl"), of Sir William Brown, Mr. Joseph Mayer, and Sir A. B. Walker, gave this institution a foremost place in the provinces. Sir James (he was knighted in 1880) was best known by his Memorials of Liverpool—an admirable book of local history; but he was also the writer of many antiquarian monographs and contributions to learned societies. A list of these would show that his range of subjects was wide, and an examination of them would further demonstrate that he was well read and had a faculty for investigation. He was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and of all, or nearly all, of the local learned societies. When the circular library was built, connecting the Brown Museum and the Walker Art Gallery, the appropriate name of the Picton Reading Room was given to it. Commenting on this at a banquet held in his honour, over which Lord Derby presided, Sir James said:

"Should any person in time to come think it worth while to inquire who and what was the man that bore the name, my highest ambition would be satisfied if it could be said that he was one who moved in a narrow sphere with limited opportunities, but that in that narrow sphere and with those limited opportunities he did what little he could, and did that little from a sense of duty."

This was eminently characteristic of the man.

MR. CHARLES HARDWICK.

MR. CHARLES HARDWICK, who died at Manchester on July 8, was a native of Preston, where he was born on September 10, 1817. His father was an innkeeper. After an ordinary private education he was apprenticed to a printer; but, on the expiration of his servitude, he devoted himself to art, and practised as a portrait painter in Preston. Having joined the Oddfellows, he took an important share in the reform of the Manchester Unity. His Manual for Friendly Societies was an authoritative exposition of sound doctrine for these important institutions. His services were appreciated, and led to his election as grand master. Turning his attention to archaeology, he produced a large and excellent History of Preston, a volume on the Ancient Battlefields of Lancashire, and an elaborate book on Traditions, Superstitions, and Folk-Lore, chiefly Lancashire (1872), which showed wide reading. Mr. Hardwick was a vice-president of the Manchester Literary Club, of which he was a founder. He regularly attended its meetings until the failure of his health. He was a kind-hearted man, with an unflinching flow of cheerful conversation. As an antiquary he was remarkable for caution, preferring to accumulate evidence rather than to form theories.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE first volume of the Jewish Quarterly Review is now complete, and a fair critic will admit that the review will stand comparison with the very ablest of its theological contemporaries. Its permanent utility consists largely in the fact that all the contributors know what they are writing about, and give references. In the July number Dr. I. H. Weiss describes the study of the Talmud in the thirteenth century; while Prof. David Castelli gives a clear and most useful summary of Rabbinic teachings on the future life. Lady Magnus follows with a charming paper on the National Idea in Judaism, uncritical enough perhaps, but not the less instructive, if we bear in mind that Judaism and Israelitism are not synonymous terms; Lady Magnus transfigures the latter in the light of the former. Dr. Friedländer treats of the age and authorship of Ecclesiastes with a learning which can be appreciated even by those who are staggered by his wonderful orthodoxy. Israel Zangwill contributes a fresh analysis of "Judaism," so far at least as Judaism is represented in our own country. It is clear that a tolerance exists in the Jewish community of which even the comprehensive Church of England has formed no idea. One can only wish that Old Testament studies flourished more in both these great churches. Fancy a very enlightened Jewish thinker declaring, "To me the saying (Jer. vii. 22) shows how far Jeremiah, like Isaiah and Micah, had drifted from primitive Judaism, not what the essence of primitive Judaism was"! Clearly the essence of primitive Judaism can no more be discussed without historical criticism than the essence of primitive Christianity. Dr. Neubauer concludes his important contribution to the "History of Human Error," which Mr. Caxton left unfinished, and holds out the hope of an amicable discussion between himself and the "Anglo-Israelites." The letters from Austria are continued; and among the notes and discussions we may mention one on Baruch ii. 18, which seeks to show the word for "unhappy" in later Hebrew.

CIVIL LIST PENSIONS.

In consideration of the attention recently drawn to the subject in the ACADEMY, we print the following list of all pensions granted during the year ended June 20, 1889, and charged upon the Civil List:

James Graves, to archaeology and to the early history of Ireland, and of her inadequate means of support; Dr. O. A. M. Fennell, £50, in consideration of his eminence as a classical and philological scholar, of his services to literature, and of his inadequate means of support; Miss Elizabeth Gertrude Birch and Miss Juliana Frances Birch, £50 each, in consideration of the services of their late father, Dr. S. Birch, as an archaeologist, and of their destitute condition; Mr. W. Cave Thomas, £50, on account of his personal service to the Royal Family, and in consideration of his services to art, and of his destitute condition; Mrs. Helen Patey, £200, in consideration of the services rendered by her late husband, Mr. C. H. B. Patey, in the improvement of the telegraph services of this country, and of her inadequate means of support; Mrs. Margaret Rainey Porter, £50, in recognition of the services of her late husband, Dr. J. L. Porter, to education and literature, and in consideration of her inadequate means of support; Mrs. Sophie Watts, £75, in recognition of the services of her late husband, Mr. Henry Watts, to chemistry, and in consideration of her inadequate means of support; Mrs. Elizabeth Sowerby, £75, in consideration of the botanical works of her late husband, and of her destitute condition; Dr. James Hutcheson Stirling, £50, in recognition of his services to philosophy and literature, and in consideration of his inadequate means of support; total, £1,200."

"OMAR KHAYYAM."

St. John's College, Cambridge: July 15, 1889.

I append a list of parallel passages in Fitzgerald's Omar Khayyam and the new prose translation by Mr. McCarthy, which may be convenient to those who wish to see how closely Fitzgerald followed the original. The references in the case of Mr. McCarthy's book are to page and quatrain. Fitzgerald is quoted from the third edition.

ETYMOLOGY OF M.E. "CURY."

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: July 16, 1889.

Mr. Henry Bradley may be glad to know that several examples of the O.F. word queuerie (otherwise keuerie or queurie, i.e., cuisine), from which he proposes to derive M.E. cury, are given in the latest fascicule of M. Godefroy's O.F. Dictionary.

Halliwell appears to have been acquainted with the correct etymology of the English word. He explains it as meaning "cooking," and refers it to an Anglo-Norman origin. It occurs twice in John Russell's Bole of Nurture (ed. Furnivall, E.E.T.S.), vv. 506, 513; but is there explained as "curious dishes" or "dodges," "sleights."

Darwinism: an Exposition of the Theory of Natural Selection, with some of its Applications. By Alfred Russel Wallace. (Macmillan.)

AMONG the great and pregnant thinkers of a great and pregnant age of thought, it is probable that Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace has never yet received his due meed of recognition. Most discoverers, indeed, are amply satisfied if in the course of a lifetime they strike out a single grand and epoch-making conception. Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace has struck out two such on very different planes of speculative and practical thought. That one and the same man should have evolved in biology the theory of natural selection and in politics the theory of land nationalisation is truly astonishing. After ages, looking back upon those two great accomplished revolutions in belief and practice, will wonder that this age, so heedless of its own greatness, should have allowed so powerful and original a thinker to remain for life in such comparative obscurity. The princes of humanity nowadays begin to get known only as they verge towards the bourne of eighty.

Mr. Wallace's new book may be regarded in either of two lights—first as a popular exposition, and secondly as a manifesto. For it is addressed to two worlds at once—to the general public, to whom it will come as a work of popular science; and to the scientific few, to whom it will come as an authoritative exposition of its author's final ideas on organic evolution.

From the first point of view all that need here be said is that the work is written throughout with that fulness of knowledge, that charm of style, and that lucidity of exposition to which Mr. Wallace has everywhere and always accustomed us. As an artist and an expositor he is clearly superior to his great fellow-discoverer, Darwin, in his power of entering into the position of the average reader, and of seizing upon the points—especially, so to speak, the pictorial points—likely to interest that phlegmatic person. He is graphic and readable where Darwin is often luminous but dry. He knows how to state his case to the twelve respectable men in the box, and how to keep their intelligence on the alert till he has made them hear it out and frame their verdict. As a popular statement of the evolution theory in organic nature, I have no hesitation in saying most readers will find Darwinism a far better work than The Origin of Species. It is lighter, it is brighter, it is less technical, and it is brought down to date in every department. The arrangement, in particular, is beyond all praise. Instead of beginning with the obscure facts of variation, so dull to the general, Mr. Wallace begins, where indeed Darwin in his own mind began, with the struggle for existence, and thence almost deductively infers (though with abundant inductive verification) the necessity for natural selection as a factor in evolution. All this expository work is admirably done. The sketch, so to speak, is in perfect drawing. It shows Mr. Wallace in the most favourable light as a scientific artist of the highest excellence. His proportion and perspective are almost always just. Let me add that he has with characteristic modesty omitted, what nobody else in such a treatise could possibly omit, all reference to his own important part in the simultaneous independent discovery of the principle of natural selection by two distinct thinkers. This is only of a piece with Mr. Wallace's whole attitude on the matter throughout. While lesser men have wrangled with unseemly discussion over petty questions of priority, Mr. Wallace, with the careless unselfishness of true greatness, has been content to see his own principle triumph under the name of that still more admirably equipped naturalist to whose advocacy of their joint idea its universal acceptance is without a doubt mainly attributable.

From the second point of view, as a reasoned statement of Mr. Wallace's final evolutionary position, the work, of course, demands more extended criticism. It is a last testament and confession of faith on all the debateable points in the evolutionary platform.

To begin with, Mr. Wallace fights hard what I firmly believe to be the losing battle in favour of natural selection, pure and simple, as not only the main but also almost the sole cause of the production of species. He rejects sexual selection; he practically rejects use and disuse; he will hear of nothing but the one original true faith in survival of the fittest, alone and unadulterated. This, he truly says, is pre-eminently the Darwinian doctrine (as opposed, he means, to earlier Lamarckian and Spencerian evolution), and hence he claims for his book the position of the advocate of "pure Darwinism." It would perhaps be even more correct, however, to call this the Wallacian than the Darwinian doctrine. It is the doctrine of Mr. Wallace's own paper, read with Darwin's before the Linnean Society, and unmodified since in either direction. Darwin himself from the very first admitted sexual selection, and, to a less degree, functional modification; and each subsequent edition of the Origin of Species showed the gradual widening of its author's mind in the direction of still further comprehensiveness. In this, it seems to me, he was right, and his fellow-discoverer wrong. Of course, it is impossible, in the space here at my disposal (fancy really criticising in three or four columns a work of thought!) to express the reasons why I differ on this point from Mr. Wallace; but I think the general drift of evolutionary opinion for many years past has steadily set the other way. At first Darwin and everybody else, delighted with the new key, attempted to make it open all locks at once. Gradually, as one problem after another arose, it became evident that fresh wards must be added, fresh modes of unfastening hidden bolts admitted. And nowadays I believe most biologists, looking to the extraordinary complexity of organic life, will be tempted to say, "Darwin, indeed, gave us a master-key in natural selection—a master-key to the problems we then saw; but innumerable subsidiary keys are still needed, and each of these we must accept thankfully as helping us to solve the remaining problems which survival of the fittest hardly touches and sexual selection is powerless to unlock." In another century, I fancy, endless new factors in evolution which escape us now will be added to the three or four main ones—natural selection, sexual selection, use and disuse, direct action of environment—which we now possess.

In other points—such as his continued objection to the natural evolution of man's mental faculties, his rejection of aesthetic preferences in animals, and even his acceptance of Weismann's theory of heredity—it seems to me we can throughout trace the action of a curious a priori tendency in Mr. Wallace's mind. Not that Mr. Wallace himself would admit its action, or is even conscious of its presence. He has always excellent inductive reasons to give for the faith that is in him. Nevertheless, it is immediately apparent to the outside observer that Mr. Wallace differs, as a rule, from the main stream of evolutionary opinion just in those points where a certain particular preconception would lead him to differ. He accepts organic evolution and natural selection without prejudice to the immortality of the soul and the great gulf fixed between the animal and the human; just as Prof. Mivart accepts them, without prejudice to the teaching of St. Thomas of Aquinum. It would seem as though Mr. Wallace first struck out his grand generalisation of natural selection without fully realising all its implications in the world of mind; and that when he began to feel the vastness of those implications, he tried to hedge by making special reservations in favour of some divine element in the human species. Certain it is that in all these cases he specifically permits us to see, as one at least of his objections, a reservation of this character. Sexual selection, for example, seems to him to imply an amount of aesthetic faculty in lower animals which he cannot allow to any but the human intelligence. And his final chapter on Man restates and reinforces all those peculiar views as to the origin of human faculty with which we are already familiar in Mr. Wallace's work elsewhere.

The acceptance of Weismann's theory, in particular, now so fashionable among biologists—probably because it comes to us from Germany—seems to me peculiarly unfortunate for the future of science. The Spencerian doctrine of the inheritance of functionally acquired modifications of structure appears to hold out our only chance of explaining, not merely the origin and development of the nervous system and the mental nature of man, but even the historical growth of the artistic and intellectual faculties, the birth of genius, the rise of civilisation, and the very existence of individual character generally. If we take that principle away, it is hard to see how the facts of human life can be accounted for at all. Weismann does take it away, and takes it away wantonly, for no better reason than in order to make out an unverifiable theory, for which no positive facts of any crucial sort can be cited. We are asked to give up a plausible hypothesis which explains and co-ordinates all the phenomena, in favour of an unproved dogma, which reduces them at once to a meaningless chaos. Of course, if Weismann's argument was absolutely unassailable, then we should be forced with a sigh to accept the implications—to land ourselves once more in a slough of uncertainty; but so long as its basis remains in the present condition, we are justified in refusing to burden our minds with so terrible a weight in our pursuit of truth.

Once away from this debateable ground, however, nothing can exceed the rigorous logic of Mr. Wallace's reasoning. The book is especially noticeable for three points. In the first place, it contains many new facts and theories of value, often drawn from recent but unfamiliar sources, especially American. In the second place, Mr. Wallace, while ignoring the modern laboratory school of biologists, is never afraid of accepting fresh views, even from quarters usually deemed heretical. And in the third place, he is, as always, a remarkably candid, courteous, and just controversialist. Whether he agrees with any particular writer, or whether he differs, one feels at least throughout that his ally and his opponent alike are being treated with scrupulous fairness and equal courtesy. There is not a word anywhere that even Mr. Samuel Butler could consider harsh or disingenuous. It is impossible to lay down the book without feeling a pleasant consciousness that we have been here in the company, not only of a deep thinker, a finished naturalist, and an acute reasoner, but also of a generous, broad-minded, and honourable gentleman.

GRANT ALLEN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"TURAN" AND "TUSNA."

Barton-on-Humber.

A mirror (Gerhard, Et. Spiegel, No. cccxxii.) shows Atunis (Ἀδωνίς) embraced by Turan (the Et. name for Ἀφροδίτη), while a huge swan, called Tusna, stretches its head lovingly upwards, and almost touches the crown of the goddess, behind whom is seated a winged female, named Zirna, holding a pencil and box of cosmetics, and wearing a necklace, from which hangs a crescent-moon.

Turan = tur ("child") + an ("heaven," "god," vide ACADEMY, November 12, 1887, p. 323), "child-of-heaven." Cf. Ak. tur, tar, "young," "son"; Finnic tür (e.g., tytär, "girl"); Mordvin tsora, "son"; Mag. dër, "girl"; As. Turkio tura, "chief," primarily "son"; Et. Ἀγαλλήτροπα (= αἰδᾶ, Ἡἰσυχίος, Et. agall = Tohagatai ogul, "boy," &c., vide ACADEMY, May 4, 1889, p. 309). So we find eterav clenar ci (Fab. Ter. Sup., No. 327), "children, sons 2." Thus Istar will = "Heaven-daughter" (vide ACADEMY, November 12, 1887, p. 323). As tur, tar = "child," we are not surprised to find also a male Turan ("Son-of-heaven," vide Gerhard, Et. Sp. No. L. 2). Similar formations with -an are the Ak. Tir-an(na), "Life-of-heaven" (the Pole-star); Gut-an(na), "Bull-of-heaven" (Taurus); Sibzian(na), "Shepherd-of-the-life-of-heaven" (Arcturus); and the Et. Öes-an (= öes, tus, "fire," vide Budenz, Magyar-Ugor Os. Szótár, 242, + an, "Light" or "Fire-of-heaven," the Et. name of Hes), Sellans (= Sell-an-s, "Fire-of-god-the," the Et. name of Ἡφαίστος), Lar-an ("the-god-Lar," the Et. War-god, analogue of Apas).

When Et. and non-Et. names of corresponding divinities are somewhat similar, the former are often retained on the mirrors to express the latter, e.g., Et. Turms for Ἐρμῆς (vide ACADEMY, November 12, 1887, p. 323), and Et. Laran for Ἀπῶν. So, probably, Turan for Ἀ-τῆ Οὐραν-ία (vide ACADEMY, April 10, 1886, p. 257).

Tusna has, naturally enough, been supposed to be the Et. for "swan." But Turanian swan-words are quite different; and, by analogy with the other names of the group, tusna should be the Et. form of a non-Et. swan-name. It is equally unconnected with any Aryan form—swana, olor, kúvor, &c.; and, the Adonis-myth being Semitic, we naturally turn to a Semitic language. The Rev. W. Houghton, who is facile princeps in Assyrian ornithology, gives tus-mu-u as the As. for the Pelicanus onocrotalus, the Tusmu-bird being also called in As. "the-She-Ass-of-the-water"; and Prof. Sayce informs me that the As. name for the swan is supposed to be tusau. Mr. Houghton writes me—

"I have been unable to discover any Hebrew, Assyrian, or Phoenician name for the swan. However, your Tusna on the Et. mirror seems to be, as you suggest, the Et. form of a Semitic swan-word; and the same bird-name may have stood for the swan in Phoenician and the pelican in Assyrian. It is not uncommon to meet with similar names denoting different animals in allied languages, and, indeed, even in the same language. Thus, we have in the Hebrew Bible tinshometh, 'swan,' A.V., 'horned owl,' R.V., in Lev. xi. 18, as the name of some unclean bird; and the same word as the name of some unclean reptile in Lev. xi. 30" ("Chamaeleon," Vulgate).

The result is, I think, very fairly clear, namely, that in Tus-na we have a Sem. swan-word with an Et. ending (na); and it supplies an interesting instance of that direct connexion between Etruria and Phoenicia, of which there must have been so much, and about which we know so little.

Similarly, Zirna will = Tzur-na, Tyre, personified by Hebrew prophets as a "harlot," who claimed to be "of perfect beauty," and who wears the crescent-moon of Astartê, whose abode was "the holy isle of Tyre." In the Homeric Turô (Od. xi. 235), child of Salmôneus (cf. Zalmanna, Egypto-Hittite Thelmann, &c.), "we have the only indication which the poems afford of the name of Tyre" (Gladstone, Hom. Syn. 216); and it is to be remarked that the Tyre-name, when it passes to the Etruscans through the Greeks, reappears as Turia (vide Fab., No. 1069). Sidon, too, is personified as the sweet-voiced inventor of song (Sanchou. i. 6), and Rome and Alexandria appear in art as goddesses.

ROBERT BROWN, JUN.

London: July 18, 1889.

"It may be admitted," Mr. Isaac Taylor says, "that the Scythian name has been applied by ancient writers to Teutonic tribes; but it by no means follows, as Mr. Karl Blind contends, that all Scythians were Teutons."

Allow me to remark that this is not quite my contention.

In the ACADEMY of July 6 I wrote of the Skythians as

"that mainly white-skinned, fair-haired, blue-eyed, tall race which once extended from the eastern parts of Europe into farther Asia." I added: "Skythian names, like Spargapith, Gnur, Idanthys, and others, I pointed out years ago as indicating that in the vast Skythian race there was a predominance, at all events, of the Germanic element."

In an elaborate article on the same subject in the Asiatic Quarterly Review of April last, as well as in a still fuller one in the Dresden Magazin für die Literatur des In- und Auslandes, I have made the same qualification. In the former periodical I wrote:

"From a passage in Herodotos (iv. 81) we may conclude that, here and there, some admixture of conquered tribes had been added to the conquering Skyths—as has always been the case, under similar circumstances, all over the world. But this does not affect the character of the Skytho-Germanic race at large, such as it is described by the ancients."

Mr. Isaac Taylor will, therefore, see that I did not assert "all Scythians were Teutons." The inhabitants of the British Islands—often simply called Englishmen—are not all of Germanic descent, nay, not all even of Aryan blood, there being an Iberian infusion or basis in Wales, in North-western Scotland, and in Ireland. Still, there is a predominance, at all events, of the Germanic element in this country.

It is not possible, in a letter, to discuss again this Skythian question, which I have only been able to rapidly touch upon in the ACADEMY in a short review, in accordance with the space allowed for it. Having myself devoted many years of study to it, I think those who wish to question the conclusions arrived at had better deal with the powerful array of facts and arguments in Mr. Fresal's book. Perhaps they will see then that on this subject, as well as on that of the kindred Thracian race, there is far more substantial and trustworthy material to be found in ancient authors than a certain modern school would grant, which would fain "put out the lights of antiquity."

OBITUARY.

DR. FRANCIS DAY, C.I.E.

WE regret to record the death of Dr. Francis Day, retired deputy-surgeon-general in the Madras army, which took place at Cheltenham, after a prolonged illness, on Wednesday, July 10.

Dr. Day went out to India in 1852; and after military service in the second Burmese war, he devoted himself to the study of the fishes of India, having been appointed inspector-general of fisheries to the government. His earliest work on The Fishes of Malabar was published in 1865. Three years later appeared The Fishes of India, of which a new edition was brought out in 1876-78, with a supplement as late as 1888. Only this very week we have received—in the elaborate publication entitled "The Fauna of British India," which is being edited for the Secretary of State by Mr. W. T. Blandford—the first volume on Fishes, abridged and revised by Dr. Day from his larger work. The first volume of this abridgment amounts to more than 500 pages, with numerous illustrations. The extent of the work has apparently prohibited the inclusion of those popular features which are to be noticed in Mr. Blandford's own contribution on the Mammalia.

Dr. Day retired from the Indian service in 1877, and threw himself, with characteristic energy into the study of the fishes of Great Britain and Ireland, the results being published in a large work between 1880-83. He was very generous, not only in placing his knowledge at the disposal of others, but also in distributing his own invaluable collections of fishes, portions of which are now in the British Museum, and also in several other museums both in India and on the continent.

SCIENCE NOTES.

Flora of Switzerland. By A. Gremli. Translated from the fifth edition by L. W. Paitson. (David Nutt.) It is surprising that the flora of a country whose physical geography is so singularly varied as that of Switzerland should admit of description in a handbook of moderate size. Dalla-Torre's tiny manual achieved its diminutiveness by describing few but Alpine plants. But the deserved success of Gremli's well-known Flora shows that the task can be successfully performed without omissions, and we are glad to see the book now made accessible to English readers. It appears just in time for those who mean to take their holiday in Switzerland. They may now double their enjoyment by the pleasure of a favourite pursuit. There are always plenty of flowers in Switzerland, whether one goes in autumn and studies the later vegetation, or whether in summer one watches the clovers in the rich meadows or the dwarf gentians flowering at the edge of the receding snow. Even in spring, when one can only hunt on the lower ground, there is a far greater variety of blossom than in our own island. In Switzerland, also, many of our rarities can be easily found. Mulgedium alpinum may be gathered with ease and safety. Leucoleum vernum, almost unknown with us, is abundant there in February and March. Polygonatum officinale, another rare British plant, occurs commonly. The real oxlip can be traced in every thicket by its peculiar smell. But Gremli's Flora will be useful not only to tourist-botanists. We have many critical species in Great Britain about which opinion is not yet crystallised; and a knowledge of what continental botanists make of kindred forms will be of the greatest value. Gremli's account of that perplexing group, the hawkweeds, will be a welcome aid to enquirers who are trying to reduce to order the multiform varieties of it found in our Scottish Highlands.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—(Monday, July 8.)

PROF. SIDGWICK, president, gave an account of the inquiry, now in progress, into the nature and frequency of casual hallucinations of the sane. He pointed out the great interest of the inquiry to psychologists and physiologists, but specially urged its importance as bearing on the proof or disproof of the "telepathic" explanation of apparitions. The argument for this explanation rests entirely on the assumption that a close coincidence of time between an apparition and a death, or some crisis in the life of the person, seen occurs more frequently than chance will account for; and the statistics as yet attained as to the frequency of hallucinations, coincidental and non-coincidental, are not adequate. An attempt is now being made to obtain 50,000 answers to the question "Have you ever, when believing yourself to be completely awake, had a weird impression of seeing, or being touched by, a living being or inanimate object, or of hearing a voice, which impression, so far as you could discover, was not due to any external physical cause?" About a thousand forms have been sent out containing this question, with spaces for twenty-five answers, and 1600 answers had been already received; but more aid was urgently wanted. It is earnestly wished that the collection should be made as impartially as possible, without any bias for or against telepathy. It is hoped, accordingly, to obtain the aid of many persons indifferent or hostile to the general work of the society. A paper on this census of hallucinations will be presented to the Congress of Physiological Psychologists that will meet in Paris early in August; and it was stated that M. Marillier, who was managing the census in France, is quite neutral on the question of telepathy. Of the 1600 answers already received, 183 (11½ per cent.) are affirmative, and 24 (1½ per cent.) are prima facie coincidental; both proportions being larger than previous experience had led him to anticipate.

THE BRITISH SCHOOL AT ATHENS.—(Wednesday, July 10.)

LORD CARNARVON in the chair.—There were present the Greek Minister, Lord Savile, Sir Charles Newton, Mr. F. C. Penrose, Prof. Jebb, the Provost of Oriel, Mr. R. A. Neil, Mr. Sidney Colvin, Mr. Walter Leaf, Mr. D. Bikélas, Mr. H. F. Pelham, Mr. D. G. Hogarth, Prof. Percy Gardner, Mr. J. T. Bent, Mr. Arthur Evans, Mr. Ernest Gardner, director of the British School at Athens, Mr. F. B. Tarbell, late director of the American School at Athens, Dr. W. O. Perry, and Mr. George A. Macmillan, secretary.—The secretary read the report of the School at Athens, of which the following were the most interesting passages:—"In the year which has passed since the last meeting of subscribers the school has done good work both in Athens and elsewhere. This third year of its existence has helped to establish its position among the other foreign institutes in Athens, and the committee are confident that the work now in hand and in prospect will serve to convince Englishmen generally of the advantage of such a centre of English energy on Greek soil. One recent incident deserves early mention. The director of the British school was invited by the Greek Government, together with the directors of the French, German, and American schools, to confer with M. Kavvadias, the superintendent of antiquities, as to the course which further excavations should take upon the Athenian Acropolis. The school has again undertaken the management of the excavations carried out in Cyprus on behalf of the Cyprus Exploration Fund. Two sites have been worked at—namely, Polités Chrysoschoon, the supposed site of the ancient Arsinoe, and Limniti. Mr. Ernest Gardner, the director of the school, superintended the early stages of the work at Polités, and then left it in the hands of two of the students, Mr. J. A. R. Munro and Mr. Arnold Tubbs, who succeeded Mr. Hogarth as Craven Travelling Fellow at Oxford. The results of the excavation have hardly been so striking as those that were obtained last year at Paphos; but, taken as a whole, the finds in Cypriot inscriptions and in works of art of various styles and periods—more especially in pottery and terra-cotta—are of very considerable interest. Meanwhile, in Athens Mr. R. W. Schultz has spent his second session at the school partly in carrying forward his work on Byzantine architecture begun last year, partly in making full-sized drawings of some of the more important mouldings in Greek architecture, as exemplified in the temples and other remains in Athens. The committee can speak in the highest terms of the manner, at once artistic and scientifically accurate, in which Mr. Schultz is doing this important work, and they are confident that the results will bring great credit to the school. The idea of reproducing the Greek mouldings to scale was first suggested by Mr. H. H. Statham, the editor of the Builder, and a small fund was raised through an appeal in that journal towards Mr. Schultz's expenses. It is intended that the drawings should ultimately be issued by subscription. The one difficulty which the school has still to face is on the financial side. The new donations and subscriptions received during the past year have been insignificant. The annual subscriptions stand as before at about £460. The grant of £100 from the University of Oxford has this year been renewed for another term of three years, and it is probable that the similar grant from the Hellenic Society will be renewed also. But neither these grants nor the balance of about £260 per annum contributed by individuals can be regarded as a permanent endowment. As the balance-sheet shows, there is now a balance of some £686 in hand to capital account. The committee propose to devote some part of this sum next session to excavation on some suitable site in Greece itself. The valuable results obtained by the French, German, and American schools by such researches on Greek soil may well inspire English students with generous emulation; and the committee feel no doubt that the subscribers will approve of this scheme, even though the products of the excavation must go to enrich the museums of Athens. Where other nations are content to devote money and labour to disinterested research, it is not to be supposed that Englishmen will show a less generous spirit. Indeed, the obligation upon them to assist in the noble work of unearthing the buried treasures of Greece is all the greater that they have at an earlier epoch become the possessors of such priceless relics as the Elgin marbles and the Phigalian frieze. The right of publication of the results would, of course, be reserved to the excavators, and should in itself be sufficient reward."—The chairman moved the adoption of the report. Such a school as that of Athens, he said, was a distinct and incalculable help towards the culture which lay at the root of the highest civilisation. Within the recollection of this generation, from Nineveh to Pompeii they had had most marvellous revelations. They had seen the palaces of Assyrian kings unveiled. They had had the past brought before them with amazing distinctness and vividness. During the last thirty or forty or fifty years the earth had given up in many parts her long-buried treasures, and in the school at Athens they recognised the value of studying all these materials upon the very spot where they were originally created. It was only a few years since that the school of Athens was founded. The Greek government, with great generosity, had given them a site. Funds were found without difficulty for the building of the house. A valuable library was in process of creation; and from the slopes of Hymettus, whence the house looked down, the eye could travel over some of the most famous scenes of Athenian history. Scholars and travellers might now enjoy the invaluable privilege of obtaining the best advice and guidance in their classical studies. The work the Greek government had done in the establishment of museums, both central and local, had been very great. They had sacrificed, no doubt, something of picturesque in sacrificing mediaeval Athens. But there were many other picturesque objects and ruins in the world. There was but one Athens of the Periclean age; and the Greek government had chosen, not unwisely, to restore to light and the knowledge of the present generation as distinctly and vividly as they could that marvellous and unique era in the world's history. There never would be such an age again, such an efflorescence of genius and of the human intellect. The object which they all had at heart was in danger of suffering from want of funds. It must not be forgotten either that the British School at Athens was in generous rivalry with similar schools of other nations. But there was this difference. France, with that clear intellectual and artistic instinct which had so long distinguished her, even in the midst of great national calls upon her purse, had found means for subsidising her school; and Germany, with her great love of research, had also thought the object worthy of national expenditure. America, out of the fulness of her liberality, had subscribed generously to her school; Italy, it was said, contemplated the establishment of a school, and would doubtless in some form endow it. It was, therefore, his melancholy duty as chairman to say that the subscriptions were hardly equal to the objects in view, and he could only trust that their appeal would meet with such a response as the object deserved.—Sir Charles Newton, in seconding the resolution, said that he did so with the more satisfaction that he was one of the original founders of the school. Notwithstanding the zeal which many English scholars had shown in the work of the school, we had been far outstripped by the French and Germans. German scholars had published wonderful collections of Athenian inscriptions, and the excavations of France in the island of Delos had brought marvellous results to the light; and both nations had issued publications on recent archaeological discoveries which put our puny efforts to shame.—The resolution for the adoption of the report was unanimously carried.—Mr. Munro, Provost of Oriel, moved, and Dr. Perry seconded, the re-appointment of officers.—Mr. Ernest Gardner then gave an account of the work of the past session at Athens and in Cyprus, and Mr. Schultz gave an interesting account of the drawings and mouldings.—Mr. Sidney Colvin then read the report of the Committee of the Cyprus Exploration Fund, from which the following are extracts:—"In the summer of 1888 Mr. Hogarth carried out a general archaeological survey of the island, and the University of Oxford has shown its sense of the value of his labours by voting a sum of £100 for the publication of their results. Satisfactory arrangements having been made with Mr. Williamson, the owner of the site, and leave to excavate having been obtained from the government, Mr. Ernest Gardner, director of the British School at Athens, and Mr. J. A. B. Munro, Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, began operations on February 14, and Mr. H. Arnold Tubbs, of Pembroke College, Oxford, joined them two days later. Mr. Williamson's vineyard, which was first tried, proved unproductive. Excavations were then begun on a site south-east of the village, and about twenty tombs were opened. In these were found a great quantity of Cypriote pottery, black glazed ware, terra-cotta figures, mostly of poor workmanship, objects of bronze and iron, such as strigils, knives, and mirrors, alabaster, vases of various styles, glass, a little jewelry, and two inscriptions in Cypriote character. Although the large majority of tombs opened seemed to be Ptolemaic, it appeared that some of them were reconstructions of older sepulchres. Among the objects found were several black-figured cylices, dating from about 500 B.C., fragments of a red-figured vase, coloured white and gold in parts, and of two or three red-figured fifth-century vases, and the upper half of a large inscribed marble stèle with the head and shoulders of a male figure of fair style. The find of Cypriote pottery was large, and the vases with figurines were numerous, the best of them being one with elaborate patterns in dull purple-black on the ruddy ground of the natural clay. The jewelry was more plentiful than good; but a pair of silver-plated bracelets with gilt rams' heads and an engraved haematite scarab deserve mention. Two probably early limestone capitals may also be noticed. Some addition has also been made to the materials for the study of Cypriote epigraphy. A full and scientific account of the first season's excavations, and of the archaeological results obtained, has been prepared by Messrs. Gardner, Hogarth, James, and Elsey Smith, and has been published in the Journal of Hellenic Studies. The subscriptions obtained in response to the appeal issued by the committee in the autumn of 1887 have been sufficient to defray the expense of the operations up to the present time. Now, however, the funds at their disposal are reduced to the sum of £175, as shown in the statement of accounts which accompanies the report; and it is necessary for them to appeal for further subscriptions in order that they may be able to continue a work which has already yielded results of great importance. The High Commissioner, Sir Henry Bulwer, to whose support and kindness the committee have from the beginning of their work been especially indebted, has expressed a strong opinion in favour of their next operations being undertaken at Salamis.—Mr. Gennadius, the Greek minister, moved, and Prof Jebb seconded, a vote of thanks to Lord Carnarvon for presiding, which was cordially passed and briefly acknowledged.

FINE ART.

THE SCOTTISH NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

It will be remembered that, in 1882, an unknown donor offered to the Board of Manufactures for Scotland a sum of £10,000 to aid in the formation and maintenance of a Scottish National Portrait Gallery, provided an equal sum were voted by Parliament for the same purpose; and that, after his condition had been complied with, when difficulty arose as to the housing of the new institution, the same donor offered a further sum of £20,000 (which sum has since, we understand, owing to an extension of the original plan, been doubled in amount) for the erection of a building to contain the collection of the Portrait Gallery and that of the Museum of the Society of Antiquaries—both of them national property, and the latter a very rich archaeological collection, which had long suffered from the confined and insufficient nature of the accommodation provided for its preservation in the Royal Institution, Edinburgh. The only stipulation made by the donor, whose generous action formed a precedent for that of the recent anonymous benefactor of the National Portrait Gallery, London, was that a suitable and isolated site should be provided; and this requirement was met by the combined action of the Treasury and the Board of Manufactures, who acquired the needful space of ground in Queen-street. The Galleries, whose erection was entrusted to Dr. Rowand Anderson, the architect of the new Edinburgh University Buildings, are now sufficiently advanced to permit of the portraits already acquired by the institution being removed to a portion of that half of the building which they are permanently to occupy; and here the inauguration ceremony was performed last Monday by the Marquis of Lothian, the Secretary of State for Scotland, one of the members of the Board. It was then announced that the donor, so long anonymous, was Mr. J. R. Findlay, a well-known Edinburgh citizen, one of the proprietors of the Scotsman newspaper.

The Galleries are a large and massive structure of red Dumfriesshire stone, of thirteenth-century Gothic, with ample wings, not as yet completed, decorated with lofty angle turrets; and a line of canopied niches, designed for the reception of the statues of eminent Scotsmen, runs along the sides of the windows of the first floor. Five very spacious galleries have been assigned to the Portrait Gallery, and nearly equal accommodation in the eastern half of the building falls to the lot of the Museum of Antiquities; while a number of smaller apartments, suitable for print rooms, offices, &c., will be available when the wings are completed.

The Portrait Gallery has entered at present upon the occupation of two galleries on the first floor, connected by a series of open Gothic arches. Each gallery is some 80 by 26 feet in size; and both have been completely filled by the portraits and works of portrait-sculpture which the Board of Manufactures have already been able to bring together. These have been obtained from various sources. A number of interesting Scottish portraits have been deposited by the Society of Antiquaries, to whom they had been presented by various of their fellows, especially by Dr. David Laing, the well-known antiquary, who gave his donation with the distinct view of their finally forming part of a national collection of Scottish portraiture—a project which, like his friend, Thomas Carlyle, he had deeply at heart, as may be seen from the correspondence between the two on the subject, which will be found in Carlyle's collected works. Among the portraits for which the Gallery is indebted to Dr. Laing may be mentioned those of Lord President Sir George Lockhart, James Tassie, Field-Marshal Wade, Dr. Henry, the historian, and the very interesting "Bath miniature" of Sir Walter Scott as a child.

A series of highly important pictures—works fulfilling the requirements of the Portrait Gallery as representing eminent Scotsmen—have been removed from the National Gallery on the Mound. Some of these are the property of the Board of Manufactures, others are the property of the Royal Scottish Academy; and they include Raeburn's noble full-length equestrian portrait of Prof. John Wilson in his youth, Watson-Gordon's full-lengths of Sir William Gibson Craig, and of Lords Cockburn and Rutherford; Colvin Smith's portraits of Sir Ralph Abercromby and the second Lord Melville; and Beechey's half-length of Sir David Wilkie.

Among the more important of the works that have been presented to the Gallery may be named one of the last portraits of Sir Walter Scott, that painted by Sir Francis Grant at Abbotsford in 1831, when the great novelist was dictating Count Robert of Paris to his faithful amanuensis Laidlaw; an excellent three-quarter length of Dr. William Veitch, of the Greek Verbs, the finest of the works of the late James Irvine; a portrait of Principal Tulloch, by Robert Herdman, R.S.A.; and, among the most recent acquisitions, a half-length of Mrs. Grant of Laggan, by James Tannock; and a full-length of Sir George Harvey, P.R.S.A., painting in his studio—one of a series of similar works executed by John Ballantyne, R.S.A.

Among the works that have been purchased by the Gallery are several interesting examples of regal portraiture. These include an old version of the portrait of Mary Queen of Scots, of the Clouet type, similar to the drawing in the Bibliothèque de St. Geneviève, Paris, and to the oil picture in the royal collection at Windsor; an imposing full-length of George II. by his court-painter Shackleton, formerly at Coldbrook Park, Monmouthshire; similar full-length ceremonial portraits, in coronation robes, of George III. and his Queen, excellent examples of Allan Ramsay; and a half-length of Queen Caroline of Anspach, attributed to Amigoni; while among the more modern works are two admirable Raeburn portraits, those of Neil Gow and Prof. Dalziel; an excellent Lawrence portrait of George IV.; his queen, by Samuel Lane; and Thomas Campbell the poet, painted by Henry Room in 1841.

The works of sculpture, busts, and statues, number nearly fifty, including Henry Mackenzie, "The Man of Feeling," by Joseph; Lord Eldin, by the same excellent sculptor; Prof. Edward Forbes, Thomas de Quincey, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, and Sir John McNeill, by Sir John Steell, R.S.A.; and, among several examples of Chantrey, two especially fine works, his busts of Prof. Playfair and Allan Cunningham, the latter believed to be unique.

A distinctly interesting feature of the Gallery is a series of about forty examples of the pencil portraiture, usually on the scale of life, of John Brown, a Scottish portraitist of the latter part of the eighteenth century, who resided for the most part in Italy. The greater part of this series was commissioned by the celebrated David, Earl of Buchan, the founder of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and represents the early fellows of the society—men like Paton and Cardonnel, Smellie and Denchar. But we have also several attractive examples of his female portraiture, as well as heads of Lord Monboddo, the learned but eccentric author of the Origin of Language; of the Rev. John Logan, the poet; of Principal John Hunter, the classical scholar; and of the first Lord Meadowbank, a talented Scottish judge.

One other department of the Gallery deserves its word of mention: the collection of medallion portraits, one very extensive and indeed approaching completeness—so far as the artist's rendering of personages of mark is concerned—of James Tassie, a modeller who did for the eminent Englishmen and Scotsmen of the latter part of the eighteenth century much what David d'Angers did for the Frenchmen of the succeeding generation. This series is supplemented by a few of the works of William Tassie, the nephew and successor of the more accomplished artist of that name, and of John Henning, H.R.S.A., the reproducer of the Elgin marbles, who executed many valuable medallion portraits upon similar lines to the Tassies.

In addition to the works permanently acquired by the Gallery or deposited in it upon lengthened loan, some seventy portraits have been received from their owners for a period of two years. Of these, the most important is a series of works lent by the Duke of Hamilton, portraying several of the most celebrated of his ancestors; and another series of works lent from Oxenford by Lord Stair, one of the directors of the Gallery.

It may be said that the Scottish National Portrait Gallery begins its career under favourable and auspicious circumstances, and that it has already brought together a collection of works which form a distinct addition to the historical and artistic attractions of the northern capital. It is, however, to be regretted that the funds at present at the disposal of its directors are little more than sufficient for its maintenance, that its enlargement by purchase must be a very gradual and tardy process, and that—like too many Scottish institutions of a similar nature, the National Gallery of Scotland itself, for example—its extension must for the most part be due to private gifts and bequests.

EXCAVATIONS IN THE FAYUM.

Bromley, Kent.

MY past season's work in Egypt has proved of more importance than the results in any previous year. The details of the opening of the pyramid of Hawara (Amenemhat III.) and of its contents have been already described. Besides that, in a large tomb of the XXVIth Dynasty were found a series of mummies, each bearing a full set of amulets. Moreover, built into solid masonry, in a second chamber of this tomb, was a stone sarcophagus, containing three wooden coffins, one in the other, which enclosed a very rich mummy. The amulets upon it were seventeen in gold, of exquisite work, four being inlaid cloisonnée with minute stonework, and over a hundred cut and engraved in carnelian, beryl, lazuli, &c., of the finest class. This set stands to ordinary amulets much as Aah-hotep's jewellery is to ordinary bracelets and rings. Of course, it was selected for the Bulak Museum. Within the sarcophagus were also four canopic jars in alabaster, curiously varying in size, though all alike inscribed for the deceased Horuta. And on either side of the sarcophagus, in closed recesses in the masonry, were 200 ushabtis of the highest finish and unusual size. The labour of opening this sarcophagus was considerable. For three months work was going on night and day to draw out the blocks of masonry, and to cut and raise the enormous lid, which was nearly submerged. The extraction of the coffins was also difficult, as they were almost out of arm's reach beneath the bitter and acrid water, and set firmly in a packing of hard sand, so that it needed my own work for three days in the water to obtain the precious contents. The position of every amulet was, of course, recorded, so that they will appear in their proper order at Bulak.

At Illahun, the pyramid which stands at the mouth of the Fayum, on the side of the Nile valley, was attacked, but has not yet yielded. The sites of the temple, and of a shrine joining the pyramid, have been cleared; and the name of Usertesen II. was repeatedly found, showing whose this pyramid is. The cemetery around the pyramid has been all plundered anciently, and re-used in the XXIst-XXVth Dynasties. The foundation deposit of the temple was found in a central cavity, with much pottery and many strings of uniform carnelian beads (possibly a standard of exchange like cowries), but no inscriptions or cartouches, only the models of tools and corn-rubbers. This—of Usertesen II.—is the only deposit before the XXVIth Dynasty yet examined.

Adjoining the temple is a town, evidently laid out by the architect for the workmen and stores of the pyramid and temple building. It is enclosed by a wall square with the temple, and consists of ranks of chambers all laid out regularly and in even numbers of cubits. The objects found are mostly of the XIIth, with some of the XIIIth, Dynasty. Of later times there are only a few casual burials in the ruins. The domestic objects of the XIIth Dynasty are, therefore, now fully revealed to us—pottery, beads, bronze and wooden tools, and flint tools, some set in wood. A large number of papyri, many in perfect condition, have also been recovered. These will, at least, show the writing and usages of the XIIth Dynasty, for which but few examples have been yet available; and we may hope for some historical light also from such a series.

A few miles distant I discovered another town, occupied in the end of the XVIIIth and the XIXth Dynasties, but ruined already in the time of Seti II. This yielded all the domestic objects, pottery, tools, &c., of that age, and a large number of beads in stone, glass, and glazed. Two splendid bronze pans, still polished and flexible, and bearing inscriptions, were found here, and are now at Bulak. And in tombs of this age were three fine statuettes in wood, also now at Bulak.

A later cemetery of the XXth Dynasty lies near the town, and another of the Ptolemaic age. This last has yielded a large quantity of papyri from the cartonnage of the mummies, both in demotic and Greek. The latter are largely the ephemerides of Ptolemy Philadelphos, giving the daily decrees. I also found three large deeds of the fifth century, A.D., at Hawara, quite complete; and I have obtained a mass of Coptic and Arabic papyri, mostly broken, from a deir.

But the great results of this season have been in the archaeology of the Mediterranean. They are so surprising that I cannot expect them to be accepted without the full evidence, and only an outline of that can be attempted here. In the town of the XIXth Dynasty, about 1200 B.C., pottery of the Mykenesian and Thera styles was found, unquestionably associated with Egyptian objects of that age. A foreign settlement existed here, as a man named An-tursha was buried here, with some light-haired people, and all the weights found are un-Egyptian. On the pottery of this town are Cypriote and Phoenician or Greek letters incised, found, in some cases, even under the house-walls. Over a hundred examples have been collected, and the whole evidence points to both of these alphabets having existed in the thirteenth century, B.C.

Further, in the town of the pyramid builders, about 2500 B.C., were found various Cypriote letters incised on pottery which is utterly distinct from that of the XIXth Dynasty above mentioned. In one case, a letter was found on a jar buried in the floor of a room over which was a papyrus of the XIIth Dynasty in the rubbish. All the evidence here points to this alphabet having been used before 2000 B.C. Foreign influence is shown by non-Egyptian weights being found here. Some Mediterranean pottery was also discovered, quite different from that of the XIXth Dynasty town and presumably earlier in style. Considering that the Cypriote alphabet must be earlier than the Phoenician settlements in Cyprus, as otherwise it could not have obtained a footing in face of the Phoenician alphabet, we need not deny the possibility of its existence at such a date as we here arrive at.

The collections will shortly reach England, and be publicly exhibited from September 16 to October 5, at 8, Oxford Mansions, near Oxford Circus, though they will be accessible to students at an earlier date. I have had the benefit of discussion with Prof. Sayce and Mr. Hamilton Lang on this subject, and I hope that they will state what their own conclusions may be after studying the materials and evidence.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE committee who managed the Stuart Exhibition last winter have decided to divide the sum of £600—representing their share of surplus receipts, after the payment of all expenses—between the National Portrait Galleries of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

DURING the first days of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will sell a choice collection of porcelain, enamels, carved ivory, &c., the property of a gentleman who has relinquished the pursuit. There are included some examples of the scarce Swansea china, and a series of richly decorated mugs.

The "Angélus" of Millet, which sold for £22,000 at the recent Secrétan sale in Paris, will after all go to America. In face of the opposition raised against paying this sensational price from the public purse—an opposition which came not so much from the economists as from the more sober critics (see the Courrier de l'Art for July 12)—it was felt impossible to press the vote on the Chamber of Deputies. But satisfaction is expressed that Courbet's masterpiece, "Remise de Chevreuils," has been acquired for the Louvre.

A CONFERENCE of the delegates of all the leading county archaeological societies was held at the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries at Burlington House, on Wednesday last, July 17. Upwards of forty members were in attendance. Mr. John Evans, president of the Society of Antiquaries, who was in the chair, announced that only a single society of the large number that had been invited to join the union had declined their invitation. The first subject for discussion was the formation of county archaeological maps, on the plan already accomplished by Mr. Payne for Kent; and the following resolution, proposed by the Rev. Dr. Cox, and seconded by Mr. Ralph Neville, was unanimously carried: "That each local society be requested to take into consideration the desirability of placing on record on the large ordnance maps of the county with which they are concerned all the local names of fields and all relics of antiquity for which a locality can be fixed; and that such maps should be kept in duplicate, so that eventually a copy may be deposited with the Society of Antiquaries." The question of the preservation of ancient monuments and buildings was next discussed. General Pitt-Rivers, inspector of ancient monuments, gave an interesting account of the working of the Act under which he was appointed. Eventually, Mr. J. T. Micklethwaite proposed, and Mr. Leveson-Gower seconded, the following resolution: "That all local societies be requested to be on the watch against any wilful or injudicious destruction of ancient monuments or buildings, so as at once to bring local opinion to bear against the destroyers; and that in cases that appear to be of national importance, the aid of the Society of Antiquaries, or of the inspector of ancient monuments, be invoked." A third subject brought before the conference was the publication of parish registers, introduced by Mr. Ralph Neville, about which there was some little difference of opinion. The result was the nomination of a small committee to deal with the subject and to report to the different societies in union. The Rev. Dr. Cox brought forward the subject of provincial records, and spoke in favour of the proposal to make county councils responsible for their due preservation. After much discussion, the general opinion seemed to be that the delegates could not pledge themselves to the support of any definite scheme at the present conference; but it was moved by Dr. Cox, and seconded by Mr. W. G. Hardy, and unanimously carried: "That the attention of the local societies in union be called to the proposed Bill entitled an Act for the Preservation of Public and Private Records, which it appears may provide for a long-recognised want." The next conference was fixed for July, 1890.

MUSIC.

"DIE MEISTERSINGER" AT COVENT GARDEN.

It is a little over seven years since Wagner's comic opera was produced at Drury Lane under the direction of Herr Richter. It was an admirable performance, and the work was universally admired. It was heard again, though under less favourable conditions, in 1884 with another German company, but under the same conductor. After the success attending these representations it seemed likely that Mr. Carl Rosa would include the opera in his repertoire. The years, however, rolled by, and the Mastersingers put in no appearance. Mr. Augustus Harris, at last, has revived the work, and it was given last Saturday at Covent Garden in Italian. Strange indeed was it to hear the congregation in the church of St. Katherine in Nuremberg singing their concluding hymn in Italian, and to hear the cobbler-poet Hans Sachs talking in Tuscan. And not only was it strange, but also somewhat risky; for in Wagner there is an intimate connexion between tone and word. While greatly preferring the German language, we are bound to say that Signor G. Mazzucato, in his Italian version, has tried as much as possible to reproduce the spirit of the original libretto.

The performance of the work was certainly not all that one could wish, but there was a great deal in it to be admired. Walter, the young Franconian knight, with his rhapsodising and love-making, needs a representative with a good voice and a good appearance, and M. Jean de Beake has both. He was magnificent in the trial scene, and in the songs of the last act, and contributed greatly towards the general success. Mme. Albani was not well suited in the rôle of Eva. She sang well, of course, though not with her accustomed assurance; but most likely she found her task one of unusual difficulty. Mdlle. Bauermeister was a pleasing Magdalena. M. Lassalle deserves high praise for the manner in which he rendered the music allotted to Sachs; but his appearance was too youthful, so that in the second act one could scarcely agree with him when he said to Eva

"Bambina, è troppo . . . vecchio per te."

Sig. Isardon was the Beckmesser. This personage, who is not only town-clerk, but such an authority in all matters concerning the Tabulatur that he is appointed "Marker" by the Singers' Guild, is an extremely difficult one to portray. He does most ridiculous things, but all the time he is in earnest. He is learned in the arts of poetry and song, and his learning makes him conceited. He is really in love with the goldsmith's daughter, and this love makes him act foolishly. But any conscious attempt on the part of the actor to excite laughter spoils the picture. The more serious he is, the more comical does he appear in his conduct. Sig. Isardon tried at times to amuse the audience, and, therefore, his impersonation was by no means an ideal one. Nevertheless, some of his acting was excellent, and he sang his difficult part with great accuracy. M. Montariol made a capital David, M. Winogradoff a good Kothner, and Signor Abramoff a dignified Pogner. The choruses in the last act were sung with great spirit. Signor Mancinelli conducted with much care, but was evidently at times feeling rather than showing the way. For a first performance of so difficult a work, and one new both to vocalists and orchestra, every excuse ought, however, to be made.

The performance commenced at 7.30, and was not over until past midnight, and yet there were cuts. Anyone wishing to hear the whole opera must go to Baireuth. The greater part of the audience remained till the end, when there was hearty applause.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

M^DM^E. BACKER-GRONDBAHL gave a recital at Princes' Hall last Saturday afternoon, in which she appeared both as pianist and composer. Some of her songs were gracefully sung by Miss L. Phillips, and they are very delicate and thoughtful compositions. As in Grieg's songs, the pianoforte plays an important part, and to this, of course, the lady did full justice. She played also a pianoforte suite of her own, charmingly written for the instrument. The music is clever and taking. The last three movements—a Gavotte, Menuet, and Finale—are the most characteristic. The Suite will probably be taken up by other pianists. Mdme. Gröndhal and M. J. Wolff gave an excellent performance of Grieg's Sonata for piano and violin in C minor (No. 4).

SIGNOR DE PICCOLELLIS, a cello player, was heard to advantage in a showy Servais Concerto at his concert at Steinway Hall on Monday afternoon. He has a fine tone, and brilliant execution. Signor Tosti appeared for the only time in public this season, and sang some of his songs with immense success. Two movements from Rubinstein's B flat Trio were well rendered by Signor Albanesi, Signor Papini, and the concert-giver. The programme included solos for pianoforte and for violin. The hall was crowded.

A NEW wedding anthem, "O Perfect Love," has been expressly composed by Mr. Joseph Barnby for the royal marriage, and will be included in the service with the sanction of the Queen and the Prince of Wales.

THE death is announced of Carl Zoeller, who was well known as a performer upon the viola d'amore, for the resuscitation of which he was an able and fervid advocate. Herr Zoeller was born in 1840. He studied at Berlin, and came to this country in 1873. In 1879 he became bandmaster of the 7th (Queen's Own) Hussars, and of the 2nd Life Guards in 1886. He possessed a fine collection of wind and string instruments, and also a library of rare musical books.

LITERATURE.

THE FINANCES OF THE LONG PARLIAMENT.

Calendar of the Proceedings of the Committee for Advances of Money, 1642-1656 Edited by Mary Anne Everett Green. (Printed at H.M. Stationery Office.)

Few things are more desirable for the historian than to have a correct idea of the financial history of the period of which he treats; and he will, therefore, be likely to hope much from the Calendars upon which Mrs. Everett Green is at present engaged, as they deal with the various committees appointed by the Long Parliament for the receipt of money. Unfortunately, the Long Parliament appears to have had no idea of the value of a balance sheet of revenue and expenditure, and nothing of the kind seems at any time to have been prepared. It had no Chancellor of the Exchequer, nor does it seem to have felt the necessity for one. It lived from hand to mouth, gathering in money from all available sources, and issuing it out to meet its almost innumerable needs by separate orders upon the committees charged with the duty of enforcing payment. We can tell, indeed, from the declared accounts of the Audit Office, what amount was brought in by the customs for each year in succession after 1643, and what was the amount of the excise on an average of three particular years, and of the Royalist compositions spread over a much longer period. But all this, though it enables us to obtain an approximate knowledge of certain heads of receipt, does not help us very far; and we are entirely unable to discover what was the deficit on each year's proceedings, or to test the truth of the charge, frequently brought by contemporary pamphleteers, that the Long Parliament intentionally abstained from introducing order into its accounts, lest it should throw obstacles in the way of speculation.

It is not, however, with these larger considerations that Mrs. Green is concerned, at all events for the present. She has to give an account of the records of the committees, many of which have been lost or destroyed. The one with which she is now concerned—the Committee for Advance of Money—was appointed on November 26, 1642, to collect loans for the public service, on which the public faith was pledged for the repayment of the capital, and for the payment, in the meanwhile, of eight per cent. The committee met at Haberdashers' Hall. To this loan—contribution to which was compulsory—persons were assessed at one-twentieth of their real and one-fifth of their personal estate. Those who evaded payment had their goods and lands seized. Those whose total property did not exceed £100 in value were exempted.

Gradually, as the Parliament increased its power, the committee was restrained to dealing with Royalists alone; and in April, 1650, its original functions were combined with those of enforcing compositions from delinquents. Of the mode of treating delinquents Mrs. Everett Green gives a full and clear account; and she will doubtless have more to tell us when she comes to deal with the important Committee for Compounding, which sat in Goldsmiths' Hall.

The depositions contained in the present volume, which is issued in three parts, as Mrs. Everett Green tells us, "frequently contain details valuable for family pedigrees, while the particulars of estates and debts give full accounts of the financial position of the individual concerned." There are, however, some particulars of more general interest to be gleaned from them, and especially we have at p. 685 two unpublished letters of Cromwell.

SAMUEL R. GARDINER.

French and English: a Comparison. By Philip Gilbert Hamerton. (Macmillan.)

MR. HAMERTON quotes a saying of Mr. James Payn to the effect that "the habit of literary lying is almost universal in England."

"The temptation to it [he adds] is certainly very strong. It is the same temptation that induces painters to over-colour for the exhibitions. Writing which guards and keeps the delicacy of an exquisite honesty, writing which says exactly what the writer feels, and refuses to go beyond his feeling; such writing can rarely appear forcible, especially in comparison with work that is done for force alone, without any regard for truth."

It is refreshing to find an author with such an ideal of style, and Mr. Hamerton has realised his own ideal.

For fineness of observation it would be difficult to match the following passage about "manners" in the writings of any English moralist:

"Manners are often worst in the most industrious and advanced parts of the country. In the Highlands of Scotland, where industrial civilisation is almost unknown, popular manners are excellent; in some parts of the Lowlands they are rude, repellent, and unsympathetic. The best English manners are to be found in certain rural districts, the worst in thriving and energetic Lancashire. Too much energy is unfavourable to the best behaviour, which grows to perfection among idlers, or in agricultural and pastoral communities, where folks work in a leisurely fashion and have many spare moments on their hands.

"Manners always represent an ideal of some kind. The English way of behaviour seems to stand for dignity, the French for grace. Manners in both countries are more the representation of self in outward forms than any evidence of real consideration for the person to whom they are addressed. The Englishman wishes to convey the idea that he himself has dignity, that he is a gentleman; the Frenchman is anxious to show that he is a witty and accomplished man of the world. . . . The virtues of English behaviour are chiefly of a negative kind, and those of French behaviour positive. An Englishman is pleasant because he is not noisy, not troublesome, not obtrusive, not contradictory, and because he has the tact to avoid conversational pitfalls and precipices. The Frenchman is agreeable because he is lively, is amusing, is amiable, is successful in the battle against dulness, and will take trouble to make conversation interesting."

For wisdom and calmness of judgment Mr. Hamerton's remarks about the value of international friendships deserve special attention:

"There will never be any firm friendship between England and France, and a momentary attachment would only cause me anxiety on account of the inevitable reaction. All I hope for, and all that seems to me really desirable, is simply mutual consideration. That is possible, that is attainable; in the higher minds of both countries (with a few exceptions) it exists already. If it existed generally in the people it would be enough to prevent bloodshed."

Mr. Hamerton's comparison of the two nations follows a very methodical order. He compares them step by step in reference to education, patriotism, politics, religion, virtues, custom, and society. The chapters on the virtues (which are philosophically classified under the heads of truth, justice, purity, temperance, thrift, cleanliness, and courage) abound in suggestive observations. The remarks about journalistic truthfulness (or mendacity) in both countries seem open to objection.

"Like political parties, the nations themselves are enemies, and consider it a legitimate part of the chronic warfare that is maintained between them to say whatever may be to each other's disadvantage, provided only that it has a chance of being believed.

"I notice, however, a difference in kind and quality between French and English lying. The French are daring enough, but they are not really clever in the art. They have much audacity, but little skill. They will say what is not true with wonderful decision, and they will stick to it afterwards; but the English surpass them infinitely in craft and guile. The typical French lie is a simple, shameless invention. The typical English lie is not merely half a truth; it is entangled with half a dozen truths, or semblances of truths."

Would it not be truer to say that writers of leading articles in the daily press of both countries are persons who do their work in a hurry, and have to write on a great variety of topics without special knowledge and without time to master the facts of the case. In France the public simply wishes to be amused; and the French journalist dispenses with fact altogether, or only uses it as a groundwork for his own imagination. The English public expects to be informed, and its newspaper writers must do their best to get up the facts as they can in the time allowed.

Mr. Hamerton shows impartiality and discrimination in defending French morals against the charge alternately founded on one or other of the following arguments:

"1. Novelists draw from life; consequently, as adultery is almost universal in French novels, it must be equally common in French life.

"2. French people purchase novels about adultery in great numbers; consequently, the readers of these books must commit adultery themselves."

What courtship and the "preliminaries" of marriage are to the English novelist, matrimony and the trials and temptations of married life are to the French. Each considers the question from the side which is most interesting to his readers.

"Before marriage [in France], anything more intimate than respectful politeness on the part of the gentleman, and reserve on the part of the lady, is looked upon as a sign of ill-breeding. . . . French decorum keeps up a much stronger barrier between the sexes than English decorum does."

Another consideration is that to French young people marriage comes as a matter of course, in its own season, with little or no forethought of their own, and without the excitement of chance or uncertainty. French parents—and especially French mothers—regulate everything: their income, their mode of life, their choice of acquaintance, and what they can of their surroundings, with a view to their children's marriage. Can a French novelist dramatise a young lady during the period of ceremonious courtship, while she is receiving from the accepted suitor the exact number of visits and bouquets prescribed by etiquette and decorum? And can an English novelist make a romantic heroine of an English bride just returned from her wedding tour? Marriage is a French girl's first introduction to life, and with it begins the interest that we can feel in her. Instead of saying that pure love is the theme of English novels, and adulterous love of French novels, we should be nearer the truth if we said that married life occupies a prominent place in French fiction, while it disappears from the scene of English literature. Besides this, Mr. Hamerton points out that there are fewer novel readers in France than in England.

"Many Frenchwomen do not read novels at all, others are extremely careful in their choice. All pious women naturally avoid impure literature, and they are a numerous class. Girls are usually limited, in fiction, to translations from English stories and to a few harmless French ones. The habit of novel-reading seems even to vary with localities. . . . At Asnières out of a hundred volumes asked for in the libraries, eighty-six are novels; while at St. Denis we find them suddenly falling to twelve in the hundred. . . . Other places vary between these extremes."

More impurity is read in France by a limited class of readers, and more silly trash by an unlimited number of English readers. After all, trash is not without its dangers, especially when consumed in such quantities by the young of both sexes.

Mr. Hamerton's conclusion on this delicate subject seems to us more comprehensive than the facts of the case will warrant.

"I have no doubt," he says, "that England is the more moral country of the two, even in practice, and much more in principle and in feeling."

We would prefer to suspend judgment for want of sufficient evidence, and would say that more reserve is observed in English literature and society upon these and other matters.

WILLIAM MARKHEIM.

TWO NEW TRANSLATIONS OF "FAUST."

Goethe's Faust. Part I. Translated by Alfred Henry Huth. (Sampson Low.)

Goethe's Faust. Part II. Translated by James Adey Birds. (Longmans.)

MR. HUTH informs us in his Preface that there are already "forty odd translations of Faust before the public." There is an awkward ambiguity about this statement; but, if we take it in its more innocent sense, it is surely untrue of the whole poem, though true of Part I. Mr. Huth thinks the fact "a compliment to Goethe"; and so, in some measure, it is, just as the countless attempts to translate Horace's Odes prove the eternal attraction of that author, not only in the eyes of scholars, but in those of men who can remember their classical education. But it proves also that no existing translation has impressed the world with a sense of finality. Of the original Faust, much was written in the lifetime of men still living; if in this century the literary talent of England—seldom slow to appreciate good poetry—cannot produce a satisfactory translation of Faust, there must be some special difficulty in the task. The curious moral doubt that withheld Coleridge from an undertaking for which he had such splendid qualifications is not, I imagine, widely shared. Few people think Faust immoral: to conceive of the whole work as being so is the privilege of extreme Puritans and of the rather too numerous class who pronounce philippics against books they have not read.

But a translation, without being wholly satisfactory, may be interesting and even admirable. I cannot understand anyone reading the version of Bayard Taylor, or that of Sir Theodore Martin, without keen pleasure. The former has the bolder and freer spirit, the latter the more graceful and melodious touch. The difficulty is that Goethe had both the qualities, in a high degree, which the two translators have divided between them. The task requires, among other things, the mystical vision and lyrical faculty of Coleridge, with some of the unconventional daring of Browning. Who is sufficient for these things? And, putting aside ideals, let us ask—What rank among translators is reached by Mr. Huth?

To me it appears that his version is vitiated, both in rhyme and metre, but especially in the former, by being slipshod. It was begun in boyhood (see Preface) and continued during "an accident of leisure in a country house," the result being, I think, that the boyish crudities have been too tenderly treated, and the sense of the form and grace of the original, which continuous work at the poem would surely have conferred, is only occasionally present. Here is an example, and rather a favourable example, of the translation—the farewell of Faust to the setting sun (pp. 47, 48):

"It sinks and fades, the day is now o'rdone,
Yonder it hurries, and new life doth make.
Oh, that I had now wings to soar upon!
And follow, follow ever in its wake.
I'd at my feet see the world, still,
Bathed in eternal evening beams:
Each valley quiet, all lit up each hill,
The silver brooklet flowing to gilt streams.
Not bounded in would then my Godlike flight
By rugged mount and all its chasms be.
Already doth, with its warm bays, the sea
Show itself my astonished sight.
But now, at length, the God appears to sink;
An impulse new doth wake my mind;
I hurry forth his eterne light to drink.
The day before me, and the night behind,
The heavens above me, and under me the sea."

There is some spirit here, and a good line or two; but how rough and ill-ordered it is!

The antithesis of "silver" and "gilt" is "most tolerable and not to be endured." The succeeding couplet is all dishevelled in order, and the next one is barely grammar. Yet here the rhyming is pretty fair; but what shall be said of the following (p. 149):

"The wretch! the robber of his childer!
And all this misery—want beside,
Could not this scandalous life hinder!"

or of the rhyming (on p. 7) of "callous" with "inharmonious"; and (p. 15) of "purpose" with "notorious"; and (p. 20) "passing" with "ring"; and (p. 29) "nurture" with "sculpture"; and (p. 52) "be" with "fancy"! As to Wagner's words, on p. 51:

"He grow's, misdoubts, doth on his belly lay,
He wags his tail—all doggy way. . . .
A droll and pleasant beast it be!"

they are really as careless as Byron's, without his vigour. And why does Valentine's gruff warning:

"Nun soll es an ein Schädelspalten," appear (p. 191) as

"Eftsoon thy two skulls shall be split";

as if Mephistopheles were a kind of two-headed nightingale? Worst of all, perhaps, is the rendering of Margaret's immortal sigh:

"Doch—alles, was mich dazu trieb, Gott, war so gut! ach, war so lieb!"

by

"And yet all that me to it led
So dainty was! so enchanted!"

For Mr. Huth's fancy (see Preface, p. vii.) for rendering German proper names into English equivalents—"Frog" for "Frosch," "Margery" for "Gretchen," &c.—there is, perhaps, something to be said. But then, if we proceed logically, we must go further. We ought (e.g.), if I mistake not, to have transliterated Jezebel into Isabella. In any case, there can be no good reason why, in the final scene—in the translation of which Mr. Huth shows a good deal of spirit—"Heinrich" should thrice appear as "Henry," once as "Harry." Is it quite correct, too, to render Margaret's cry, "Heinrich! Mir grant's vor dir," by "Henry! I recoil from thee!"? Is it not "I shudder for thee"—i.e., at seeing in whose company you come, and with whom you part from me? What Mr. Huth has forgotten, it seems to me, is that the original, however much it may vary in subject and style, is, as German—so Coleridge admits while disparaging the poem as a whole—"very pure and fine," and does not deal in slipshod and inharmonious rhyme and awkward inversions. Such defects appearing in the translation cannot be compensated by the rhymes being in the same place, and the lines being of the same number, as in the original. Mr. Huth, in short, has shown more love than skill.

Mr. Birds's version of Part II. is a more important performance. It is better, I think, than his own rendering of Part I. It has less dulness and stiffness, though it still fails to catch the "free onward impulse" of the original, that shifts from grave to gay, from Elfand to German courts, from the Mothers to the old moth-pestered cell, from the laboratory to the classical Walpurgis Night, wherein are both small and great beasts, and so back to the crags and chasms of the actual world. The perfect rendering will never come, save from a translator who can wear the seven-leagued boots, and follow Goethe's allegory as readily as his language. This Mr. Birds cannot do; not even Sir Theodore Martin or Bayard Taylor could do it, though the latter "magnis excidit ausis." But yet Mr. Birds can rise to dignity and beauty of language. Here (Act IV., p. 249) is Faust's farewell sight of his cloud-chariot:

"Slowly and not dispersing drifts it off from me,
Eastward the mass withdraws its globed luminous train;
The awe-struck eye in wonder gazes after it;
Shifting, it parts again, wave-like, and full of change.
Yet would it shape a figure. Yes, mine eye speaks true!
On sun-illuminated pillows gorgeously reclined,
I see it like to Juno, Leda, Helena,
Majestically lovely floats it 'fore mine eyes!
Ah, now it breaks! Formless and high up-towered Rests there i' the east, like far-off icy mountain-lands, Mirroring an image grand of our swift-flying days.
Yet round me hovers still a delicate strip of cloud,
Hot brow and breast caressing, cooling, flattering.
Now mounts it lightly up, and, soaring higher and higher,
Closes together, cheats me a rapturous glimpse,
As of my earliest, longest-lived, and highest bliss;
The dawn of Love's light, feathery, quick-as-poet's-thought,
First, hardly comprehended glance, resembles it,
Which nathless fast retained, outshone every boon.
Dissolving not, in æther far away it floats,
And draws the best of all my being after it."

It is not perfect; there are flaws, flat phrases; a line of the original, preceding the last two, seems to have been ignored—

"Wie Seelenschönheit steigt sich die holde Form";

but it is like the original in feeling. It gives the dreamy sadness of one who is not yet cured of his "Gährung in die Ferne."

Passages of this kind, and many of those in the "Helena," Mr. Birds manages very well. He is less good, I think, where anything lyric is required of him. Euphorion's Dirge, e.g., is not rendered with the intense feeling of the original, though it has something of its sound. The first chorus ("Wenn sich lau die Lüfte füllen") is better, but not satisfactory; the substitution of "Queen of Night" for "Moon" makes a fine line baldly tautological. Is Mr. Birds right, in this chorus, in taking "des Tages Pforte" of the eyelids? Certainly, neither Sir Th. Martin nor Mr. B. Taylor so interprets the words. It is, perhaps, a pity that Mr. Birds, in the "Midnight" scene of Act V., insists on personifying the second of the Four Gray Women as Debt. This seems to me to weaken the whole conception. Debt is surely only a part of care; but "Guilt" is needed, not only for the facts of the particular case, but for truth in the allegory. Wealth knows not want. It can lull the sense of guilt, and drug the conscience with opiates. It can shrink successfully from sight or thought of misery. But a fourth hag remains, who can slip through every keyhole, and disturbs a palace as much as a dungeon. This is Care, worry, the Lebensratzen of many possessions. By this is he made restless and alarmed whom past guilt has ceased to sting. If there be anything, in all "Faust," more penetratingly true than this, I should be perplexed to find it.

Unlike Mr. Huth, Mr. Birds has added notes; and, in the main, good ones. Mr. Huth feels, rightly, that in a translation of Part I., they are a little out of place. But Part II. is barely comprehensible without some kind of appendix, as every one may know by trying.

It is impossible to read through translations like these without feeling how great is the labour the writers have undergone. The poem is a perfect forge of perplexities. Any one who knows, in any measure, how great they are will regret if he has spoken lightly of the work of those who have buckled to the task. As for him who should achieve it successfully—

"Möchte selbst solch einen Herren kennen, Würd' ihn Herr Mikrokosmos nennen."

E. D. A. MORSEHEAD.

Nature and Man. By William B. Carpenter. With an Introductory Memoir by T. Estlin Carpenter. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

THIS work possesses a twofold interest, which is indicated, though hardly with sufficient distinctness, on the title-page. No less than one-third of the volume is taken up with an admirable memoir of the late Dr. Carpenter, while the rest contains a selection of the more remarkable of his later writings. Both the biographical and the literary and scientific interests are more important than is allowed to appear.

For the memoir, written by a near relative conversant with the facts and in entire sympathy with the intellectual development it portrays, it may be described as a model of what such a biography should be. If any fault can be found with it it is that of undue brevity. In these days, when biographies of persons who contributed little to the world's knowledge or real progress fill two or three volumes of closely-printed octavo, an allowance of 152 pages to a life like Dr. W. B. Carpenter's must be pronounced meagre in itself and below the average of what may be called biographical expectancy. Moreover, this criticism is emphasised by the fact that some of the intellectual stages and processes described would certainly have borne, on the double ground of interest and importance, a somewhat ampler expansion than has been accorded them. Taken as a whole, however, such a life as that worthily presented in this memoir seems to me to possess a rare and peculiar value.

Nothing is more common in the scientific culture of our day than to find the idiosyncrasies and affinities of science workers unduly developed. The rage for supposed facts, for physical truths verifiable by experiment, has produced its inevitable effect in dwarfing the idealistic and spiritual faculties of those engaged in their accumulation. The scope of physical science for ideal development, and the need of such a development to counteract certain mischievous tendencies of purely experimental science so strongly insisted on by Prof. Tyndall, is perpetually being left out of sight by science workers of the present day. As a result we have Nature continually expounded in a manner which leaves its mysteries and ideal tendencies—the dim realm of the un- or half-known which touches in all directions—wholly out of consideration. The consequence is not only an imperfect presentation of Nature as a whole, but a perversion of the enquirer's own speculative faculties—i.e., supposing him to be "teres atque rotundus," and endowed with the possession, or, at any rate, with the apprehension, of idealistic powers and their value. Dr. Carpenter's life is instructive as showing how conscious he was of the general need of cultivating the spiritual as well as the physical science faculties of our complex nature, and how determined he was to preserve the balance in his own case. Like many scientific thinkers he shared a natural incapacity for metaphysical abstractions; but instead of allowing, as many scientists of our day appear to take a pride in doing, this defect to grow and preponderate until the ideal and spiritual moiety of his being was wholly crushed, Dr. Carpenter preserved the equilibrium of his whole nature by a perpetual recourse to the beliefs and rites of religion. I do not insinuate that this was done from a purposive utilitarianism. The effort was prompted by the instinctive recognition of spiritual needs: the feeling that the cultivation merely of intellectual faculties left a large and most important section of his whole humanity as a rational and spiritual being untitled and wasted—putting the issue on its lowest grounds. Nothing is, indeed, more remarkable in his intellectual growth than the clear perception of the significance of its several stages and processes. Hence, we find a perpetual strain for readjustment accompanying each sensible advance forward. To take a marked instance—amply illustrated in the course of this volume—his researches into the automatism of the mental faculties are accompanied always by a restatement or vindication of the doctrine of free will. While, however, the religious element forms a striking and peculiar characteristic of Dr. Carpenter's life, it cannot be shown that the unwonted play he thus permitted to his spiritual feelings and aspirations exercised the least prejudicial effect on his physical science inquiries. The most vehement denouncer of the alliance of religion and science might be challenged to point to a single investigation or conclusion which would have taken a different form had Dr. Carpenter's religious beliefs been less pronounced or universally energising. Considered in reference to the prevalent and increasing tendencies of our time, I regard this as a fact whose importance cannot be overrated.

The essays contained in this volume serve a double purpose. They illustrate certain noteworthy phases of the author's thought-development described in the memoir; and they carry forward to their latest stage of growth important speculations which formed the themes of his earlier works, chiefly his treatises on human physiology and mental physiology. The latter purpose they subserve so usefully that no one of the many delighted and edified possessors of the above-named works will be satisfied without adding these essays to his collection.

The principle on which these essays are selected seems set forth with a fair amount of adequacy by the title, Nature and Man. Such themes as the "Doctrine and Limits of Human Automatism," the "Doctrine of Evolution," "Nature in Relation to Force and Law," the "Psychology of Belief"—subjects, in a word, which concern the perennial relations of man to his environment—are dealt with, for the most part, in a satisfactory if not exhaustive manner. When all are of importance, it seems invidious to choose those on which Dr. Carpenter's researches have thrown most abundant light. Probably his scientific readers would be inclined to instance his treatment of automatism as the most valuable of his later researches. Next, however, to that I should be inclined to place those of his essays which refer to the genesis and formation of belief. This is a subject which is intimately connected with elementary philosophy and the evolution of the human mind; but it is one of which numbers of both science teachers and professed thinkers are profoundly ignorant. Dr. Carpenter was led to lay stress on it partly by his habit of verifying each stage of his own mental development, partly by the importance which the process of conviction necessarily assumes in all psychological researches. Of especial significance are the conclusions he arrives at with reference to the subjective constituents or factors of belief, e.g. (p. 242):

"The general result of these inquiries has been to force upon me the conviction that as to all which concerns the supernatural (using that term in its generally understood sense without attempting a logical definition of it) the allowance that has to be made for prepossession is so large as practically to destroy the validity of any testimony which is not submitted to the strictest scientific methods."

Nor is the following passage without significance in report of the "vicarious" conviction, which is gaining ground in certain ecclesiastical circles, with reference to Bible narratives.

"The question has now passed into a phase altogether different from that which it presented a century or two ago. It was then 'are the narratives genuine or fictitious?' It is now 'Granting that the narrators wrote what they firmly believed to be true, as having themselves seen (or thought they had seen) the events they recorded, or as having heard of them from witnesses whom they had a right to regard as equally trustworthy with themselves, is their belief a sufficient justification for ours?'"

That Dr. Carpenter's Nature and Man will satisfy the extremists whether of science or religion is not to be expected. Each will dislike the cautious tone of equilibrium which may be said to pervade the whole volume. But the thinker who possesses Schiller's mark of the real philosopher—viz., that of loving truth better than his system—will regard with favour a work which takes account, not of certain selected data in Nature and Humanity, but of all those diversiform aspects which constitute the entire sum both of one subject and the other—which refuses to ignore in the interests of truth the religious side of Nature, or the spiritual and idealistic aspects of the physical universe.

JOHN OWEN.

Essays towards a Critical Method. By John M. Robertson. (Fisher Unwin.)

MUCH of the matter of this book is valuable, and all of it is interesting; for Mr. Robertson is not only a man well read in the literature of his main theme, but is also a clear, shrewd, and vigorous thinker, while its manner—though not to be praised without some reserves—proves the writer to be an accomplished literary craftsman. In the case of any book the strong points of which are numerous and the weak points few, the generous—indeed, the merely just—critic will strive to make prominent the former rather than the latter; but in writing of Mr. Robertson's essays a special reason for bearing the rule of justice in mind is provided by the fact that the weak points of the book are of a kind to produce an amount of irritation disproportioned to their real importance.

For example, while Mr. Robertson's literary style is generally good, and not infrequently of really high excellence, it is too often characterised by a dry and pedantic scholasticism which seems to be a besetting sin of writers who hail from the north of the Tweed. Speaking of a certain kind of criticism of Homer and Virgil, he says: "Such criticism would envisage afresh the poet's world, and would sum it up in terms of the critic's relation to his world, which in the terms of the case would include their presentation of theirs so far as he was awake to it." A sentence like this is bad from every point of view, and the kind of writing of which it is a type almost inevitably suggests a suspicion of charlatanism—a suspicion which, though here altogether unjust, is apt to set readers in an unsympathetic attitude. Unfortunately too, Mr. Robertson gives further occasion for the suspicion by indulgence in the use of such unfamiliar words as "envisage" in the sentence just quoted; of verbal inventions like "belletrist," "apriorism," "Englishly," "fictive," and "totalled," which are, to say the least not pretty; and of such ambitious phrasings as are typified by the reference to "the bureaucratic enforcement of the static classicism of the Renaissance." "Static" and its companion "dynamic" are favourite words with Mr. Robertson, whose use of them becomes almost a trick, and an irritating trick too, seeing that they are often employed in sentences where "passive" and "active," or "stationary" and "progressive" would not only sound less pretentious, but would better fit the intended meaning.

In close relation to these defects of style is what—if I may for once follow Mr. Robertson's example of word-coining—may be described as a certain round-aboutness of treatment. It is by no means difficult to discern the drift of the writer's argument; but it is impossible to quote a sentence, or a group of sentences, by which that drift can be made manifest to the reader of a review, and, therefore, the critic has to interpret Mr. Robertson, instead of allowing Mr. Robertson to interpret himself. The portion of the book which justifies its title is an essay entitled "Science in Criticism," divided into four sections, which, as they have separate themes and sub-titles of their own, it will be most convenient to treat as separate essays. The first—"Historic Phases"—is a bird's-eye view of the history of criticism from Aristotle to Matthew Arnold, of which it is only needful to say that it is executed with knowledge, skill, and vivacity, and that its intellectual purpose seems to be to show how criticism, from being a mere application of precedents, and of rules founded upon precedents, has gradually developed into an act of independent judgment—an attempt to see the object not exactly in vacuo, but in an atmosphere other than that of accumulated tradition. The second essay—"Recent Nihilism"—is a successful exposure of the fallacies of that brilliant piece of perversity, Mr. R. G. Moulton's volume, Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist, the author of which has assured the world that criticism, instead of being what it has always been supposed to be, the art or science of judging, is really a something which excludes judgment—that, in short, "judicial" criticism is not, from the "scientific" point of view, criticism at all. The third essay—"The Problem stated"—is an answer to the questions, "What is the work of the critic?" and "What are the conditions of success in criticism?" while the fourth—"Principles of Practice"—is, in spite of its ambitious title, little more than an estimate of the performances of various contemporary critical writers.

In spite of his title Mr. Robertson seems to hold, and his book has the look of being written to enforce, the very sensible opinion that there is no method in criticism, though there are many methods; and that any method will yield good results if it is followed rationally and with due regard to its limitations. Criticism, for example, may take note of morality, and it may also take note of grammar; but the critic who is exclusively moral will ignore the just claims of Fielding, while the critic who is exclusively grammatical will ignore the just claims of Pope. We should be spared a great deal of unnecessary writing, a great deal of elaborate beating about the bush which never raises the hare—which never, indeed, raises anything but blinding and choking dust—if people would only think the matter out to the bottom, and acknowledge that literary criticism is simply the application to books—taken singly or in groups—of the ordinary faculty of judgment, regulated and rendered efficient by sensibility and knowledge. Judgment of books is, in fact, exactly the same kind of mental activity as judgment of wine or of horses, the only difference being that in the former case the issues raised are at once more numerous and complex than in the latter. With regard to wine, we have only to ask whether it is wholesome, healthily exhilarating, and grateful to the educated palate; with regard to horses, we have only to ask whether they possess the qualities which conduce to speed or strength. Wine and horses can only serve a few ends, but books serve many ends, each one of which can be attained in different ways; and therefore the right judgment of books demands the acquisition of such varied knowledge and the cultivation of such varied sensibilities that people have come to regard it as, in some vague, undefined way, a unique intellectual exercise. Hence the numerous foolish and futile questions concerning it which have been solemnly put and elaborately answered, such, for example, as the question whether literary criticism is a science or an art. Of course, like all other criticism, it is both. The knowledge essential to a just judgment—say, for example, the knowledge of the difference between the dramatic handling of Sophocles and of Shakespeare—is science; the application of that knowledge to a criticism of either writer, or of drama in general, is art. There is—there can be—no fertile method in criticism but the method of teaching ourselves to know largely, to feel rightly and exquisitely; and any other method is what Carlyle would have called a "Morrison's pill." To my mind the chief merit of Mr. Robertson's book is that he sees this fact quite clearly; its chief defect is that he does not, with equal clearness, say what he sees. Sometimes he comes so near to saying it that the very careful and wide-awake reader may declare that he does say it; but in an age of hurry it is not well for a writer to rely too much upon the care and wakefulness of the reading public. It may, however, be admitted that the tendency, the drift, of the following sentences can only be missed by culpable somnolence. Appropos of the work of Matthew Arnold, Mr. Robertson writes:

"There is still lacking, however, that measure of co-ordination that might be expected to be attained in literary criticism in view of the extent to which it has been carried in other studies; and Mr. Arnold's own performance may, without malice, be said to have come short of its avowed aim. The very undertaking to see 'the object as in itself it really is' was ominous to begin with; because, 'the object as in itself it really is, is strictly a chimaera.' We can but know the thing as it is to our minds—to given orders of mind; and what happens in science is the gradual agreement among given orders of mind that on investigation things are so and so. What the critic may hope to do is similarly to persuade given orders of mind, by comparison and reasoning, that things are so and so, and to explain to them why it is that to other orders of mind they may be otherwise."

This is surely equivalent to saying what is obviously true, though it is so often forgotten by ambitious theorists, that criticism is the statement of reasons for preferences, differentiations, and assignments of precedence, with a view to persuasion—to the bringing about of a general accordance of judgment, a consensus of competent and cultivated opinion. And, as a matter of fact, the history of criticism is the history of a gradual tendency towards such accordance; but no method can accelerate it, no absence of method can retard it. It is true that there are certain fundamental differences of taste in literature, just as in other regions, which can never be done away with. But in the main, the men who know books best agree much more largely than they differ; and when a man of wide knowledge and quick sensibility finds himself altogether at issue with the main body of his compeers he will, in all probability, admit frankly that the difference is the result of some personal idiosyncrasy or limitation. Charles Lamb admired the writings of Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle; but he did not impeach the judgment of the world which neglected them. He knew that he was expressing a personal preference for which he could assign no reasons of universal validity, and he knew also that such expressions of preference are not criticism, but mere autobiography.

In the course of these four essays, Mr. Robertson never gets far away from his main subject—the work of criticism; but he discusses a number of sub-topics to which no allusion can here be made. Nor can I say more than a word or two of the essays on "Mr. Howells's Novels," on "The Fable of the Bees," and on "The Art of Tennyson," to which the latter half of the volume is devoted. Whatever Mr. Robertson's own private "method of criticism" may be, he has certainly made good use of it in these papers, which display his command of the two essentials of critical success spoken of above—wide knowledge and quick sensibility. Much as has been written concerning the laureate's work as an artist pure and simple, I have never read any analytical estimate at once so subtle and so sound as that given in the third of these essays.

I hope I have not exaggerated Mr. Robertson's defects, and I do not think I have minimised them; but however this may be—whether they are great or small, many or few—the book has one merit which more than atones for them: it is throughout interesting.

Jacob's Letter, and other Stories. By Roland Grey. (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.)

Past Forgiveness? By Lady Margaret Majendie. In 2 vols. (Bentley.)

Strange Secrets. Told by Percy Fitzgerald, Florence Marryat, Dutton Cook, James Grant, &c. (Chatto & Windus.)

MARGARET MALIPHANT is not only the heroine of the autobiographical novel which bears her name; she is its one success. Her character is firmly and vividly drawn, with sympathetic touches, enabling the reader to feel as if he knew her personally—a hot-tempered, wilful, eager being, contrasting with her almost Quakerish sister Joyce, who, however, is not quite so effectively depicted. But the construction of the book is faulty. There is not story enough to fill the three volumes, and what there is has been overloaded with details which do not contribute to the evolution of the plot. For example, there are three or four long descriptions of atmospheric phenomena, in themselves graphic enough, and attesting a keen love of nature, but utterly improbable as portions of an autobiography, whether the gradual accumulation of a regularly kept diary, or, as the author rather implies, written from memory after the lapse of several years from the point where the story ends. No one, having serious troubles to record, would think of digressing for two or three pages to explain exactly how the clouds looked on a particular evening at sunset, even in a diary, or could, by any possibility, recall all the minute details ten or a dozen years after, especially as the days so signalised are not critical epochs in the plot, nor has the weather any relation to its incidents. In themselves, as already said, the descriptions are well written; and they would, perhaps, be in place if the novel were indirect in style, and they served as a setting to the figures in the landscape. As it is, they make the book drag. And there is one other complaint to make—the frequent appearance of that exasperating solecism "different to," which people need never make if they would only remember that the same collocation is never found with the verb; no one writes, "I differ to you." The style is, in other respects, fairly good, but lacks movement.

Little Hand and Muckle Gold is a very clever story, and by a writer who has not only wide culture, but who has succeeded in drawing a consummate scoundrel without making him stogy and melodramatic, as Randal Leslie, for instance, is in My Novel. The plot is an ingenious one, and worked out well up to the catastrophe. But the catastrophe itself is false art. It is bold, it gives occasion to some powerful descriptive writing, but it is not led up to nor necessitated by any of the prior events, and it violates Horace's canons of tragedy, without complying with those of Aristotle; for, though the elements of pity and terror are present, there is nothing to elevate or refine, and it is even possible that readers in delicate health and of excitable nervous temperament might be hurtfully affected by its ghastly realism. It would have been perfectly easy to construct a tragical end in harmony with the plot, and evolved naturally out of it, which would have had none of the defects of the existing one, and yet might have been more genuinely pathetic, if a pathetic ending were required at all.

The Wrong Box marks declension, not advance, on Mr. Stevenson's part. It is undeniably readable, the incidents are effective and ingeniously fitted together; but the book differs from more than one of his former publications in that it is not literature, as they are. That it is a telling sensational story, with a broad streak of farce running all through it, is true, all the same, and probably that is all Mr. Stevenson and his collaborator aimed at; but he is capable of higher things.

The stories in the volume named Jacob's Letter are six in number, two of them being concerned with the Franco-Prussian war; two more (though the chief actors are Americans and English) are placed in Germany, at least in part; a fifth is Parisian both in actors and scenery; and the sixth, with a Russian as hero, is chiefly engaged with Americans. These stories are all brightly written, with much ease and freedom of movement, and with quite enough plot to supply interest. There are a few Americanisms of language, and that odious "different to" is there also. But these are but trifling defects; and the stories, one and all, possess that intangible quality which a reviewer can recognise, but not define, attesting vitality and promising growth, so that we are justified in looking forward to some much more considerable literary achievement from the author in a further stage of development.

A Troublesome Girl is the lightest of soufflés, and makes no pretence to solidity; but the heroine, who is differentiated from her kind by a genius for the violin, is brightly and pleasantly drawn, so that her story will serve to while away a couple of hours agreeably.

Lady Margaret Majendie's novel is a study of certain aspects of French life, and she has invented a good plot, with several effective situations. The main factor of the story, which suggests the title, is that a literary man of more ambition than success, but with a certain reputation as a critic, is consulted by a young author in search of a market for his wares, who has become his secretary, and entrusts him with his MSS. The critic, while returning a discouraging answer, is in fact struck with the high quality of much in the papers; and, appropriating them, publishes them as his own, and gets the real author shut up as a lunatic when he detects the fraud and claims his property. When Etienne de Rohan recovers his liberty, he resumes his literary pursuits; and the success he achieves arouses the envy and hate of Delmache, the man who had injured him so much already, and who endeavours to claim as his own even the new matter which De Rohan publishes. There is a little vagueness in the handling of this part of the story, which leaves it doubtful whether Lady Margaret does not intend to imply that there is some obscure mischief in Delmache's brain, causing genuine hallucination in himself of the very kind he falsely charged upon De Rohan, and so making him believe himself to have serious wrongs to avenge. However this may be, he becomes De Rohan's implacable enemy, and discovers means of wreaking vengeance upon him so as to blight his life, and to put himself beyond all reasonable probability of being ever forgiven. How the two meet at last, and whether they meet in hostility, the reader should inquire for himself, for it would be unfair to disclose the plot; but it may be at least said that the situation is strongly drawn. I think, accurate as Lady Margaret's knowledge of details and familiarity with French habits is, that she has made one mistake, that of representing the De Frontignacs, at most noblesse de province, objecting to De Rohan as a suitor, because it would involve a mésalliance. There might be an objection on the score of poverty; but as his pedigree is not disputed, a scion of one of the greatest of French historical families, sprung from the old Kings of Bretagne, bearing the haughty motto: "Roi ne puis, prince ne daigne, Rohan suis," and having the higher distinction of producing several distinguished men, would not have been a mésalliance for royalty itself. In fact both Francis I. and Henry IV. had Rohan blood in their veins, while Louis XIV. gave both the Rohan-Soubise and the Rohan-Guéméné branches the rank and precedence of foreign princes in France, precisely because of their high descent.

Strange Stories is the sort of collection which used to appear as the Christmas number of Household Words many years ago, each of the contributions having some slight resemblance to the remainder, in this particular instance the link of connexion being some mystery attaching to places or persons; but none of them exhibit the inventive faculty in any high degree, nor is one of the ghost stories which constitute a large factor of the volume really creepy. One of the tales, the "Box with the Iron Clamps," is an unwholesome one, leaving a bad taste in the mouth; but it is precisely this one which has been given a sort of precedence by suggesting the design on the cover of the book. The stories might just pass singly as the feuilleton of an illustrated paper, but they were not worth issuing collectively.

RICHARD F. LITTLEDALE.

BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

Ten Years' Wild Sports in Foreign Lands, or Travels in the Eighties. By H. W. Seton-Karr. (Chapman & Hall.) Instead of the big volumes of travels which delighted former generations, the author has here pleasantly compressed, within some 300 well-printed pages, his impressions during the present decade of the lands which most interest sportsmen. Mr. Seton-Karr follows not the beaten paths of tourists. If a little-known river, a track which has hardly ever been explored by the scientific traveller, or an unascended peak, strikes his fancy, he forthwith packs up rod and gun and starts. This book becomes therefore a double record—of travel, more or less adventurous, and of sport. After the fashion of the day he epitomises his doings as much as may be, so that no prolix disquisitions or monotonous details frighten his reader. He paints scenery with a bold touch or two, throws in a few lighter tints, introduces a native to give life and circumstantiality to his landscape, and then with no parade brings down his stag, or teaches how to catch the trout of the country. Fishermen who long to do execution among the Salmonidae of Norway, Sweden, Canada, or Finland, will here find a few valuable hints, while they can estimate what likelihood there is at present of sport in those countries. Too often the sportsman who has travelled at much inconvenience to some distant river finds that he has been entirely deceived in his hopes by authorities writing of a long past state of things. Does a man merely wish to read of strange scenes of travel? The chapters in this book on the monasteries of Mount Athos will exactly meet his wishes, only Mr. Seton-Karr should not call the painstaking author who has described the highlands of Turkey, "Mr. Towzer." Is any member of the Alpine Club eager to find peaks which have never yet been scaled by mortal foot? Let us hasten to recommend him to the two excellent chapters on the glaciers and peaks of Alaska. With all his enthusiasm Mr. Seton-Karr himself could only climb 7200 feet up a spur of Mount St. Elias, which is between nineteen and twenty thousand feet in height, the loftiest peak in North America, and a British possession. From the height which he did reach the author obtained a marvellous view, the entire country being almost entirely composed of glaciers. Stay-at-home anglers will be amazed at the doughty deeds of the famous Haraka Angling Club at St. Petersburg among the great lake-trout. One gentleman landed in forty-eight hours nine fish of the weight of 139½ lbs. The aspect of Kashmir and the Himalayas in mid-winter is very different, the author shows, from Moore's poetical descriptions. Another chapter of thrilling interest relates his adventures while hunting wild goats on the appalling precipices of British Columbia. Mr. Seton-Karr is always sensible, amusing, and brimful of information, and his book is certain to find a large circle of readers.

Hearts of Oak. By Rear-Admiral H. F. Winnington-Ingram. (W. H. Allen.) This is a big book, and very far from an uninteresting book; but we fear that its dimensions—and, it must be added, its illustrations too—will frighten away the readers it deserves. To begin with, there is nothing particularly appropriate in the title. For though it purports to be the log of a naval officer during a period of more than thirty years of service, the main attraction is confined to the author's experiences on land. He seems to have entered the navy under the sailor-king; and his earliest voyage was to the South Seas in 1836. The first land they touched at was the Marquesa group—"islands then rarely visited, and in a deplorable state of cannibalism," though two English missionaries had already established themselves there. Afterwards they called at Pitcairn's Island, then occupied by the descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty, and still possessing many relics of the wreck. The way home was via Callao, where, it is curious to read, H.M.'s frigate "Actæon" shipped freight to the value of two millions sterling." The next important commission of our author was in the Levant. He was present at the bombardment of Acre in 1840; and for several years afterwards made pleasant trips on shore in Asia Minor, Greece, &c. Of special interest is the account of his visit to Cetinje in 1843. He describes the Vladike or bishop, the ancestor of the present prince of Montenegro, as "the finest specimen of a man that any of us had ever seen." When the Vladiko was asked if he had any regularly ordained priests in his dominions besides himself, he replied: "Yes, three hundred, and the best fighting men I have." The Black Mountaineers were then in the same stage of head-hunting as the Dyaks of Borneo. In 1846, the author was sent to Monte Video, then the scene of civil war, the most prominent leaders on the two sides being Garibaldi and Rosas. Of Garibaldi and his wife Anita he draws a fine picture, and incidentally gives the following explanation of the origin of the Garibaldian red shirt—which he describes as "a scarlet tunic fitted loosely to the body," and which (from his illustration) seems to have been like what is now called a Norfolk jacket:

"Its adoption was caused by the necessity of clothing the newly raised [Italian] legion as economically as possible; and a liberal offer having been made to sell to the government a stock of red woollen shirts intended for the Buenos Ayres market, the purchase was effected. These goods were intended to be worn by those employed in the Saladeros, or great slaughtering and salting establishments for cattle, as they made good winter clothing, and by their colour disguised, in a measure, the bloody work."

From Monte Video the author was ordered to San Francisco, then in the first paroxysms of the gold fever. Extraordinary precautions had to be taken to prevent the men deserting; and one of their duties was to navigate abandoned English merchant vessels to Valparaiso. During the Russian war, the author served on board the Boscawen, which formed one of the Baltic fleet under Sir Charles Napier; but very little—perhaps wisely—is related of this episode. The most interesting matter is the description of the methods adopted to fill up the numbers of the crew. Out of 300, as many as 177 had no previous knowledge of sailor's work. In 1860, it was the author's chance again to meet Garibaldi, for he was in command of the paddle-aloop Argus despatched to Sicily to look after British interests when the famous one thousand (really 800) landed at Marsala. It is curious to learn how different was the fighting here and in the Argentine country. The siege of Monte Video had lasted for nine years, and (in the words of our author) "had introduced an era of atrocities and demoralisation the counterpart of which must be looked for in the pages of Hallam." Why Hallam? we ask in amazement. But we must not part from our author without thanking him for the pleasure we have derived from reading his simple, straightforward narrative.

Cosmopolitan Recollections. (Ward & Downey.) These two volumes are written by the anonymous author of Random Recollections of Courts and Society, and deserve welcome no less friendly than was given in the ACADEMY to that work. We are here taken to every court in Europe and presented to all the notables. So thorough and comprehensive is the presentation that even the dogs are not forgotten. The writer never mars his stories by ill-nature. Habitually lenient in his judgments on the less fortunate, such as the ex-King of Servia, the luckless Murger, or the Crown Prince Rudolph, it is the more noteworthy that he does not appreciate at its full height the intellectual stature of the Empress Frederick. He cannot forgive her becoming "a disciple of the new ideas." He does, however, appreciate her never-failing tact and courtesy, as the following anecdote will show:—A few years after the Franco-German War, the French uniform reappeared for the first time in Germany at the great autumn military manoeuvres. At the review which ended them, Colonel Grandin was on horseback, with the staff, awaiting the arrival of the Emperor. The rain was falling in torrents, but this did not prevent the Princess Imperial accompanying her father-in-law. When she reached the group of the staff she stopped, and, advancing towards Colonel Grandin, she said aloud: "Colonel, I am particularly pleased to see you to-day." The Frenchman bent low on the neck of his horse as the Princess continued: "Yes, particularly pleased; because it is the 9th of September"; and, seeing that neither the officer addressed nor the generals around her understood these words, she added pointedly: "And September 9 is the anniversary of the surrender of Sebastopol—the day on which your country and mine won a victory together" (p. 29). Our court annalist becomes more interesting when writing of kinglets than of kings; and his sketches of Bleichröder and Dr. Schwemmer are drawn to the life. We have no space here to criticise his views about King Milan, Queen Nathalie, or Prince Ferdinand. Belgrade and Sofia are capitals so unattractive that the wonder is that such a gay traveller could have stayed long in either. This appears to have been the case; and, while he appreciates Queen Nathalie, he recognises the rare abilities of her husband, the Charles II. of Servia. He describes with excessive sentiment the "love story" of Prince Alexander of Battenburg, and actually traces his abdication to his being "hopelessly in love." Prince Alexander "thought, perhaps, that happiness weighed more than a crown, and that, wedded to a Hohenzollern, son-in-law of an emperor, he would reappear," &c. Our cicerone recovers his commonsense in the next page, and thus dismisses the hero of Slivnitsa: "Prince Alexander himself cut the Gordian knot by his unexpected marriage with Fräulein Leisinger, leaving his allies discomfited, the trust reposed in him betrayed, and allowing his romance to end, like his sovereignty, in defection." In closing our notice of these Cosmopolitan Recollections, we need only say that their author is never dull, always good-natured, and generally well-informed.

Naples in 1888. By Eustace Neville Rolfe and Holcombe Ingleby. (Triibner.) This is an eminently readable little book, written in a lively style, and giving a great deal of information. It is inspired, too, by a friendly and impartial feeling towards the people of whose manners and customs it treats, and thus forms an agreeable exception to the general run of books which are constantly appearing on Italy. So few seem to remember how difficult it is for the natives of one country to gain an accurate insight into the character and conduct of the natives of another, and the result is too often that both praise and blame are equally unmerited and equally little to the point. These two gentlemen, on the contrary, evidently know Naples well, although chiefly in its popular aspects, of which they give a series of vivid and amusing sketches. We were especially struck by their remarks on that terrible problem—the lottery—the justice of which no educated Italian will question, although he may recognise more keenly the financial difficulty which alone prevents the government from putting it down. The chapters on the streets and the Bay, on the strange half pagan superstitions, on the different classes of priests, are all worth reading by any visitor to Naples who likes to know something more than the mere surface of things. What we miss is some account of the more serious side which life has even in that gay and sunny town. Of its charitable institutions, of its large new schools, of its intellectual activity, we hear no word. The title, therefore, of "Naples in 1888" is rather too ambitious, if we consider that the education and brainwork of the country is at least as important a feature as its lazzaroni and its feste, and that the secret societies of which the authors note the decay have their places gradually filled by the efforts of the economist and by the good works of the enlightened philanthropist. Still, the book, if it does not go far, is a good one so far as it goes; and we would only warn its readers that occasionally for "Italian" they must substitute "Neapolitan," as the writers are evidently much less acquainted with north and central Italy, and hardly seem aware that these latter differ quite as much from the south as England does from Ireland—if not a good deal more.

THE approach of the holiday season is heralded by the usual supply of guide-books; but none of them, we think, is of such a character as to demand special mention.

THE incomparable Baedeker has issued an English edition of his Northern France (London: Dulau), which not only deals with the familiar shores of Normandy and Brittany, but includes the less known interior as far south as Nantes, Tours, Orleans, and Dijon, Paris itself being omitted. When we consider the amount of trustworthy information, and the number of maps and plans, we are astonished that the work can be sold at the price of nine shillings.

MR. EDWARD STANFORD has added two new volumes to his popular series of "County Guides." Worcestershire, described as the "pleasant and picturesque," is contributed by the veteran Mr. R. N. Worth, than whom none knows better how to give in small compass just the details which the tourist wants. Bedfordshire, by the Rev. A. J. Foster, is written too much from the point of view of the ecclesiologist, though we approve the method of arranging the matter under railway stations. On p. 52 occurs a curious slip, by which the widow of Francis Bacon is described as "Viscountess Verulam, and Baroness of St. Albans." From the same publisher come a fifth edition of Mr. G. Phillips Bevan's West Riding of Yorkshire; a fourth edition of Mr. Walter Rye's Norfolk—perhaps the best, and certainly the most readable, of the series; and a second edition of Mr. Bevan's Channel Islands.

OUR pleasure at receiving a third part of Rustic Walks in the Vicinity of London (George Philip & Son), dealing with the West-to-South district, is dashed by reading the announcement that Mr. W. R. Evans, the projector of this truly original series of guides to the cockney pedestrian, is dead. We hope that his mantle has fallen upon his friend and successor, Mr. S. Sharpe. All lovers of the footpaths and lanes still to be found within twenty miles of Charing Cross owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Evans for the laborious care with which he has placed his own unique knowledge at their disposal. It is the duty of all of us to maintain the rights of way which he has pointed out. We observe a note in this volume (p. 50) that a footpath formerly used by Mr. Evans is now obstructed. Let the inhabitants of Kingston and Surbiton see to it.

A Pictorial History of the Thames, compiled and edited by A. S. Krause (Chatto & Windus), is intended to be a guide to the rowing man and also to the tourist. Its method is to follow the river down from its source to Richmond, with an account of the Thames Conservancy thrown in under Oxford. The feature of the book is the illustrations, 340 in number, which consist of sketches specially made by various (named) artists, and skilfully reproduced. Some of them are really very successful, considering their small scale.

MR. PERCY LINDLEY, whom we take to be employed by the Great Eastern Railway Company, has added to former productions of a similar kind Walks in Holland: Cycling, Boating, by Rail, and on Foot.

OF several cheap guides to the Paris Exhibition, we may mention that authorised by the executive council of the British section, which is published by Messrs. William Clowes & Sons.

SOME FOREIGN BOOKS ON POLITICAL ECONOMY.

Untersuchungen über die Theorie des Preises. Von Rudolph Auspitz und Richard Lietsen. (Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot.) Opinions may differ as to the place of the mathematical school in economic science, but not as to the position of our authors in that school. They are at the top of the tree, whatever the height of the tree may be. Or, to employ a metaphor more germane to the subject, we may liken their position to the apex of one of their own "pleasure-curves," of which the absolute height cannot be measured, although the maximum point may be assigned in a certain relative sense. We allude to the "supply and demand curves" and to the "curves of constant satisfaction," which are much the same as Prof. Edgeworth, following Prof. Marshall, has used in his Mathematical Psychics. We note the following points in the work before us as original and important: (1) The genesis and interior structure of the supply-and-demand curves are, for the first time, fully exhibited. It is shown that to different amounts of commodity consumed there correspond different styles of living, or plans of life ("Lebensweise") implying variations in the form of the consumer's demand-curve. The treatment of variations depending on the scale of production is, perhaps, not quite so original, yet very instructive. (2) The circumstances affecting the motives of the dealers in a market are analysed very fully. The "future price," among other particulars, is taken into account. (3) The relations of buyers and sellers are exhibited with peculiar clearness and felicity by putting the positive part of the abscissa for quantity bought, the negative part for quantity sold. (4) This conception of the market lends itself to a highly original and very beautiful representation of the effect produced by an additional dealer supervening, in particular a dealer on a large scale, a quasi-monopolist. The practically important case where there is a mixture of monopoly and market price has never been made so amenable to theory. (5) The case of pure monopoly is also handled with great power. The influence of a monopolist middleman—such as the corporate proprietary of a railway virtually constitute—is placed in a new light. (6) Again, the theory of taxes—in particular, of duties on imports and exports—has been made clearer by Messrs. Auspitz and Lietzen. A glance at their curves makes evident, what it takes the literary economist a great many words to explain—that it is theoretically possible by well-adjusted taxation for one nation to benefit itself at the expense of another. These points, considered separately, convey but an imperfect idea of the beauty and power by which the work, as a whole, is distinguished among mathematical treatises on the theory of exchange.

Zur Litteraturgeschichte der Staats- und Socialwissenschaften. Von Gustav Schmoller. (Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot.) This is a collection of miscellaneous essays, dedicated to Prof. Roscher on the occasion of his attaining the fiftieth year of his doctorate—"zum 50 Jährigen Doktorjubiläum." The veteran himself occupies a prominent place among the publicists who are the subjects of special studies in this volume. The minute delineation of Prof. Roscher's intellectual virtues will doubtless not appear tedious to the subject of this encomium. Carey and List are very happily classed as "agitators," and very justly measured by that standard. Those who are not tired of the controversy between our author and Prof. Menger about economic method may care for some additional remarks in defence of "Historismus." There is, no doubt, much sense in what Dr. Schmoller says about the danger of over-abstractness. Yet we do not feel that his method would ever have conducted him to so profound and original a theory as that of which Menger shares the honours with Jevons. Of the essays before us, perhaps the weightiest is that which relates to the interpretation of statistics. To temper with commonsense what is unqualified in the theories of Buckle and Quetelet is an office for which the writer is well adapted.

THE Roscher jubilee is the occasion of another valuable publication, Euvres économiques et philosophiques de F. Quenay. Par Auguste Oncken (Frankfort; Paris.) The editor modestly refrains from discussing the merits and refuting the errors of his author. His contributions are historical rather than dialectical. He connects and illustrates Quenay's various pieces with copious and learned notes. He constructs an admirable biography by simply reprinting anecdotes and éloges. The most argumentative portion of his writing relates to Adam Smith, whose well-known references to his friend are regarded by Prof. Oncken as not quite fair and loyal. The book will be highly prized by all who do not share Say's somewhat brutal sentiment that, as the writings of the older economists are full of errors, they had better be forgotten.

Archiv für Soziale Gesetzgebung und Statistik. Erster Jahrgang. Erster Heft. (Tübingen; London: Sampson Low.) We note the appearance of a new light in the already brilliant galaxy of German periodicals relating to social science. The Archiv, of which the inaugural number is before us, has for its objects the exposition of facts and the criticism of measures. The English reader will probably turn first to the article on the statistics of the unemployed in England. There is here a careful analysis of the official documents which have been lately published, and a just appreciation of the doubts which attach to the statements of interested parties. The fidelity of this study encourages us to take on trust the accounts of foreign populations which this publication contains. The condition of the working classes in Holland seems, according to one of the writers, to be far from satisfactory. We read that a working day of thirteen or fourteen hours is usual; a spell of eighteen or more hours is not uncommon. The writer judiciously reflects that, if mere laissez faire and the absence of labour laws, were the conditions of prosperity Dutch industry ought to be very flourishing.

NOTES AND NEWS.

AN important announcement comes to us from Rome, which is a new and very welcome proof of the liberal spirit now prevailing at the Vatican. The famous MS., Codex B. of the Old and New Testaments, long so jealously guarded, is at last being published in photographic facsimile under the auspices of the Pope and the editorship of the Abbé Cozza-Luzzi, Verallone's coadjutor in the well-known edition. One hundred copies of the New Testament are being issued, which may be had from the Fototopia Danesi, Rome, in a volume of about 300 pages, at the price of 200 lire. The first fifty subscribers will also receive four volumes of the Old Testament at the same rate for each. A smaller edition is also being issued of the Hexaplar MS., Codex Marohalianus. This will consist of fifty copies of about 1000 pages, the price of which will be 300 lire.

THE publication of the book on Russia in Central Asia, by the Hon. George Curzon, which has for some time been promised, has, owing to unavoidable delays in the preparation, been postponed till the autumn, when it will be issued by Messrs. Longmans in the month of October. In addition to an account of Mr. Curzon's travels in Central Asia, the book will contain a full discussion of the Anglo-Russian problem, with the latest information on the subject. It will have maps and illustrations, and will be rendered useful as a work of reference by the inclusion of chronological and other tables, and a bibliography of Central Asian literature. It will describe the status quo in the Russian dominions and in the frontier provinces, from official and private sources, up till the autumn of the present year. The work will form a single volume of about 500 pages.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish immediately The Book of Wedding Days, containing quotations for each day in the year, on the plan of a birthday book, with a dedicatory poem to the Princess of Wales by the Earl of Rosalyn, and with frontispiece, title-page, and illustrated borders designed by Mr. Walter Crane.

THE next volume of Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co.'s "Cavendish Library," to be published on August 10, will be a selection from the writings of William Hazlitt. This task has been performed by Mr. Alexander Ireland, author of "The Book-Lover's Enchiridion" and "Mémorial and Recollections of Ralph Waldo Emerson," &c., whose life-long acquaintance with Hazlitt's works, which extend to thirty-five volumes (an exhaustive account of which he printed about twenty years ago), is a guarantee to the reader that the selections have been made with care and discrimination. Prefixed will be a biographical and critical memoir, and also a portrait of Hazlitt, in Mr. Ireland's possession, hitherto unpublished. For the delectation of lovers of "Editions de Luxe" 125 copies have been thrown off in crown quarto for sale in this country, and seventy-five for the United States. This edition will have a special interest for admirers of Hazlitt, as it contains a view of Winterslow Hutt, a solitary inn on the border of Salisbury plain—a favourite resort of his when he wished to escape from London and bury himself in complete solitude.

MR. EDWIN LESTER ARNOLD has written a new story—metaphysical and historical—which, with one of Mr. William Black's, will follow Mr. Wilkie Collins's in the Illustrated London News. It is entitled, "The Wonderful Adventures of Phra the Phoenician"; and Sir Edwin Arnold, the writer's father, will add a preface. As in other recent stories which the enterprise of this newspaper has given us, the engravings will be a great feature.

MR. FISHER UNWIN will publish in the autumn a volume of poems by Miss Amy Levy. It will be called A London Plane-Tree, and will be illustrated by Mr. J. Bernard Partridge.

MR. FREDERICK SAUNDERS, the librarian of the Astor Library, and author of "The History of some Famous Books," will issue shortly a new volume, entitled Stray Leaves of Literature. The English publisher will be Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE Public Schools Year Book, a new annual publication, will be issued in September next by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. The first part of the book will be devoted to the educational details, and the second part to the athletics, of the thirty public schools which the first issue will include. The editors, who are representatives respectively of Eton, Harrow, and Winchester, have been fortunate enough to obtain the kind assistance of the head masters for the first part of the book, and of the chief school athletes for the second.

MR. SIDNEY YOUNG, one of the court of assistants of the worshipful Company of Barbers, has in the press The Annals of the Barber-Surgeons of London, compiled from the MS. records of the company and other original sources. The work will throw a good deal of light upon the practice of surgery during the middle ages, as well as upon the regulations of guilds in general. It will be printed in handsome quarto form, and in a limited edition, by Messrs. Blades, East & Blades; and it will be illustrated with a number of facsimiles, portraits, and engravings of the buildings and artistic treasures of the Barbers Company.

MRS. P. F. FITZGERALD, author of "An Essay on the Philosophy of Self-Consciousness," and "A Treatise on the Principle of Sufficient Reason," has in the press a new work, to be entitled Ideals of Feeling of the Intelligence and the Will: Apologia pro Amore: A New Theory of Idealism. It will be published by Messrs. Trübner.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & Co. have in preparation a volume of sermons by Father Agostino di Montefeltro.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. will shortly publish a Student's Handbook on the Thirty-nine Articles, by the Rev. J. Lightfoot, Vicar of Todmorden.

THE next volume in the series of "English Men of Action" will be Monk, written by Mr. Julian Corbett, hitherto best known for his historical romances.

THE monthly issue of the Periodical Press Index will henceforth be discontinued, and it will in future appear only as a yearly volume. The first volume, dealing with the periodical literature of 1889, will be published in January, 1890. Publishers are requested kindly to continue to address their publications for this purpose, as before, to the Editor of the P. P. Index, care of Messrs. Trübner & Co., Ludgate Hill.

THE Browning Society is not to have the two hundred copies, which it had ordered for its members, of Prof. Alexander's Introduction to the Study of Browning. As we mentioned last week, the book quotes some of Browning's poems at full length, so as to bring it under the Copyright Act. The Browning Society will, therefore, reprint such portions of the critical part of the book as it requires, no doubt including the analysis of "Sordello."

MESSRS. CURWEN, KANE & Co. have succeeded the late General Nassau Lees as proprietors of the Times of India (Bombay). For the last ten years Mr. Curwen, as editor, and Mr. Kane, as general manager, have had the joint control of the paper.

MR. M. A. BAYFIELD writes, from Malvern College, to protest against a statement in the ACADEMY of last week regarding his edition of the Ion. The reviewer remarked that the text was "printed in a Greek type which, though beautifully neat and clear, is certainly a little too small."

To this Mr. Bayfield replies that

"The Greek type is, if anything, larger than that of other plays published in Macmillan's 'Classical Series,' and is so far easier to read that there are only 27 lines to the page as against 30 or 31 in the volumes previously issued."

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE opening article in the August number of the Contemporary Review will be an important discussion of the position and future of the Papacy, illustrated by the hitherto secret history of Monsignor Persico's mission to Ireland. In the same number Sir Morell Mackenzie writes on "The Singing Voice," Mr. Frederick Harrison on "The Taking of the Bastille," Sir W. W. Hunter on "Medical Women in India," Prof. Cheyne on "The Old Testament," Mr. G. J. Romanes on "Mr. Wallace and Darwinism," the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed on Ibsen's "Peer Gyn't," Mr. H. Spielmann on "The Reform of the Royal Academy," and Dr. Henry Dunckley ("Verax") on "The Civil List and Royal Grants."

THE Fortnightly Review will contain the following articles (among others): "Giordano Bruno," by Mr. Walter Pater; "Downing Street and Africa," by Mr. Joseph Thomson; "Portuguese Bullfighting," by Mr. Oswald Crawford; and "The Present Discontent in Cyprus," by Mr. W. D. Hogarth.

MR. VICTOR MORIER, the son of our ambassador at St. Petersburg, has written a narrative of his recent journey from the Kara Sea to the Obi, which will appear in the August number of Murray's Magazine.

THE Marquis of Lorne will contribute a poem to the August number of the Scotts' Magazine, entitled "Who is the Happiest?"

A NEW departure is to be made in the August number of East and West. It was all very well to arrange for its simultaneous appearance in Paris and London; but it was a mistake to have the magazine printed in the former city. The proprietors have realised this; and East and West is henceforth to be printed in unexceptionable style, in London, and under the superintendence of Messrs. Ward & Downey. Altogether, the August number should prove an excellent sixpennyworth; for besides the fresh instalments of the serials by Mrs. Katharine Macquoid and Mme. Bigot, there will be a complete story by Mr. W. E. Norris, a second paper on Dutch painters by Mr. T. R. Macquoid, and several miscellaneous articles and poems by well-known writers. Among novelists who have promised short stories for early numbers are Bret Harte, R. D. Blackmore, and Mrs. L. B. Walford.

THE August number of Time will contain articles by Mr. J. Allanson Picton and Mr. T. E. Kebbel, and stories by Mr. G. Colmore and Mr. T. M. Barrie.

MR. F. W. ROBINSON will contribute a complete story, entitled "A Red Light on the Hills," to next week's number of Cassell's

Saturday Journal, which will also contain an illustrated article explaining "How the Queen's Household is Managed."

THE Lyceum for August will contain, among other articles, "The Working-Man's Grievance and its Remedy," "A Romance of Eternal Hope," "Framing a Constitution," "An Omnibus Philosopher," and a review of Mr. Standish O'Grady's "Hugh O'Donnell."

THE August number of Chambers' Journal will contain some verse by Miss Florence Peacock.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. A. C. BRADLEY, formerly fellow of Balliol, and now professor at University College, Liverpool, has been appointed to the chair of English Language and Literature at Glasgow, vacant by the resignation of Prof. Nichol.

THE Bishop of Durham has appointed the Rev. Dr. Herbert Kynaston, formerly principal of Cheltenham, to the professorship of Greek at Durham, vacant by the death of Canon T. S. Evans. A canonry at the cathedral is annexed to the chair.

MR. JOHN WILLIS CLARK, formerly fellow of Trinity, and editor of The Architectural History of the University of Cambridge, has announced his candidature for the office of university librarian, vacant by Dr. W. Robertson Smith's election to Sir Thomas Adams's professorship of Arabic.

THE committee for obtaining a portrait of Dr. Henry Jackson (as announced in last week's ACADEMY), has now been fully constituted as follows: The Master of Trinity, Prof. Hort, the Rev. R. St. John Parry, Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh, Mr. F. J. H. Jenkinson, Mr. H. F. Wilson, and Mr. J. D. Duff. The last-named gentlemen have consented to act as hon. treasurer and secretary of the committee; and subscriptions may be paid direct to him at Trinity College or to the "Henry Jackson Portrait Fund" at Messrs. Mortlocks, Cambridge. The constitution of a general committee has been for the present postponed.

THE following is the allocation of the grant of £15,000 for university colleges in Great Britain, set down in the Civil Service estimates for the current year: Owens College, Manchester, £1800; University College and King's College, London, £1700 each; University College, Liverpool, £1500; Mason College, Birmingham, the Yorkshire College, Leeds, and University College, Nottingham, £1400 each; University College, Bristol, the Durham College of Science, Newcastle, and Firth College, Sheffield, £1200 each; and University College, Dundee, £500. The claims of the Hartley Institution, Southampton, were postponed for the present; and the case of the Dundee College will hereafter be treated in connexion with the university of St. Andrews. It is proposed that the colleges in receipt of a grant should furnish annually a report to the Education Department, and that they should be visited from time to time by a government inspector.

THE death is announced of the Rev. Dr. Theodore Dwight Woolsey, president of Yale College from 1846 until his resignation in 1871. He died at Newhaven, on July 1, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. Dr. Woolsey graduated at Yale in 1820; and having studied for some three years in Europe, he was appointed professor of Greek in 1831. He published at this time several editions of the classics, his Alceste being still highly valued. But in this country he is best known by his Introduction to the Study of International Law, designed as an aid in teaching and historical studies (1860). His later works were chiefly political and religious.

He was one of the American committee for the revision of the New Testament.

WE have received the first number of the publications of the Haliburton, a society established at the university of King's College, Nova Scotia, "to further in some degree the development of a distinctive literature in Canada." The president is Prof. Charles G. D. Roberts, whose name is not unknown as a poet in this country. This first publication is appropriately devoted to Judge Haliburton, the creator of Sam Slick, himself a graduate of King's, and the recipient of an honorary D.O.L. from Oxford in 1858. It is written by Mr. F. Blake Crofton, formerly of Trinity College, Dublin, and now provincial librarian of Nova Scotia. The bulk of it consists of literary criticism, as just as it is appreciative; but there are also several new statements of fact concerning Haliburton's life and works, which we hope are not too late for use in the Dictionary of National Biography.

A TRANSLATION*

TO THE MEMORY OF THE TRANSLATOR OF OMAR KHAYYAM.

Poor little mouse that ranged at will on many a well-trod threshing-floor, Death's captive now, thy nimble wit shall flitch the garnered grain no more!

Kināni and Amāni with ruthless spear have thrust thee through and through,
And laid thee there that all the world that valiant deed might view!

You both had a hand, so you say, in slaying the poor little brute,
Which of you both was clever enough to cheat his mate of the loot?

Which of you two got behind when it fell to gain a trick in the fight?
For the tall, I see, of the slaughtered mouse bears the mark of a treacherous bite!

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE July number of the Antiquary does not reach the high level which we have become accustomed to expect. There is not a single article which is not of more or less interest, but we find little new knowledge. If any exception is to be made it must be in favour of Mr. J. A. Sharvel-Bayly's paper on Billericay, Essex. We wish competent antiquaries such as he would give us similar accounts of every rural village in England. Here there is a large wood called Norsey. The meaning of the term has been a battle-ground for etymologists; but nothing satisfactory has ever been made out. We believe, but are not quite certain, that this name occurs more than once in Yorkshire. English antiquaries know little of Spain, and even those to whom the language is familiar have seldom studied its highly curious topographical and historical literature. Mr. F. B. MacClintock's paper on Cuencá shows that he has not only an eye for what is to be seen, but that he knows where to look for knowledge such as does not at once manifest itself to the senses. One of the most noteworthy objects in Cuencá is the magnificent bridge built by a worthy canon, Juan del Pozo, in order to facilitate communication between the city and his newly founded Dominican house of San Pablo. It was not run up with such rapidity as similar works are executed in these days. Mr. MacClintock says it took nearly half a century to build. The cathedral, which seems once to have been a fine thirteenth-century structure, was much marred by classical alterations some two centuries ago.

THERE are three good articles in the July Livre. The first and longest is a sort of tale, half art-study, half jeu d'esprit, by the editor, illustrated "japonically" by M. Robida, and devoted to a parallel between Japanese and French-mediaeval chivalry. Next comes a note by M. Vingtrinier on a half-burnt copy of Dolet's Letters of Cicero which is in the Lyons Library, and seems to have been fished out of the hangman's bonfire; and last, another note by M. de Gourcoff on a rare edition of Meschinot's Spectacles of Princes. This is all excellent matter, well in place; and M. Robida's illustrations in the crêpe style are very funny.

WE have received the two first numbers of the Athena, the Journal of the Scientific Society of Athens, which has lately been established for the advancement of the philological, mathematical, and natural sciences in Greece. The contents of these numbers are principally devoted to philological questions, the chief articles being by Constantine S. Kontos, the president of the society, on the employment of certain classes of words in ancient Greek; by G. A. Papabasilios, critical remarks on the fragments of the Attic comedians, on the Letters of Alciphron, and on Suidas; by Sp. Bases, on certain points in Roman law and antiquities; and by G. N. Chatzidakis, on changes in accent in modern Greek. A summary of the proceedings of the society is appended. To judge from this commencement, the Athena promises to take an honourable place among learned periodicals.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE AUTHOR OF "A DISCOURSE OF ARTIFICIAL BEAUTY."

Oxford: July 22, 1889.

This treatise is attributed in the Bodleian catalogue to Obadiah Walker. It is, however, beyond a doubt, a very characteristic work of Dr. John Gauden; and it is not difficult to point out how the error arose.

The first edition appeared anonymously in 1656, with a copper-plate ornament on the title-page, bearing the motto, "Qui sequitur me in tenebris non ambulat"; and a second edition in 1662, with a copper-plate frontispiece of two ladies conversing, and a motto from Euripides. The book teems with Gauden's favourite words and phrases, such as "after-act," "fixation," "cyclopick monsters," "skirts and suburbs of religion," "additaments," "the midwifery of a pipe of good tobacco," "preposterous zeal," "to be swallowed without chewing," "tenuity," "consciousness," "clear light of Reason and Religion," &c. The jingles and alliterations in which he delights—"vestures and gestures," "sense or censure," "any or many," and so on—occur everywhere. The persistent dovetailing of the paragraphs, the peculiar use of "also," the constant antithesis of "as" and "so"—in fact, the entire mode of expression, all that constitutes style, is obviously Gauden's. The rhythm on every page cannot be mistaken for that of any other prose writer. Take, for instance, at random one sentence from p. 257:

"For as no man's dissenting may hinder the stating of my judgment, according as truth appears to me; so no more may their different practice hinder me from doing and enjoying agreeable to my judgement."

Quotations might be multiplied indefinitely; but to the student of Gauden—if any such there be—every page tells its own tale.

The treatise purports to be a dialogue between two ladies, one of whom is addressed as "your Ladyship." The eulogy on her at p. 77 (ed. 1662), and the mention of one of the "many excellent discourses" of "my Lord your Brother," at once suggest the name of Mary Countess of Warwick, of whose father-in-law's house at Lees Gauden was for some time an inmate.* Now the relations of Dr. Anthony Walker to Gauden, and his place in the history of the Eikon Basilike controversy, are well known. He was domestic chaplain to Lord Warwick while Gauden was at Lees; and he preached and published a funeral sermon on Lady Warwick in 1678, under the title of The Virtuous Woman Found. To this sermon I naturally turned, thinking that possibly some passage might occur in it which would confirm my conjecture. Nor was the result wholly disappointing. At p. 59 Dr. Walker writes:

"Though, therefore, none were farther from censuring others, or usurping judgment over their liberties; yet for her self she would never allow herself the addition of artificial handsomness (used neither paint nor patch), and was pleased with a saying of one of her spiritual Friends upon the reading the Book which apologizes for it: O Lord, I thank thee that thou gavest me not wit enough to write such a book, unless withal thou hadst given me Grace enough not to write it."

The countess belonged to the highly-gifted family of the Boyles, and "my Lord your Brother" was doubtless either the first Earl of Burlington or of Orrery—probably the latter; her youngest brother was in later years more famous than either as Robert Boyle. If any further testimony is required, I may quote one of the countess's traits, already alluded to, which is dwelt on by both writers. The author of Artificial Beauty declaims thus (p. 77):

"Yea how auxiliary are you to your servants and neighbours? how importunely do you pray for remedy? how are you (as Martha) incumbered with receipts, plaisters, and medicines of a sorts, which you think most potent, and soverain to remove any pressure or danger?"

Dr. Walker writes more soberly (p. 97):

"For the inferior sort, if they were sick or tempted, or in any distress of Body or Mind, whither should they go but to the good Countess whose Closet and Still-house was their Shop for Chirurgery and Physick, and her self (for she would visit the meanest of them personally) and Ministers whom she would send to them, their spiritual Physicians."

But to proceed. An edition of the Discourse of 1692 in my possession has a fresh Epistle Dedicatory, superseding the original "address to the reader." It bears the noteworthy initials C. G. (? Charles Gauden), and states that the author of this book is "suppos'd to be a Learned Bishop." Wood, in the first edition of the Athenae Oxonienses, attributed it both to Gauden and to Jeremy Taylor; the error was corrected in the second edition, which ascribes it to Gauden only. It was, I believe, uniformly included among Gauden's works until Dr. Bliss wrote in his edition of the Athenae, vol. iii., col. 790:

"Artificial Handsomness is ascribed to Dr] Gauden in another part of this volume, but it seems rather to have been the work of Obadiah Walker. It had a second edition in 1662 under the title of A Discourse of Artificial Beauty, with some satirical Censures on the vulgar Errors of these Times. Now these Satirical Censures were first published together with the Art of Oratory, which is generally allowed to be Obadiah Walker's. . . . For this note I am obliged to Mr. Watts, the librarian of Slion College."

Each work is quite distinct, with its own title-page and pagination; but a joint title-page is prefixed containing the names of the two treatises.

In 1662, Vulgar Errors in Practice Censured having apparently proved a failure, Royston withdrew the preliminary matter to that work, and bound up the sheets at the end of the new edition of Artificial Beauty, to the title-page of which he added the words, "With some Satirical Censures on the Vulgar Errors of these Times." The juxtaposition of the two little treatises seems to be a mere publisher's device for getting rid of an unsaleable work, such as is, I am told, not wholly unknown at the present day. The Oratory may very possibly be by Walker, whose somewhat jejune and scholastic style contrasts singularly with the exuberant rhetoric of Gauden. The Περὶ ἁπλῆς ἐπιθήμιον is written, as its English sub-title indicates, under the influence, and in close imitation, of Sir Thomas Browne, and might just conceivably be an early work of Gauden's.

It is not without interest, and I am unable to find that any guess has yet been made as to its authorship.

It seems clear, then, that in the Discourse of Artificial Beauty we have Gauden, who afterwards adopted the nom de guerre of "A Person of Honour," writing under the assumed character of a lady. I suspect that the same literary Proteus was likewise the author of The Bloody Court; or, The Fatal Tribunal, published (in blood-red ink) "by a Rural Pen, for general satisfaction"; and I have little doubt that we are indebted to him for Χάρις καὶ εὐφροσύνη; or, Some Considerations upon the Act of Uniformity. . . . "by a Servant of the God of Peace." This has been attributed to Archbishop Juxon on the sole authority of the following paragraph in Kennett's Register, p. 812:

"An excellent Discourse upon the Act of Uniformity, without the Name of the Writer; who was at least an ancient Divine of some Figure in the Church or Diocese of Canterbury; and many have thought it was Archbishop Juxon himself, and the rather, because of the Arms of his See in the Title Page, which no other Author could decently assume. And certainly the Style and Matter are so grave and serious, that it seems becoming most the Wisdom and Sanctity of that good old Man. Tho' Mr. Wood . . . tells us, that this Archbishop, Dr. Juxon, hath only extant one Sermon on Luke xviii. 31."

Kennett can scarcely have read this Discourse, in which "wisdom" and "sanctity" are not conspicuous; and his reason for attributing it to Juxon seems altogether inadequate in view of the strength of the internal evidence in favour of Gauden's authorship. It was reprinted by the Rev. W. H. Marsh in his Memoirs of Archbishop Juxon; and, after satisfying myself that it was Gauden's on reading it in the reprint, I examined it in the original edition, where occur two marginals in which Gauden is quoted, one at p. 11 ("Bodin. apud Ep. Worces. Hierasp."), and p. 47 ("Bishop Gauden"). As Gauden was elected to the see of Worcester on May 23, 1662, and died on September 23 following, this, if my suggestion as to the authorship is correct, would be the last work of Gauden's published in his lifetime. It contains a motto and several quotations from the Eikon Basilike.

SOME NOTES ON "SAMSON AGONISTES."

Presidency College, Calcutta: June 29, 1889.

I shall esteem it a favour if you would give a place in the ACADEMY to the following remarks on certain passages in "Samson Agonistes," which, so far as I am aware, have not been hitherto explained.

L. 89. "Interlunar cave."—The "cave" is not noticed in the notes in Todd's variorum edition, or any other that I have been able to consult in this country. It is mentioned, however, in the Homeric hymn to Demeter. I quote the lines. They refer to the carrying off of Proserpine:

οὐδέ τις ἀθανάτων, οὐδέ θνητῶν ἀνθρώπων ἤκουσεν φωνῆς, οὐδ' ἀγλαόκαρποι ἐταῖραι, εἰ μὴ Περσέων θυγάτηρ ἀπαλὰ φρονέουσα ἔκιν' ἔξ' ἄντρου, Ἐκάτη λικαρκοῦδεμος,
'Ἠελίος τε ἄναξ, Ἐπερίωνος ἀγλαὸς υἱός.
Il. 22-26.

* In the Bodleian copy, which belonged to Dr. Rawlinson, there is a record of the existence of two other copies of this tract. The title-page is very Gaudenian. There is an extraordinary statement about Cornet Joyce on p. 3; and the writer remarks, on p. 15, "I have talked with Travellers who can tell . . . how much the King was mourned for, especially when they saw his Book, which is Translated into all Languages almost, and sent into every Country."

The epithet ἀπαλὰ φρονέουσα is explained by Bothe to be "zärtlichgesinnt, heisst Hekate als Jugendpflegerin, κουροτρόφος." This last epithet, a common one of Artemis, as well as the present association with Helios, identifies clearly enough Hecate with the moon of the text.

" . . . if it be true
That light is in the soul,
She all in every part; . . ."

The simile in Sir John Davies's Nosce Teipsum, about the soul, no doubt furnished Milton with the idea here. In Davies the soul is united to the body, not as the spider to the web, or as the impression to the wax, or as heat to the fire, &c.:

"But as the fair and cheerful morning light
Doth here and there her silver beams impart,
And in an instant doth herself unite
To the transparent air in all and every part.

So doth the piercing soul the body fill,
Being all in all, and all in part diffused."

The last line in Milton (and in Davies) was borrowed from the Neo-Platonists; from, perhaps, the following mystical passage in Plotinus:

Ἐπεὶ δὲ, iv. 2. μεριστὴ (ἡ ψυχὴ), δὲ ἐν πᾶσι μέρεσι τοῦ ἐν δ' ἔστιν, ἀμερίστος δέ, δὲ ὅλη ἐν πᾶσι καὶ ἐν ὅσῳ αὐτοῦ ὅλη.

L. 547:

"Wherever fountain or fresh current flowed Against the eastern ray, . . ."

Mr. C. H. Tawney, principal of this college, pointed out to me two passages bearing on "eastern" here: one in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, II. ii. 1, 1. "Rain water is purest, . . . next to it, fountain water that riseth in the east, and runneth eastward"; the other in Wirt Sikes, British Goblins, iv. 2, where, speaking of mystic wells in Wales and the western counties, and the preference given to water from the "Pffynon Mair" in the neighbourhood for baptisms, the author says—"In other instances, wells which opened and flowed eastward were thought to afford the purest water." The notion in both Burton and Sikes I suppose had its origin in a passage in Ezekiel xlvii. 1-9. The latter passage is interesting in connexion with the question discussed in Dr. Masson's Life of Milton (vol. i, p. 587), whether Milton visited those parts on the occasion of the performance of "Comus." If he did so, may not some recollection of information gathered years before, about local customs and superstitions, during such a tour, have flashed across the poet's mind when, old and blind, he wrote these words in "Samson"?

L. 1224. "A slave enroll'd."—If there is a reference at all here, I am not certain what it is. Nothing about slaves and slavery mentioned in Scripture explains it. I can only suggest the following: "Enroll'd" here is perhaps the inscripti or inscripta ergastula of the Romans. If, by a glaring anachronism, Harapha is made here to refer to things Roman, he means after, or rather before, Justinian (Inst. I. xii. 3) to call Samson a servus poenae; for his aim, since l. 1178, has been to brand Samson as a convict.

In ll. 37 and 1162 the allusion in "labour of a beast" and "asses" has, to judge from Dunster's note on the second expression, been hitherto misunderstood. The explanation is given by the Greek version of Matt. xviii. 6, μύλος ονικός, which is rendered simply as "millstone" in the Authorised Version, but more literally as "mynston of asses" in Wyclif, the reference, of course, being to large mills worked by asses. Ovid, Fasti, vi. 318, has the same custom—"Et quae pumiceas versat asella molas." It is pretty plain, from all this, that the allusion is not to Apuleius's ass, as Dunster took it to be. It is not likely that Milton would go to such a source as the "Golden Ass" for an allusion, at least when there was one ready at hand in the Greek Testament.

H. M. PERCIVAL.

MIRACLES IN THE EAST.

London: July 20, 1889.

A recent leader in the Daily News is a curious illustration of the intellectual gulf between the oriental mind and ourselves. The writer says: "It is all very well to say that miracles do not occur. They do occur in Hindutan. Some of them are inscrutable still."

He then goes on to mention the case of the cataleptic ("Brahmin" he calls the Fakir), who is said to have died and been buried, and risen again after forty days. (If, as the legend usually runs, a crop of rice was sown and reaped over the grave, the period of apparent death must have been much longer.)

The lively journalist will find this "inscrutable" story explained in the account published by the late Lord W. G. Osborne of his mission to the court of Ranjit Singh.

When he goes on to emphasise his surprise by further instances, he shows that he is not sensible either of the hereditary dexterity of Eastern jugglers or of the weakness introduced into Eastern evidence by the universal ignorance of science among the people.

This latter consideration has more connexion with modern theology than has been generally observed by writers on Christian evidences. Indeed, the Oriental is not only ignorant of the limits between the possible and the impossible; he greedily craves the false, and welcomes the impossible as his choicest blessing. Populus vult decipi.

It is for this reason that I have thought these few words might be not beneath the dignity of the ACADEMY. "To write more would be to exceed the limits of politeness"—as we say in the East.

SCIENCE.

A CHINESE PHILOSOPHER.

Chuang Tzu, Mystic, Moralist, and Social Reformer. Translated from Chinese by Herbert A. Giles. (Bernard Quaritch.)

CHUANG TZU was one of the few great followers of Lao Tzu, the founder of Taoism. He lived in the sixth century before Christ, and by the book which is here translated he has earned for himself an undying reputation among his countrymen. His literary style is just such as a Chinaman admires. It is terse and rhythmical. The sentences are evenly balanced, and they are largely sprinkled with those antithetical clauses which constitute one of the highest aims of Chinese authorship. The book further has the superlative advantage of being obscure. As Mr. Giles says in his preface, "Numberless editions with ever-varying interpretations have been produced to delight and confuse the student." Almost every sentence is fought over, and almost every paragraph is held to contain as many meanings as it has found commentators. Out of this multitude of counsellors Mr. Giles chose six, "representative, as nearly as possible, of different schools of thought"; and where there was a consensus of opinion he has "followed such interpretations without demur." But when opinions differed he has "not hesitated to accept that interpretation which seemed to him to be most in harmony with the general tenour of Chuang Tzū's philosophy."

The book is one which presents many difficulties to translators. It would be as easy a task for a Chinaman to translate Aristotle into Chinese as it is for an Englishman to render Chuang Tzū into English. For not only is the style, as we have said, obscure, but the ideology which the author employs is so entirely foreign to western modes of thought that it is often extremely difficult to grasp its meaning. This being so, it is almost a matter of surprise that two English scholars should have been found bold enough to translate Chuang Tzū into English. Eight years ago Mr. Balfour brought out a translation which unquestionably left much to be desired, and Mr. Giles now follows with another. There can be no question as to which of the two best represents the sense of the Chinese author. Mr. Balfour's version is to Mr. Giles's what Beloe's translation of Herodotus is to Prof. Sayce's. Mr. Balfour followed the commentators of a corrupt and superstitious school, and failed in numberless instances to represent accurately the meaning which these blind leaders of the blind gave to the text. Mr. Giles has been far better advised as to the choice of his authorities, and his translation is in every respect superior to that of his predecessor. Having said this much, it sounds almost captious to find fault with some of his renderings. But it is impossible to compare his English version with the original without recognising departures from accuracy. He has further introduced philosophical terms which find no place in the conceptions of the author. His use of the word God with a capital G is misleading. In a majority of instances, the Chinese word which he so renders is T'ien, "Heaven"; and in one passage where this occurs four times he has translated it thrice by God and once by heaven. On p. 41, we read: "He who is inwardly straight is a servant of God. And he who is a servant of God knows that the Son of Heaven and himself are equally the children of God." In the first paragraph of his work, also, he goes to the Bible and the Arabian Nights for terms which have no relation to the Chinese text: "In the northern ocean there is a fish called the Leviathan many thousand li in size. This Leviathan changes into a bird called the Rukh, whose back is many thousand li in breadth." It is almost needless to say that these specialised terms were quite unknown to Chuang Tzū; and it is, therefore, incorrect to say that these creatures are so-named. It would be equally justifiable to render a parallel passage by saying that a Chinese demon was called Appolyon, or that a Chinese money lender was known as a Shylock.

But, from a general point of view, the work reaches a high level of excellence. Bringing European philosophical ideas to bear on the often crude and unequal conceptions of Chuang Tzū, Mr. Giles has produced a most readable and instructive work on the mysticism of the early Taoists. The Tao, or Way, of Lao Tzū can only be described by a list of epithets descriptive of its many-sided attributes, and these require scientific usage to make them intelligible. This Mr. Giles has employed, and Mr. Moore's note on the philosophy of chaps. i.-vii. throws additional light on this very abstruse subject. The arrangement of the footnotes also is to be commended. Following the Chinese system, Mr. Giles has incorporated them into the text, but in a smaller type. The result is that the eye is saved that distracting pursuit of particular notes at the foot of the page, and subsequent search for the recovery of the passage which has been interrupted.

ROBERT K. DOUGLAS.

SOME BOOKS ON GEOMETRY.

Elementary Synthetic Geometry of the Point, Line, and Circle in the Plane. By N. F. Dupuis. (Macmillan.)

Analytical Geometry of the Straight Line and Circle. By D. Munn. (Rivingtons.)

A Syllabus of Modern Plane Geometry. A. I. G. T. (Macmillan.)

A Treatise on Geometrical Conics. By A. Cockshott and F. B. Walters. (Macmillan.)

A First Euclid. By H. Daman. (Sonnen-schein.)

MR. DUPUIS'S work is, he tells us, a result of his experience in teaching geometry to junior classes in Queen's College, Kingston, Canada. He entitles it "elementary," and so it is, for it begins at the beginning of the subject and treats of no higher curves than the circle. But whether he would consider it suitable for absolute beginners is not so certain. The style in which it is written would seem to presuppose a reader of more mature intelligence than those possess who commence for the first time the formal study of geometry. Viewed as a textbook for junior students in a college, it is an excellent work in respect both of its contents and of its manner of treatment. The first three parts may be said to correspond in extent to the first six books of Euclid's Elements; but the method of exposition and the terminology are modern throughout. The principle of motion in the transformation of figures and the principle of continuity are freely employed, and meanings are given to the operative symbols of algebra which permit of the application of algebraic forms in geometry. Proportion is treated by the method of measures instead of that of multiples, and in deducing geometric relations use is made of the trigonometrical functions sine and cosine. The two last parts of the book are devoted to the theories of the mean centre, inversion, similitude, anharmonic and harmonic division, reciprocation, homography, and involution. The author's intention in preparing the book has been "to furnish the student with that kind of geometrical knowledge which may enable him to take up most successfully the modern works on analytical geometry." The only slip of any importance occurs on p. 167, where the "pantograph or eidograph" is spoken of. Scheiner's pantograph and Wallace's eidograph are not precisely the same instrument, though they are intended for the same purpose.

Mr. Munn intends his book to be an introduction to the study of analytical geometry, and he accordingly treats only of the straight line and the circle. Such a restriction enables him to discuss this part of the subject much more fully than is usual, and those who understand the methods employed will enter with ease on the study of conics in general. The difficulties which beginners who have no great aptitude for mathematics experience with most of the text-books on analytical geometry arise from their not seeing why such and such a course of reasoning is adopted. They are able to follow the different steps of the reasoning, and they admit their correctness; but why, to take a simple instance, a process of subtraction should be performed between the respective members of two equations to obtain a third equation, instead of any other process, they cannot divine. The only remedy for this vagueness of apprehension is to lay more stress on the principle or the rationale of the method by which a result is reached, than on the elegance of the method, or the rapidity of attaining the end. Mr. Munn's treatment of the straight line, of equations above the first degree representing straight lines, and of the circle, is very detailed and interesting; and it is illustrated by a considerable number of examples and diagrams. Numerous exercises for solution are appended to most of the chapters. Perhaps the matter preliminary to the fourth chapter might have been omitted as well-known; and there seems no reason for defining and illustrating harmonic division on one page, and on the next introducing anharmonic ratio without any previous mention of what it is.

The Syllabus of Modern Plane Geometry, prepared by a committee of the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching, consists of nine sections: (1) an introduction; (2) properties of a triangle; (3) harmonic ranges and pencils; (4) properties of a complete quadrilateral and complete quadrangle; (5) properties of a circle; (6) properties of two or more circles; (7) geometrical maxima and minima; (8) cross ratios, involution, and reciprocal polars; (9) projection. Under the second section are given several of the principal and recently discovered properties relating to symmedian lines and point, Brocard points, triplicate-ratio circle, Brocard circle, cosine circle, Taylor circle, and Tucker circles. The Syllabus is a very valuable compendium of properties; but it is somewhat lacking in arrangement. That defect, however, it shares with most of the manuals of modern geometry.

The treatise of Messrs. Cockshott and Walters consists mainly of five chapters on the parabola, orthogonal projections, the ellipse, the hyperbola, the sections of a cylinder and cone; and in these chapters the sequence of propositions given in one of its syllabuses by the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching has been adopted. Some propositions peculiar to the rectangular hyperbola, and several important theorems on the parabola, conic sections, sections of a cylinder and cone have been enunciated without proof; and at the end there is a tolerably large collection of problems for solution, mostly taken from Cambridge sources. The noteworthy features of the book are the clearness and conciseness of the demonstrations, and the well-selected sets of deductions that accompany the various propositions in the text. A word of praise should not be grudged to the printing and the diagrams, the latter of which are admirable and abundant. The book is one of the best introductions to the geometry of the conic sections which have yet appeared. One remark may be permitted. The only discoverer of any of the numerous properties of the conic sections who is mentioned by Messrs. Cockshott and Walters (Mr. Richardson in his Geometrical Conic Sections, the A. I. G. T. in their syllabus, do exactly, and Mr. Besant in his Conic Sections almost exactly, the same thing) is Adams. Surely, in connexion with this subject the name of Apollonius of Perga deserves commemoration.

Mr. Daman's First Euclid consists of the first twenty propositions of the first book of Euclid's Elements, and is intended chiefly for pupils to whom the subject presents difficulties. As stated in the preface, its distinctive features are: (1) the addition of an exercise on arguments of a very simple kind; (2) special prominence and clearness given to the principal argument or arguments in each proposition; (3) the insertion of an abridged proof after each proposition. Another distinctive feature, not stated in the preface and worthy of remark, is that, in the naming of angles by three letters, the middle letter is always printed larger than the other two. The illustrations showing that each argument consists of two reasons and a conclusion are almost all simple, and such as would interest young beginners and smooth their way to the understanding of Euclid's text. The only suggestion one can make for the improvement of the book is that the lettering of the diagrams should be made more conspicuous.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RAVENNA ARISTOPHANES.

Queen's College, Oxford: July 19, 1887.

The history of the Ravenna Aristophanes, so far as it is known, is given by M. Albert Martin, after Von Velsen and W. G. Clark, in the preface to his collation of the scholia (Les Scolies du Manuscrit d'Aristophane à Ravenne, Paris, 1882).

The book originally belonged to the library of the Dukes of Urbino, but must have been stolen thence long before the library passed into the Vatican—either in 1513, as Mr. Clark conjectured, or in 1503, as M. Martin thinks more probable. What became of it after Giunta used it for his edition of 1515 is quite unknown, and the time at which it entered the library of the Cameldulensians of Classe is equally lost. It is upon this last point that I have a fresh piece of evidence to adduce.

M. Martin brings forward, as a proof of the book's absence from the Classense, the fact that neither Mabillon in 1685, nor Montfaucon in 1698, while they mention Ravenna, take any notice of an ancient MS. of Aristophanes as there existing. And this I take to be good evidence. No one, in fact, has hitherto been known to mention the MS. earlier than Invernizzi in his edition of 1794.

I have lately noticed that a traveller who passed through Italy some thirty years later than Montfaucon, stopped at Ravenna, and, this time, found the Aristophanes there. Among the collection of D'Orville's books and MSS. which the Bodleian possesses are two paper books in his own handwriting, containing notes of his travels. One of these (x. 2. 4. 31) consists of lists of MSS. taken down in the different libraries that he visited. On p. 255 begins an "Index Codicum in variis bibliothecis," and the first heading is "Ravennae, in bibliotheca quae ad Classes vocatur"; after the descriptions of MSS. of Eustathius, Pindar, Hesiod, and Lucan, there follows the entry "Aristophanis comoediae omnes. opt. cod. perg. XI." This is plainly the "Ravennae." Now it appears from the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique et Critique, par Jacques Genges de Chauspié (Amsterdam, 1753), tom. 3, letter O, p. 82, that

"ce fut au commencement de l'été de l'année 1726, que Mr. D'Orville entreprit ce nouveau voyage; il prit sa route par la France et se rendit à Turin. De Turin il alla à Milan, et parcourut la plus grande partie de l'Italie—il vit successivement Pavie, Plaisance, Parme, Modène, Mirandole, Mantoue, Vérone, Vicence, Padoue, Venise, Ferrare, Boulogne, Imola, Faënze, Ravenne, Rimini, Pesaro, &c., et enfin il se rendit à Rome."

Between the years, therefore, 1698 and 1726 the Aristophanes must have found its way to Ravenna. Does not this conclusion tend to strengthen what M. Martin declares to be the tradition of the library—viz., that the MS. was acquired by the Abate Cannetti, towards the beginning of the last century?

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE usual annual long excursion of the Geologists' Association has been fixed for the week August 5 to 10. The district to be visited is North-west Cumberland and the Eden Valley, with Carlisle as the headquarters. The directors will be Mr. T. V. Holmes, the president, and Mr. J. G. Goodchild. In addition, arrangements have been made, through Dr. H. J. Johnston-Lavis, for a special Italian excursion. This will consist of two parts: (1) from September 15 to 30, the Lipari Islands and Sicily (including Etna); and (2) during the whole of September, Naples and Rome. Among those who have promised their assistance are Prof. Silvestri, of Catania; Prof. Bassani, of Naples; and Profs. Stüver and Meli, of Rome. The Italian excursion is not confined to members of the association; and any persons desirous of taking part in it should communicate with Dr. J. Foulerton, 44 Pembridge-villas, Bayswater, W.

Hampstead Hill is the title of a small work on the natural history, &c., of Hampstead, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Roper & Drowley. The various sections are written by Prof. J. L. Lobley, Dr. H. T. Wharton, the Rev. Dr. Walker, and Mr. J. E. Harting. The book will be illustrated with engravings of local scenery.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MR. E. R. WHARTON has reprinted from the Transactions of the Philological Society (Trübner) his paper on "Loan-Words in Latin," which, with a former paper on "Latin Vocalism," may be regarded as anticipations of his forthcoming work entitled Etyma Latina. He begins with statistics. The total number of words in classical Latin, down to A.D. 117, as given in the dictionaries, amounts to 26,300, of which about 3500 come from Greek, and perhaps 300 from other languages. The proportion of loan-words in Latin is, therefore, about 14 per cent., as compared with only 2½ per cent. in Greek, and as much as 75 per cent. in English. Mr. Wharton first discusses a doubtful class, including (1) foreign words not really naturalised; (2) genuine Latin words cognate with, but not borrowed from, the foreign ones; and (3) hybrid words, such as Plautus was fond of coining. He then discusses the changes which Greek words undergo when passing into Latin, as regards both vowels and consonants, the latter being chiefly affected by dialect (including slang), the rules regarding adjoining letters, popular etymology, and analogy. He enumerates no less than 93 words which, though found in no extant Greek authors, must once have been living Greek words; and also a large number which prove that the Greek equivalents must once have had a larger meaning than appears in extant Greek literature. Turning to the non-Greek loan-words, about 90 seem foreign, though we cannot tell whence they came; about 70 are from Aryan languages, and 32 from un-Aryan languages. Of the Aryan, about 20 come from Umbrian and Oscan, about 40 from Celtic (of which only one is distinctly British, bascanda=tub), and 5 from Teutonic. Of the un-Aryan, perhaps 13 are Etruscan and as many Phoenician, only one being traceable to Basque, Lat. mannus = cob, and Basque mando = mule. It is noteworthy that nearly all the Celtic words have to do with military matters, wheeled vehicles, or articles of apparel. Vates is treated as borrowed from Celtic, being a shepherd's term, for the regular Latin form would be votēs*.

THE current number of the Journal of Philology (Macmillan) does not contain any very notable articles. A special interest, however, attaches to the "Adversaria Noniana" of the late J. H. Onions, in which he gives his views upon the text of Book I.-III. (often in opposition to L. Mueller), based on his own collation of the MSS. There are two other articles dealing with textual criticism: (1) in which Mr. A. O. Clark maintains the value of Harleian MS. 2682 for the Verrines; and (2) in which the Rev. J. Armitage Robinson reports the results of his collation of several MSS. of the Philocalia of Origen. Mr. A. E. Hausman continues his over-bold "Horatiana," of which we may quote one example:

"Post hoc ludus erat capiti potare magistro."

Finally, Mr. Arthur Platt contributes some four papers on Homeric matters, and a fifth on Plato's geological opinions.

THE July number of the Classical Review (David Nutt) is again noteworthy for its obituary notices. The late Canon Evans is described as a Rugby master by Mr. H. Sidgwick, as a Durham professor by Prof. Sanday; Mr. S. G. Owen writes about his friend, J. H. Onions; and I. B., in briefly commemorating Prof. Chandler, incidentally specifies some of his anonymous publications. Of the other articles, perhaps the most important are that by Mr. Walter Leaf identifying Codex Wittianus of the Iliad with Harleian MS. 5963; and the two reviews of Dr. Sterrett's Epigraphical Journeys in Asia Minor—a work which adds one tenth to the total number of inscriptions contained in the Greek Corpus—by Prof. W. M. Ramsay, of Aberdeen, and Mr. H. Weir Smyth, of Bryn Mawr.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, June 25.)

DR. JOHN BEDDOE, president, in the chair.—Prof. Victor Horsley exhibited some examples of prehistoric trephining and skull-boring from America.—Governor Moloney exhibited some cross-bows, long-bows, quivers, and other weapons of the Yorubas.—The Rev. Dr. Codrington read a paper on poisoned arrows, in which he stated that the natives relied on the words of incantation used during the manufacture of the arrows much more than on the toxic effect of any substance into which they might be dipped or which might be smeared upon them; indeed, that in many cases the so-called "poisoned arrows" were not poisoned at all.—A paper by Mr. Henry Balfour on the structure and affinities of the composite bow was also read.

FINE ART.

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY EXHIBITION, EDINBURGH.

THE Naval and Military Exhibition, to whose opening at Edinburgh we have already briefly referred, is one of quite unusual interest and extent. The catalogue, which has been mainly compiled by Mr. Andrew Ross, the historian of several of our regiments, embraces over five thousand items, with which the entire galleries of the Royal Scottish Academy are literally crowded; and it annotates them in such a careful and minute fashion as to make the little volume a work of reference of permanent value upon the subjects with which it deals.

The series of weapons begins in the first room with a curious display of prehistoric relics, flint arrow- and spear-heads, axes, celts, and balls, many of them contributed from the collection of Mr. John Rae. In the second gallery is a gathering of mediaeval weapons and armour, contributed by Sir Noel Paton, the Hon. R. Baillie Hamilton, and other owners. Among these may be mentioned a particularly fine cap-a-pie suit of fifteenth-century plate armour, several exquisitely finished armorer's models, and a fine collection of the old Scottish two-handed claymores. Here, too, is the celebrated Douglas-Clephane relics, lent by the Marquis of Northampton. These include the beautiful but much injured Clephane horn—a work of elaborately carved ivory, believed to be Carolingian art of of the ninth century, done upon Byzantine lines; and the curious "Iron Hand" of the Douglas-Clephanes of Caralgie, which, according to tradition, was given by Robert the Bruce to his faithful adherent De Clephane to supply the loss of a hand which had been shorn away in battle, and to enable him to manage the bridle of his warhorse. It was shrewdly suspected by one of our ablest Scottish archaeologists that this famous "Iron Hand" would, upon examination, prove to be nothing other than a mediæval relic-casket—a metal case designed for the preservation of the bones of the arm and hand of some venerated saint. This, however, is by no means so: the iron structure is evidently a piece of mechanism, and the fingers have been arranged so as to move by means of now dilapidated springs—though how these could be set in motion by the remaining stump of the warrior's arm is difficult to imagine.

In the same portion of the exhibition is a most interesting collection of Highland brooches, bone powder-horns, and sporans, in the incised decoration of which we see still surviving the old Celtic instinct for elaborate arabesque design. Here, too, is a series of "Donne pistols"—weapons in which the Scottish National Museum of Antiquities is particularly rich; and some fine examples of Highland and other targets, including one of stamped and gilded leather, beautifully ornamented with a group of Apollo and the Muses, lent by the Hon. R. Baillie Hamilton.

The central gallery of the exhibition contains a very complete collection of the weapons supplied to the British regiments from the middle of the last century to the present time; a series of Highland dirks elaborately mounted in gold and silver, including that worn by George IV. during his celebrated visit to Scotland; and a number of historic swords, among the rest that of Sir John Moore, and that with which Sergeant Ewart of the Scots Greys cut down the French officer when capturing the eagle at Waterloo. In the next room is a series of Eastern weapons, gorgeous in their adornments of precious stones and metals, these strange blades

"Yataghan, kandjar, things that rend and rip, Gash rough, slash smooth, help hate so many ways,

Yet ever keep a beauty that betrays
Love still at work with the artificer
Throughout his quaint devising."

The South Gallery of the Exhibition is mainly devoted to the productions of Arabs, Zulus, Kaffirs, and the more distinctly savage tribes; but among them is a particularly rich and beautiful case of Japanese sword-guards, exquisite examples of inlaid metal-work, contributed by Mr. H. H. Norie. In a side octagon is displayed a collection of weapons, sketches, &c., lent by the Military Service Institution of the United States, and a selection of North American Indian exhibits from the collections of Lieut. H. W. Wheeler and Dr. T. F. Azpell.

The collection of documents, proclamations, military plans, drawings, &c., is extensive and curious, and would require much time for the examination which it merits; and various series of coloured sketches portray the costume of the British army from early times, many actual examples of the uniforms being also shown.

In the department of portraiture the exhibition possesses considerable interest—an interest in most cases due rather to the celebrity of the personages portrayed than to the quality of the art which depicts them. Here, however, we have the beautiful "Cartwright" portrait of Graham of Claverhouse—which many will remember as one of the most fascinating works shown in the recent Stuart Exhibition; and the portrait of Major-General James Stuart, Commander-in-Chief in India—known by his operations against Tippoo Sahib and his capture of Cuddalore in 1783—is an excellent, if rather injured, example of Romney, with the firmly-modelled, silvery-toned flesh which is characteristic of such of his finer works as his "Ossian" Macpherson, and his "Jane, Duchess of Gordon, and her Son." A portrait of Sir John Moore is attributed to Gainsborough, and is not unworthy of his brush; the portrait of the last Duke of Gordon, the full-length of Admiral Maitland, and the portrait of Admiral David Milne are fair examples of Raeburn; the full-length of Major-General Dudgeon shows the strong realism of George Watson, the first president of the Scottish Academy; and in the cabinet-sized group of Lord Heathfield and General Sir William Green at Gibraltar in 1784, we have a curious example of George Carter, whose "Siege of Gibraltar" and other works were exhibited in Pall Mall in the following year. Various battle-pieces by living Scottish painters are shown, including the original sketches for Mr. Robert Gibbs's "Retreat from Moscow" and "Thin Red Line"; and "Highlanders attacking a Hill Fort"—a vigorous subject by Mr. Skeoch Cumming, who has recently executed a clever picture of the Royal Company of Archers; while Lady Butler's "Rorke's Drift" is sent by the Queen from Windsor, and hangs at the end of the galleries, surrounded by a particularly extensive collection of British war-medals.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE works of students in schools of art throughout the kingdom, submitted for national competition, are now on view at the South Kensington Museum. The exhibition will remain open during the month of August.

THE following gentlemen have been elected members of the Royal Society of British Artists: Messrs. W. D. Almond, Frank Brangwyn, Nelson Dawson, F. Hamilton Jackson, James Macmaster, Robert Morley, C. Mottram, Laslett J. Pott, Adam E. Proctor, Octavius Rickatson, F. Cayley Robinson, R. W. A. Rouse, Henry Sykes, W. Harding Smith, William Strutt, H. T. Schäfer, and W. H. Y. Titcomb.

UNDER the presidency of Mr. Thomas Wardle, of Leek, the Silk Association of Great Britain and Ireland held a meeting on Tuesday last, in the rooms of the Society of Arts, to confer with a committee of ladies for the purpose of arranging an exhibition of British and Irish silk manufacture. Mr. George J. S. Lock (of Collinson & Lock) has consented to act as hon. secretary.

A SPECIAL exhibition of local works of art, by living and deceased artists, is being got together by Messrs. Barkas & Son, on the occasion of the meeting of the British Association at Newcastle in September.

THE annual exhibition of paintings selected from the Paris Salon is now open in the Continental Gallery, New Bond Street.

AT the annual meeting of the Society for Preserving the Memorials of the Dead, attention was drawn to the deplorable condition of the monument of George Chapman, the translator of Homer, in the church of St. Giles-in-the-Fields.

At the weekly meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions on July 12, M. Edouard Naville, introduced by Prof. Maspero, gave an account of his excavation of the great temple of Bubastis on behalf of the Egypt Exploration Fund. He stated that the inscriptions found enabled him to follow the history of the temple for three thousand years, from Cheops and Chefset to Ptolemy Epiphanes; and that the statues found belong to the style which Mariette assigned to the Hyksos period. At the same meeting, M. Héron de Villefosse exhibited a gilt bronze plate, found at Narbonne in January, 1888, which contains a fragment of a law, 27 B.C., relating to the duties of the flamen of Augustus, and also to the provincial assemblies of Gallia Narbonensis, over which the flamen presided. This plate has been purchased by M. Ad. Démy, for presentation to the Louvre; and it is now on view at the Paris Exhibition.

THE last number of the American Journal of Archaeology (London: Trübner) opens with three papers contributed by members of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens. To the first of these, Dr. Charles Waldstein's account of the newly-discovered head of Iris from the frieze in the Parthenon, attention has already been drawn in the ACADEMY. The other two deal with the excavations conducted last winter in the Attic deme of Icaria, and are both written by Mr. Carl D. Buck. The more interesting is that in which he describes, with elaborate details, the discovery of a stele in low relief, which bears a most striking resemblance to the famous "warrior of Marathon." Unfortunately, this new stele bears no inscription, and scarcely any marks of colour. From the heliogravure plate here given, it seems to be of distinctly inferior workmanship to the other; and we cannot agree with Mr. Buck's opinion that the two are by the same hand, though they may be of the same date. Dr. W. Hayes Ward continues his series of papers on so-called "human sacrifices" on Babylonian cylinders. A new feature is the report on his work in Egypt during last winter by Mr. Farly B. Goddard, the American scholar of the Egypt Exploration Fund. Finally, we have the usual full archaeological news, and reviews of books, in great part condensed from those that have appeared elsewhere.

THE STAGE.

IBSEN AGAIN.

ANOTHER play by Ibsen has been tested upon the stage of London; and to most of those not duly fortified, if I may dare to say so, by a parti pris, the result has been as disappointing as it was in the case of "The Doll's House." Moreover, "Pillars of Society"—though it has been played for us well—has been played for us without the genius of Miss Achurch. The piece is in four acts; but when Mr. William Archer prepared a version, for performance at the Gaiety some nine years ago, he had the wisdom to omit nearly the whole of the first. The truly faithful Ibsenite, however—he especially who airs his admiration in the lesser newspapers—

"Like bats appearing when the sun goes down,
From holes obscure, and corners of the town"—
the truly faithful Ibsenite likes to have the whole of the "master"; and we were spared not a single dullness, not a single longueur, on the afternoon of Wednesday week. The occasion was the benefit of little Miss Vera Beringer; and if the people had not acted very well in the main, and if we had not known that at the end of the affair Mrs. Kendal was going to recite and M^{de}me. Antoinette Sterling to sing, I cannot tell, in sooth, how we should have got through the performance. That dull first act! It leads to very little; its construction is amateurish; it is almost wholly without interest. No judge of literature could point me out in it, from its very beginning to its very end, one line in which a satire is conveyed brilliantly, or a truth conveyed potently. In it, from beginning to end, not a thing is memorable, not a thing is exquisitely said. Of course, I do not forget that we deal with a translation; but it is the translation of a man of ability.

The truth is, "Pillars of Society," like all of Ibsen's work that I am privileged to know—except it may be "Ghosts"—is an estimable local product: good for a particular neighbourhood. To the London of to-day, to the Paris of to-day, to the Boston or Baltimore of to-day, it makes practically no appeal. We may pay tribute, willingly enough, to its sincerity and independence; but we are leagues beyond the need of its faintly puerile satire, of its exceedingly obvious moral. As usual with Ibsen, ministers of religion, professors of religion, are mocked at wherever there is an opportunity. If Puritanism of the duller and stupider kind still survives in Scandinavia—and I daresay it does—this mockery may be very desirable there. But to us it says nothing. At least, it says nothing, unless you can take it into the commonest of the Dissenting chapels. Everything that Ibsen has done in the way of satire upon an insincere or a ridiculous religious profession was done ten thousand times better, two generations ago, by Dickens, in Pickwick, in Black House, in I know not how much of his work besides. A couple of centuries before Dickens, there lived a master of comedy, whose name was Molière. He, too, is generally believed to have launched his arrows with pretty considerable effect at hypocrisy and prudery. But why, in connexion with Ibsen, do I mention at all the acknowledged genius of English fiction, the acknowledged genius of the comedy of France? All that Ibsen has done in this particular, at least in "Pillars of Society," was done a quarter of a century ago, by I really forget what second-rate English author, in the piece called "The Serious Family." That piece, it has just been implied, was not of the first order; yet many a time has it been laughed at, and it could be laughed at again. I can scarcely suppose that anyone, with sense of humour, laughs heartily at the satire of Ibsen. Those who smile are, in reality, applauding, not the inadequate artist, but the superfluous missionary. "Superfluous" for the most part; no doubt when Dina Dorf desires to be "natural," many sympathies go out towards that young person.

Just as local in its application as his satire on the clergy, is Ibsen's second great point, his second great mission—the position of women. So far as I know his plays, from the beginning to the end of them there is not a moment's recognition that any place is accorded to woman beyond the place of the unquestioning follower, the doll, the housewife, or the drudge. How can a writer claim to be a "path-breaker" for our world of Western civilisation if the world he represents lies under conditions from which this Western world has long ago been delivered? For us, Ibsen is not a discoverer; he is not an initiator; he is not a great literary artist. He is, taking him as a whole, and when we have done with his hopeless first act of "Pillars of Society," a fairly capable and thoughtful craftsman of the second order, working, in remote regions, chiefly for the remote and the behind-hand. To parade Ibsen in London as for one instant on a level with the greater English writers, with Frenchmen of the stamp of Dumas, Zola, Emile Augier, or with such an American as Walt Whitman—Prof. Herford, writing from the fastnesses of Wales, will allow that my selection, if inevitably "cockneyfied," is scarcely Puritanic—to parade Ibsen, I say, as the equal of these artists and these geniuses of England, France, America, is as if one were to accord to Mr. Edward Capern, the excellent poet-postman of Bideford, the triumph of Robert Burns.

Having thus sought again, and sought now once for all, to put Ibsen, so far as my few readers are concerned, in his own comfortable place, and not upon the dangerous heights to which a certain school of criticism—and a clever man or so besides—are wont rashly to motion him, let me come to the far more congenial business of speaking pleasantly of the acting of his play. If it were not that about two or three of the impersonations there had lurked an unmistakable flavour of "The Little Lord Fauntleroy," one could have said that the piece was played excellently in all its parts. As it was, certain of the actors, accustomed for three hundred nights to be seen in Mrs. Burnett's comedy, hardly succeeded in realising that the mannerisms which fitted Mrs. Burnett's comedy were somewhat in the way in this rudimentary study of primitive life, or of life in the social backwater. But among the men performers, four deserve to be singled out as having given us impersonations both creditable and interesting. These are Mr. W. H. Vernon as Consul Bernick, Mr. Grahame as Johan Tønnessen, Mr. John Beauchamp as Parson Röllund, and Mr. Wood as Aune. Mr. Vernon's habit, or the necessity of his temperament—whatever it is that causes him to represent feeling with reticence—suited Consul Bernick quite excellently. The frankness and manliness of Mr. Grahame were well employed in the character of the brother-in-law who has taken Consul Bernick's sins upon his own head; and Mr. Beauchamp knew how to represent the dryness, cowardice, and pedantry which, in the Ibsenite imagination, are inseparable from the reverend. A breath of fresh air came on to the stage with Mr. Wood's impersonation of the honest shipwright.

Of the ladies, none were bad. Mrs. Bernick's part is unimportant and colourless; Mrs. Dawes represented it not only inoffensively, but with suavity. With subtlety and tenderness, as well as with discretion and good taste, Miss Robins represented the woes and the long-suffering of the consul's sister Martha. To Mrs. Rummel Miss Fanny Robertson succeeded in giving a good deal of character. As Dina Dorf, Miss Annie Irish—who has a voice of satin, and who brings the sunshine—was as "submissive-mutinous" as Fifi at the fair. Olaf, the consul's son, was played by Miss Vera Beringer, with the little lady's usual decisiveness, independence, and spirit. And a very serious, though not always an agreeable artist, Miss Genevieve Ward, brought the force of her unquestionable talent—her warmth and pungency—to the representation of that well-meaning and courageous revolutionist, Lona Hessel.

In seeing "Pillars of Society," we have seen for the first time, and probably for the last, a meritorious curiosity from outland parts.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

STAGE NOTES.

THE Shaftesbury and the Haymarket Theatres have closed their doors. When the former re-opens in a month's time it will be with Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's new piece "The Middleman"—a capital title, promising us the discussion of a problem. We have already announced that Mr. Willard's part in this piece is to be both elderly and sympathetic. We may add that Miss Maud Millett is engaged for the part of the heroine, whose opportunities are in two acts out of the four of which the play consists. We hear that Miss Annie Hughes is likewise engaged at this theatre.

IN Mr. Tree's little speech at the closing of the Haymarket, he referred to the possibility of producing "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; but the adaptation of "Roger la Honte" will no doubt take precedence of Shakspeare. The re-opening of the Haymarket is fixed for the early part of September. Mr. Tree has renewed his lease, and announces certain structural alterations—it is not, however, mentioned whether these include the restitution of the pit.

THERE is a change of programme at the Criterion to-night, the very brief run of "David Garrick" being interrupted for the production of a comedy by Mr. Burnand, entitled "The Headless Man." In no case, however, can "The Headless Man" be played long at present, as Mr. Wyndham and Miss Mary Moore and the company are shortly off to America.

"THE FARM BY THE SEA"—Mr. Frederick Wedmore's adaptation of "Jean Marie"—is to be sent into the provinces for the autumn, with Mr. Buchanan's latest comedy, "The Old Home."

THE Kendal banquet last week was as representative as, under the circumstances, it was possible to make it. It formed, in any case, a reasonable tribute to two admirable artists. Mr. Chamberlain was in many ways the right man in the right place as president on the occasion, though his speech was not perhaps in every respect what was expected. That is to say, there was wanting—as it seems to us—to the banquet a brief and characteristic analysis of Mrs. Kendal's art: some rapid but authoritative statement of the qualities by the possession of which Mrs. Kendal has attained her great position—that of the leading actress of the English stage. Such an authoritative statement an accepted critic of eminence—such as Mr. Knight or Mr. Moy Thomas—might well, we think, have made. But, however this may be, America will not misunderstand the significance of a demonstration well intended and, on the whole, well carried out. What the demonstration meant was this—that the best judges of acting on this side of the water feel that America is destined to receive this autumn the greatest actress England is likely during the present generation to be able to send her.

MR. EDWIN DREW's forthcoming volume will be entitled Henry Irving, On and Off the Stage, not "Irving's Elocution," as was at first announced, and will be more comprehensive than was originally intended.

MUSIC.

MUSIC BOOKS.

Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Appendix. (Macmillan.) It was long ago evident that many corrections and additions would have to be made to Sir George Grove's Dictionary, and the Appendix edited by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland has now made its appearance. It contains a fairly long notice of Dvorák, whose name was almost unknown in England when the first volume of the Dictionary was published. In the present account of the composer we are told that the performance of his "Stabat Mater" by the London Musical Society on March 10, 1883, so aroused public attention that Dvorák was invited to London to conduct his work at the Albert Hall on March 13. To the latter date the writer has omitted to add 1884, so that it reads as if the second performance took place three days after the first. The music of "St. Ludmilla" is somewhat severely criticised, but no mention is made of the interesting libretto which was to a great extent the cause of the failure of the Oratorio. Arrigo Boito is another eminent composer to whom justice is rendered. The notice, written by Signor Mazzucato, the well-known author of the recent Italian version of "Die Meistersinger," is most interesting. We are glad to learn that the opera "Nerone," said to be Boito's magnum opus, is "so far advanced that, if the author chooses, it may be got ready in a few weeks." Pierre Bénédict is discussed by M. A. Jullien; but we think the critical remarks on his works, however interesting in themselves, out of place in a Dictionary. There are also notices of César Cui, the Russian, and Dudley Buck, the American composer. The name of Berlioz is to be found, but only for the purpose of correcting a statement in the Dictionary article. Surely something more might have been attempted, for in that article but scant respect was paid to the great French composer. Under "Handel," Mr. Rockstro returns to the subject of the disputed "Magnificat," and quotes Schoelcher, who says "that in introducing some six or seven movements of the 'Magnificat' into the second part of 'Israel,' Handel was only making a perfectly justifiable use of his own property." However, a few columns later, under "Harmonious Blacksmith," we are told by Mr. Cummings that "Handel borrowed systematically from other authors, dead and living, whenever he found anything to suit his purpose." This fact might, at least, have been mentioned by Mr. Rockstro, for it counts for something in the discussion as to the authorship of the "Magnificat." There is a very welcome addition to "Beethoven," signed, of course, G. First of all, many corrections made in late editions are given; and then comes a list of the composer's works, compiled from Nottebohm's catalogue, the Letters, and other sources. But no notice is taken of the supplemental volume issued last year by Breitkopf & Härtel, so probably the article had gone to press before it appeared. Under "Histories," we find no mention of Mr. J. S. Rowbotham's History of Music in three volumes. It is rather curious to find under this heading "Robert Schumann's Gesammelte Schriften über Musik und Musiker, 1854-70 (published as Music and Musicians in 1881)."

Surely short newspaper articles and reviews of music ought not to rank among "principal musical histories." But what do the dates 1854-70 mean? The first date in the Gesammelte Schriften is 1834, and the last 1853. The "published as Music and Musicians in 1881" refers, we presume, to the English translation. In the matter of dates and statements the Dictionary was not immaculate, and the Appendix in this matter resembles it. "Parsifal," for instance, is said to have been produced at Bayreuth on July 28, 1882. But the first private performance was on July 26, and the first public one on July 30. Again, Henschel did not start his concerts in the winter of 1885-6, but in that of 1886-7. And, by the way, although many compositions by English writers were introduced during that season, there was not—as stated here—one English composition in each programme. In connexion with pianists there are a good many slips. Mme. Essipoff is said not to have appeared in England since 1880. She, however, gave recitals in London in 1884. Pachmann did not make his debut here with Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, but with Chopin's Concerto in F minor. Of Planté, the French pianist, we are told that he "has never appeared in England." Yet he played at a concert of the Philharmonic Society on May 1, 1878. With regard to dates, there is a curious remark under "Sarasate." It is as follows: "The right date of birth is that given in the Dictionary." What does this mean? That other dates which lack this confirmation are less trustworthy? Under "Agitato," the "Piano Agitato" referred to in the Dictionary as the time-indication of Mendelssohn's "Lied ohne Worte" (Book IV., No. 5) is said to be probably a mere misprint for "Poco Agitato." It might have been added that the word "Poco" is the one used in the new critical edition of Mendelssohn's works published by Breitkopf & Härtel. Under "Chopin," the seventeen songs are placed among works without Opus number. Yet they have one, Op. 74; and, besides, they ought to be spoken of as "Seventeen Polish Songs." The writer of the short article "Saxophone," says: "We are told that it is employed by Berlioz in his opera 'Les Troyens.' This last work remaining in MS., it is not easy to get precise information on this point." Seeing that the autograph score of the work is in the library of the Paris Conservatoire, it would surely not have been difficult to obtain precise information. We have seen the score, and the Saxophone is employed. It was probably used for the first time in an orchestra by L. Kastner in his Biblical opera, "Le Dernier Roi de Juda." There is a short but useful notice of Edouard Lalo, the French musician whose name figures from time to time on our concert programmes, and who has recently increased his reputation by his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," produced last year at Paris. Two works for violin and orchestra are mentioned—a Concerto in F produced at Paris in 1874, and a Symphonie Espagnole brought out there in the following year. The introduction of the latter work into England is mentioned; it was played by Sarasate at the Crystal Palace in 1878. But why was it not also said that the same artist performed the earlier work at a Philharmonic Concert in May, 1874, on the occasion of his first appearance in England? The difficulty of keeping a Dictionary up to date is seen by the "Final Additions," which contain recent deaths, new works, &c. Some corrections connected with the "Lind" article in the Appendix are also to be found in these "Final Additions." In spite of imperfections, the Appendix is welcome, and so will be the promised "copious index" which is announced.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE London Military Band gave a concert at Princes's Hall on Monday afternoon. Most of the performers are instrumentalists of known ability, and have been soloists in the Guards' and other bands. Some, indeed, are connected with the Crystal Palace and Richter concerts. Under the direction of Mr. John Hill (King's Scholar, Royal Academy of Music) a programme of music of different kinds was given. The performance of Rossini's "William Tell" Overture was certainly too loud for the room; but the playing, with regard to execution and ensemble, was excellent. In the "Incidental Music to Henry VIII.," by Sullivan, Mr. B. Pierpoint sang "King Henry's Song."

It is with great pleasure that we notice a concert given by the St. Paul's School Musical Society at the school, on the evening of Wednesday. The boys have good voices, and Master C. G. Webster deserves praise for his rendering of the soprano part in Mendelssohn's duet, "Greeting." There was some good solo violin and cello playing. A portion of Beethoven's Serenade Trio for strings was capably performed by Herr Pollitzer and two clever pupils. The society was established in 1860. There was, however, a break, and the concerts were revived in 1884. Mr. E. O. Marchant is the conductor. At present there is a small choir, and an orchestra of strings, all pupils. With more voices and a full band they ought one day to render a good account of themselves. The programme was well selected; and we were glad to find a notice printed, that "no encores will be allowed."

LITERATURE.

Letters and Literary Remains of Edward Fitzgerald. Edited by William Aldis Wright. In 3 vols. (Macmillan.)

"I AM an idle fellow of a very lady-like turn of sentiment," wrote Fitzgerald when twenty-five years old, "and my friendships are more like loves, I think." His feeling towards his native Suffolk was the earliest of these friendships, and it lasted for life. The dulness of the landscape did not weary him. He could always find some nook where spring brought primroses and where the nightingale sang; and for enlargement of his spirit there was not far off the sea, the yellow-gray plain of water, sometimes sullen and sometimes fierce, but seeming a truer companion to the dun shore than if it were more joyous and pure. Fitzgerald's constancy in his friendships with man and place was the constancy of one who is shy and unadventurous. "The world is wide to make room for wandering"—so sang Goethe. But what if a man finds the world much too wide, and has no ambition to annex the rest of the globe to his corner of the parish? Like his own Omar, with "a loaf of bread beneath the bough" and "a book of verse," Fitzgerald needed few resources for his happiness; certainly none of the resources of vulgar luxury, but these few—friends, books, a song by Mozart, a chorus of Handel's, a picture by Constable, the grass and flowers of spring, the river with a boat on it, the sight and sound of ocean—were constantly beloved by him. His only wanderings were in the world of books; and there, too, he had his lifelong friendships, and would gladly return home from his gaddings abroad, home even from Omar and Jami to Scott's novels, Shakspeare, Sophocles, Boccaccio, and his dear and noble Don Quixote.

The "ultra modest man," as Carlyle calls him, living "his innocent far niente life" was in his own estimate not a man of genius, but a man of taste—taste, which he called the feminine of genius. As an author he needed to lean on some more originaive mind, and became independent in verse only when he depended on another. But as in his life he had strength to take his own way, which was not the way of the world, so in literature he impresses his individuality on what he accepts from greater men than himself. Fitzgerald, though shy and retired, was no weakling, and with him taste was no mere capacity for enjoying the graces and refinements of letters. He loved with a constant and ardent affection what is great, noble, and heroic. His friendships with living men were not seldom friendships with the strong—and together with Thackeray, Tennyson, Spedding, Carlyle, we must reckon among the strong his dear lugger captain "who looks," he says, "in his cottage like King Alfred in the Story." So, too, in books, in music, in painting, in religion, he was especially attracted by all that is simple, lofty, and heroic.

"A dozen lines of Aeschylus," he writes, "have a more Almighty power on me than all Sophocles' plays; though I would perhaps rather save Sophocles, as the consummation of Greek art, than Aeschylus's twelve lines, if it came to a choice which must be lost. Besides, these Aeschyluses trouble us with their grandeur and gloom; but Sophocles is always soothing, complete, and satisfactory."

And of Handel:

"I hear little music but what I make myself, or help to make with my Parson's son and daughter. We, with not a voice among us, go through Handel's Coronation Anthems! Laughable as it may seem; yet it is not quite so; the things are so well defined, simple, and grand, that the faintest outline of them tells; my admiration of the old Giant grows and grows: his is the Music for a Great, Active, People."

And he could perceive power none the less in its investiture of grace and beauty:

"People cannot believe that Mozart is powerful, because he is so Beautiful: in the same way as it requires a very practised eye (more than I possess) to recognise the consummate power predominating in the tranquil Beauty of Greek Sculpture."

Such a feeling for what is great in literature and art prepared Fitzgerald for what is essentially a new treatment of Eastern poetry in English verse. He thought that the bulb and peri business had been somewhat overdone. He had no wish to trick out impoverished ideas with cheap prettinesses. He looked for something great in the Eastern poetry of the rosebuds and the wine-cup, and he found this in its sadness as the ground of mirth and in its wide vacuity of faith.

"One Moment in Annihilation's Waste,
One Moment, of the Well of Life to taste—
The Stars are setting and the Caravan Starts for the Dawn of Nothing—Oh, make haste!"

When in Bedfordshire in the early summer of 1857 Fitzgerald, as he tells his friend Prof. Cowell, put away almost all books except Omar Khayyám, "which," he says, "I could not help looking over in a paddock covered with buttercups and brushed by a delicious breeze, while a dainty racing filly of W. Browne's came startling up to wonder and snuff about me." The fresh young life of England side by side with the sad-mirthful verses of old Omar. "Poor Fellow!" he exclaims, "I think of him and Oliver Basselin, and Anacreon; lighter shadows among the shades, perhaps, over which Lucretius presides so grimly." If Omar loves the blowing blossoms and the garden by the water, he is also the astronomer-poet, whose eye has followed the movements of the planets in the star-sown vault; who measures the shortness of man's life by the great years of heaven, and the pettiness of his destiny by the vast motions of the universe, and who, knowing that all our hopes and doubts and fears and ambitions must soon be covered over with the narrow words Hic jacet, yet would fain strew some light rose-leaves upon the tomb. Fitzgerald was impatient of the theory which would transform Omar from a scientific and poetical child of the tribe of Epicurus into a Súfi and a saint; and assuredly the deep background of sadness which dignifies the poem must disappear if we interpret its wine-cup and its roses in a mystical sense.

Fitzgerald's letters have the charm of many felicities of description, reminiscence, confession, criticism, rising naturally out of pages which have the rare charm of ease. He touches the keys gently and soothingly, and glides into passages of unlaboured beauty. What, for example, can be more delightful than this record of the pleasant idleness of a day in spring?

"Here is a glorious sunshiny day! all the morning I read about Nero in Tacitus, lying at full length on a bench in the garden: a nightingale singing, and some red anemones eyeing the sun manfully not far off. A funny mixture all this: Nero and the delicacy of Spring: all very human however. Then at half-past one luncheon Cambridge cream-cheese: then a ride over hill and dale: then spudding up some weeds from the grass; and then coming in, I sit down to write to you, my sister winding red worsted from the back of a chair, and the most delightful little girl in the world chattering incessantly. So runs the world away. You think I live in Epicurean ease; but this happens to be a jolly day: one isn't always well, or tolerably good, the weather is not always clear, nor nightingales singing, nor Tacitus full of pleasant atrocity. But such as life is, I believe I have got hold of a good end of it."

The Epicurean in Fitzgerald had a Stoic companion, who could honestly say that he cared not a straw for wealth, rank, respectability, although he might not be so complete a follower of Epictetus or Seneca as not to resent the toothache. We have a humorous picture of this Stoic as he reads Seneca one February in "a hut with walls as thin as a sixpence; windows that don't shut; a clay soil safe beneath my feet; a thatch perforated by lascivious sparrows over my head." Poor household sparrows, that had not learnt yet the principles of stoical philosophy! "Here," he says, "I sit, read, smoke, and become very wise, and am already quite beyond earthly things." And here as he sat he wondered whether old Seneca was indeed such a humbug as people say, and none the less enjoyed the questionable philosopher's unquestionably fine writing. "Think," he adds in conclusion, "of the roccocoity of a gentleman studying Seneca in the middle of February, 1844, in a remarkably damp cottage."

But he found a better counterpoise to any innocent Epicurean tendencies in the breadth and strength of his imagination. In contrast with the description of rural springtime, the glowing anemones, cream-cheeses, and Tacitus, with his pleasant atrocity, here is a sketch of London about sunset as seen from Carlyle's little watch-tower:

"I smoked a pipe with Carlyle yesterday. We ascended from his dining-room carrying pipes and tobacco up through two stories of his house, and got into a little dressing-room near the roof: there we sat down: the window was open and looked out on nursery gardens, their almond trees in blossom, and beyond, bare walls of houses, and over these, roofs and chimneys, and roofs and chimneys, and here and there a steeple, and whole London crowned with darkness gathering behind like the illimitable resources of a dream. I tried to persuade him to leave the accursed den, and he wished—but—perhaps he didn't wish on the whole."

The drop from the rhetorical and imaginative in the last sentence is characteristic of the writer; a shy apology for words which might seem too great for the occasion, or which might, perhaps, be thought to have in them something of the bastard magnificence of a picture by Martin. But in this letter, whether it was the momentum given to his mind by Carlyle's companionship, or by the enormous life of London, he cannot quell the imaginative mood; and after running over all the quiet goings-on of a spring day in the country, where every little thing is noted, and letting his fancy stray abroad to the German Ocean in a sudden shower, dimpling with innumerable pin points, he exclaims:

"Oh this wonderful, wonderful world, and we who stand in the middle of it are all in a maze, except poor Matthews, of Bedford, who fixes his eyes upon a wooden Cross and has no mis-giving whatsoever. When I was in his chapel on Good Friday, he called, at the end of his grand sermon, on some of the people to say merely this, that they believed Christ had redeemed them: and first one got up and in sobs declared she believed it: and then another, and then another—I was quite upset:—all poor people: how much richer than all who fill the London churches. Theirs is the kingdom of heaven!"

And then, after this unusual heat, follows the apologetic, the cooling touch: "This is a sad farrago. Farewell."

Fitzgerald's literary judgments, if sometimes touched with a pleasant wilfulness, are always valuable. He was so endlessly happy with certain great writers that he did not need nor care to make acquaintance with all his contemporaries; and in London he confesses that he found himself not a little bothered by all the clever reasons which all the clever people could give for going wrong. The curse of nearly all modern literature, he says, is strain, and to cure a writer of this vice, he would prescribe a course of Don Quixote and the Decameron; but, he adds, of course the man must be a man of genius to take his ease, and even of men of genius there are those who do not take things easy, like Dante and Milton and Wordsworth: "Well, they dwell apart in the empyrean; but for Human Delight, Shakspeare, Cervantes, Boccaccio, and Scott." Spenser lay outside the range of Fitzgerald's sympathies; Shelley he found too abstract and aerial; Goethe he never really mastered. What is more surprising, he failed in an attempt upon Gil Blas, though not insensible to its grace and humour. It was, he says, too thin a wine for him, all sparkling with little adventures, but "no colour, no breadth like my dear Don, whom I shall resort to forthwith."

I will bring together a few of Fitzgerald's literary dicta for my readers to affirm or gain-say. We all know Matthew Arnold's essay on Gray with its often recurring text—He never spoke out. Fitzgerald's opinion is the more common, and I think the sounder one, that Gray had no affluence of thought or emotion demanding expression:

"By the most exquisite taste, and indefatigable lubrication, he made of his own few thoughts, and many of other men's, a something which we all love to keep ever about us. I do not think his scarcity of work was from design; he had but a little to say, I believe, and took his time to say it."

One who certainly spoke out was Macaulay, and thus it is that Fitzgerald comments on his Life:

"Macaulay's Memoirs were less interesting to me [than Ticknor's]; though I quite believe in him as a brave, honest, affectionate man, as well (of course) as a very powerful one. It is wonderful how he, Hallam, and Mackintosh could roar and bawl at one another over such questions as which is the greatest poet? which is the greatest work of that greatest poet? &c., like boys at some debating society."

The letters of Keats to Fanny Brawne are described by Matthew Arnold in a most interesting essay as underbred and ignoble—the letters of a sensuous young surgeon's apprentice, such as one might expect to hear read out in the Divorce Court. Fitzgerald had a high conception of the English gentleman; and, writing to Thackeray, he declared that to depict the true English gentleman is as great a work as to depict a Saint John. But he had an intelligent sympathy with the play of Keats's youthful passion:

"I hope I should have revolted from the book [Keats's Letters] had anything in it detracted from the man; but all seemed to me in his favour, and, therefore, I did not feel I did wrong in having the secret of that heart opened to me."

The following remark on Newman's Apologia confirms a feeling that has been long my own:

"Read Newman's Apologia pro Vita Sua, . . . deeply interesting, pathetic, eloquent, and, I think, sincere—sincere in not being conscious of all the steps he took in reaching his present place."

The conscious logic of the Apologia is surely wholly inadequate to account for the conclusion; but tides of a deeper logic, unconscious, emotional, were bearing the writer to the haven of his rest. In a passage on Jeremy Taylor, which occurs in one of Fitzgerald's early letters, he speaks somewhat scornfully of the volumes of selections from Taylor, which cloy one with the flowery metaphorical morsels, and with penetrating criticism he discovers the deeper sources of the great preacher's power:

"What a man he is! He has such knowledge of the nature of man, and such powers of expressing its properties, that I sometimes feel as if he had some exact counterpart of my own individual character under his eye, when he lays open the depths of the heart, or traces some sin to its root. The eye of his portrait expresses this keen intuition; and I think I should less like to have stood with a lie on my tongue before him than before any I know of."

Take last the following on the dangers which beset the sonnet writer:

"I certainly don't like sonnets, as you know; we have been spoiled for them by Daddy Wordsworth, — & Co. Moxon must write them too, forsooth. What do they seem fit for but to serve as little shapes in which a man may mould very mechanically any single thought which comes into his head, which thought is not lyrical enough in itself to exhale in a more lyrical measure? The difficulty of the sonnet-metre in English is a good excuse for the dull didactic thoughts which naturally incline towards it; fellows know there is no danger in decanting their muddy stuff ever so slowly; they are neither prose nor poetry. I have rather a wish to tie old Wordsworth's volume about his neck, and pitch him into one of the deepest holes of his dear Duddon."

We of the Wordsworthian clan (for I am ready to profess myself a Wordsworthian), are not credited with a superabundance of humour; but I trust that no member of the tribe will feel it necessary to take "good Fitz" to task for this homicidal confession. Fitzgerald regarded Wordsworth with reverence, though he was not insensible to the foibles of his verse. And in spite of this desperate expression of his desire to assassinate an elderly poet, and notwithstanding his own announcement elsewhere that he was "going to be a great bear," we cannot read these letters without coming to have a true affection for Fitzgerald as a kindly and generous spirit.

"The children here," he writes, "are most delightful; the best company in all the world, to my mind. If you could see the little girl dance the polka with her sisters! Not set up like an Infant Terpsichore, but seriously inclined, with perfect steps in perfect time."

Such a passage wins our hearts for the writer. And this again in the wintry cold.

"If we could but feed our poor! It is now the 8th of December; it has blown a most desperate east wind, all razors; a wind like one of those knives one sees at shops in London, with 365 blades all drawn and pointed; the wheat is all sown; the fallows cannot be ploughed. What are all the poor folks to do during the winter?"

And this word of wisdom and of hope in a letter to Carlyle:

"I was very glad of your letter; especially as regards that part in it about the Derbyshire villages. In many other parts of England (not to mention my own Suffolk) you would find the same substantial goodness among the people resulting (as you say) from the funded virtues of many good humble men gone by."

We all owe a debt of gratitude to the editor of these volumes, who has done his work with characteristic thoroughness and accuracy, while scarcely ever allowing himself to appear and receive the thanks which we have ready for him.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

The British Empire. By Dr. Geffcken. Translated from the German, with the Sanction and Co-operation of the Author, by S. J. Macmullan. (Sampson Low.)

DR. GEFFCKEN has, in the five essays which make up this volume, compiled a good deal of generally well-known information concerning British affairs. His own views of England are such as are current in a portion of the German press. He has no doubt that Disraeli and Gladstone deserve to be regarded as political charlatans; but while the former sought his own advantage by the enlargement and the glory of the empire, the Liberal leader, according to Dr. Geffcken, follows his own interests with perfect indifference to the decadence of the empire. He does not mince the matter:

"Both their careers show that their aims were, above all, personal. There is, however, a feature in Disraeli's career which does him great honour: he always showed a strong feeling for England's position in foreign politics, and he never, when in opposition, tried to embarrass the action of the Government. I am unable to discover such a patriotism in Mr. Gladstone's career, but I find him quite as selfish and ambitious."

The most important essay is entitled "The British Empire." The author admires its bulk, which he learned apparently at the Colonial Exhibition, and he labours in the way common with a certain section of continental politicians to prove that it is all in great peril. We are vulnerable, says Dr. Geffcken, especially in India. But the dangers are in reality the consequences of a false policy, above all of the Gladstonian policy, which has contributed so much towards shattering England's prestige abroad. Then we are told that "prestige is to England's power what credit is to a merchant." Our empire, in the opinion of this German publicist, was built up by an almost uninterrupted series of wars and conquests. It exists, however, under changed conditions. Germany has proved to England that the time when she could assume that she had a claim to every unoccupied spot beyond the sea is at an end. Nor has our navy been able to hold its position. That of France comes very near to it. Our fighting force by land has actually declined, and now, in this respect, England must be accounted only a second-rate power. If, therefore, a French writer in former years called England "a polype with a dwarf body and gigantic tentacles clutching the globe," it must now be said that the elasticity of those tentacles is decidedly not what it was; while, on the other hand, all over the world English interests are at stake, and no great continental or trans-oceanic struggle leaves England untouched. Together with these opinions, Dr. Geffcken holds that our material resources were never so great; that without difficulty we could raise hundreds of millions for war purposes. His judgments are somewhat abrupt. We have, it seems, been "guilty of gross negligence" in failing to construct the Tigris railway; and as for Mr. Gladstone, who has Dr. Geffcken's measureless contempt—he ran away from Russia and left Penjdeh in Russian hands. Dr. Geffcken is quite ready to advise Lord Salisbury as to his relations with Lord Hartington. By a more energetic foreign policy he is sure the Prime Minister would not lose the support of the Liberal Unionists, but would be very much strengthened in his position. When this German writer deals with Prince Albert we are not surprised to learn that "in questions affecting specially British interests the Prince judged with more acuteness than the leading English statesmen," or that the distinguished Prince left the reputation of an "imperial statesman whom England and Germany will for ever proudly call their own." We have now seen enough of Dr. Geffcken to know that he would delight in the career of Palmerston. There he finds his ideal; and though he fairly admits that Palmerston "put his stamp on no great measure" of reform at home, he firmly believes that "with his death England began to decline," and that "the whole significance of his life and labours is rightly measured only when he is compared with the Epigoni who have entered upon the inheritance which he left behind." Of Disraeli he justly remarks that "he can hardly be called a great statesman." He, too, was but "one of the Epigoni." "His name is connected with no measure which constituted a new departure in English statesmanship." But it is for Gladstone that Dr. Geffcken reserves in his last pages all his most offensive epithets. He delights to quote the saying attributed to Bismarck, that he would have shot himself long ago had he brought so much mischief on his country as Gladstone has on his; and of Palmerston, that "this man will ruin his country." He sees in Mr. Gladstone "gifts of the first order," devoted to the most unpatriotic ends, and predicts that his last days

"will not reverse these severe judgments. The sun of his life will not set in calm splendour now that he has descended to become the associate of Irish conspirators, and employs all his remaining strength in inflaming the worst passions of mankind."

In his final essay upon the House of Lords, Dr. Geffcken shows himself not thoroughly acquainted with the facts of the case. His rejoicing that the landed estates of the peers are for the greater part unencumbered with debt, is inconsistent with the well-known estimate of charges amounting to £400,000,000 upon their estates; and, now-a-days, it is not true that "every manufacturer and merchant who has made a fortune strives to establish for himself a country seat." There are scores of such persons in London who have no ambition to become great landed proprietors.

ARTHUR ARNOLD.

"STATESMEN SERIES."—The Marquess of Wellesley. By Col. G. B. Malleon. (W. H. Allen.)

THIS little book has all the qualities of Col. Malleon's best work—the patriot spirit, and the sound, practical acquaintance with the past and present of the British power in India. Wellesley was the chief founder of that power; for, great as were Clive and Warren Hastings, indispensable as were their labours, it was Wellesley's clear eye and firm hand that made this nation's representatives the paramount lords of the vast and varied peninsula.

Lord Mornington—as he then was—went out as Governor-General in the end of 1797, having served his apprenticeship as member of the House of Commons, and been a general supporter of Pitt in opposing the revolutionary propaganda of the new French Republic. His first cares, on reaching his post, were due to the same cause, for the Directory had extended its anti-monarchical efforts to India, and "Citizen Tippoo" was in active correspondence with Mauritius in the hope of using French animosity against the enemies of his house. But Tippoo was not what his father had been. The curse of birth-in-purple was upon him; and where Haidar Ali had been hardy, industrious, and rapid, his son was luxurious and lazy. The result is well known. Led by a resolute and experienced general, the British army stormed Seringapatam, Tippoo dying a soldier's death in the unavailing defence. The other Southern powers were tamed and made subordinate; and in 1802 the Governor-General prepared for the last struggle. Sindhia was master of the once mighty Mughal empire, and his army was commanded by a Frenchman. The pertinacious ruler of Bengal picked a quarrel with Sindhia, the expected alliances failed them, the French general and his European officers surrendered, and the great armies were beaten in hard-fought but complete victories, which Col. Malleon has already described in his Decisive Battles of India. The blind old emperor, released from Mahratta durance, became a British pensioner; and the country entered upon a condition which was not greatly altered for over fifty years. Many provinces continued to be acquired—by hook or by crook, and by crook for choice—but the process was only a process of growth. The Wellesley system subsisted down to 1858.

This is a substantial achievement; and it may be admitted that it was not sufficiently appreciated at the time. The mercantile instincts of the East India Company were alarmed at the greatness thrust upon it by its brilliant servant. But he received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament and a step in the Irish peerage from the Crown—rewards with which "he had to be content," if, indeed, content be the proper epithet, for he called the Irish marquessate "a double-gilt potato." On his return home, Wellesley played for some years an active part in English politics, sitting in the House of Lords as Baron Wellesley—a peerage of the United Kingdom conferred upon him in 1797, though nowhere recorded by our author. In 1809 he was made Foreign Secretary under the premiership of Perceval, and was able to give vigorous help to his brother then entering upon his arduous struggle with Bonaparte's marshals in the Peninsula. But his downward career was beginning. In 1810 he failed to support actively the cabinet of which he was a member on the question of the Regency. He could not conceal his personal ambition, fostered by a sense of his own powers and a contempt for those of his chief. He absented himself from the meetings of the cabinet, and administered his own department as autocratically as if he were still governor-general. In January 1812 he found, or fancied, that he could serve no longer in an even nominal subordination to Perceval. After the melancholy death of the latter, Wellesley attempted to form a ministry with Grey, Grenville, and Canning; but the attempt failed from a variety of personal difficulties, and the well-intentioned Liverpool became Prime Minister.

For the next nine years Wellesley continued to be out of office, and carried out generally a mildly Liberal opposition to the government, supporting the cause of Catholic emancipation and the diminution of fiscal burdens and the repeal of the duty on the importation of food. In 1822 the Grenville party came into office, and Wellesley was sent as Lord-Lieutenant to Ireland. Restored to vice-regal authority the ardent spirit seemed to emerge from eclipse. For five troubled years he continued to impress his virile and cultivated intelligence on the affairs of the distressful island. In the end of 1827 he once more became what Lord Melbourne called "a superseded satrap."

On returning to England he made one last bid for the premiership; but was supplanted by his brother. Col. Malleon believes that he felt this disappointment most keenly; and the belief is confirmed by a fact within the knowledge of the present reviewer. In a paper written by a nephew of Lord Harris, it is stated that the writer saw a letter in which Wellesley spoke of the duke as "a hero of my own making"; so much can the parallax of the brightest star affect its magnitude according to the point from which it is observed. In 1829, the emancipation of the Catholics was enacted; and in 1833 Wellesley became a second time viceroy of Ireland. He, however, held the office for barely two years; and then went once more into opposition, this time as a declared Tory. He lived seven years longer, writing and publishing elegant Latin verses, and receiving a tardy acknowledgment of his Indian services from the Court of Directors. He died in 1842 at the age of eighty-two.

In estimating the story set before us by the author it would be interesting to discover both the reasons of Wellesley's success and the causes of his failure. That the Percevals and Liverpools should gain their ends and rule the British Empire, while a great diplomatist and organiser should be condemned to subordinate positions, interspersed in long periods of enforced retirement, may seem inexplicable. Nevertheless, there are a few facts which throw light on the case, and their consideration may not be without profit for aspirants to public life.

The faults of Wellesley's character count for a good deal. There is evidence in all that we know about him that he was vain, arbitrary, and ambitious. Such a man is constantly giving offence and making enemies. He insisted on "unqualified support"—a thing which, as one of his friends pointed out to him, one would hesitate to promise to anyone, even one's king. Then, again, the very qualities by which Wellesley succeeded in India were fatal to his success in English public life. In India a ruler works, so to speak, in a vacuum. He meets with but little resistance, and that little of a kind that he can usually overcome. Indeed, in this fact we have probably the explanation of the general failure of Anglo-Indians in home politics.

Take him for all in all, however, Wellesley was a very great man; and Col. Malleon is to be thanked for giving us a new study of his public life which is brief without being obscure.

H. G. KEENE.

The Poems of Emma Lazarus. In 2 vols. With Memoir. (Boston, U.S.: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

It is not to admirers in the United States only that this edition of the poetical writings of the late Miss Emma Lazarus will be welcome. Here, no doubt, the sweetest of the young voices of Israel is better known by her excellent renderings from Heine, and her still more admirable translations from the old Spanish singers of her own race, than by her powerful dramatic compositions or her sonnets and lyrics. Many, no doubt, have read her Goethean romance, Alida. And, to judge from that work, and her contributions to magazines, it is a pity that a supplementary selection of Miss Lazarus's prose was not added to this memorial edition; and, in particular, it is to be regretted that her unfinished, yet far advanced, critical study of the genius of Rembrandt is not included.

There is, in this second volume, a collection of short prose poems, entitled "By the Waters of Babylon," in one of which occurs a verse pregnant with significance—"Daylong I brooded upon the Passion of Israel." For, in truth, it is the very passion of Israel that is the source of all that is best in Miss Lazarus's work. By it she was thrilled and inspired. In a free country, and enfranchised from the formalism of Judaism, what nobler ethnical heritage could a poet have? It is conceivable that the time may come when to be born a Jew will be a crowning distinction; even now the Semitic poet need never suffer the humiliations and the vicarious agonies which befel the greatest of modern singers. And surely no passion of patriotism or tribal hope elsewhere can surpass that of the prophets and poets among those who look for a greater Rosh-Hashanah than that of annual recurrence, who believe in the unification of the racially most potent people of whom we have record. How admirably Miss Lazarus expresses the distinctive quality of her people when she writes:

"Every student of the Hebrew language is aware that we have in the conjugation of our verbs a mood known as the intensive voice, which, by means of an almost imperceptible modification of vowel-points, intensifies the meaning of the primitive root. A similar significance seems to attach to the Jews themselves in connexion with the people among whom they dwell. They are the intensive form of any nationality whose language and customs they adopt. . . . Influenced by the same causes, they represent the same results; but the deeper lights and shadows of their Oriental temperament throw their failings, as well as their virtues, into more prominent relief."

Excellent as is Miss Lazarus's early poetry, and certainly well worthy of honour in a time when acknowledgment of high worth is bestowed with a largess too liberal to be discriminate, her best work must be sought in those poems for the most part written after her sudden "call to arms," at the time of the Russian and German crusade against Israel, which commenced ten years ago. Her two dramas—"Spagnoletto," and "The Dance to Death"—are respectively characteristic of Emma Lazarus, the American poet, and Emma Lazarus, the passionate Semite. In the former—a painfully sombre tragedy, as lurid and as unrelieved in its horror as the "Cenci" itself—there is a lack of that restrained abandon, if the seeming paradox be permissible, which permeates all great art. She wrote it probably because the story of the painter Ribera fascinated her as a dramatic artist; she wrote it with the magic upon her of the "Cenci," of "Ruy Blas," of whatever, in modern letters, is almost barbaric in violent intensity; but she did not write it with the more or less conscious knowledge that every act, every scene, every line, palpitated and breathed and moved towards one inevitable goal—a goal worthy of that palpitation, that aspiration, that impassioned onward movement. Thus must she, thus did she write "The Dance to Death," that remarkable tragedy which is so far more impressive in its reserve than "Spagnoletto" in its vehemence, which is so vivid, so picturesque, at times so grandiose, that we are uplifted to a rare atmosphere; and which is yet so intensely idiosyncratic that none but one inspired by that Judenschmerz, which has been the fount of so much splendid artistic achievement, could have written it. Historical students may demur to Miss Lazarus's originality in this tragedy, on account of her indebtedness to Reinhard's "Der Tanz zum Tode; ein Nachtstück aus dem vierzehnten Jahrhundert"—a narrative compiled from authentic documents discovered by Prof. Franz Delitzsch; but, of course, the fact of the poet having been in this sense forestalled is of no more significance than the discovery of Shakspeare's indebtedness to the Italian chronicler of the love episode in the feud-history of the Montagues and Capulets. Of singular power and charm is the description, near the close of the tragedy, of the procession of the doomed Jews of Nordhausen to their place of death, and of their martyrdom. Over the piled fagots a floor is laid, whereon the Israelites may

"dance and sing
Fearless of death, until the flames engulf—
Even as David danced before the Lord,
As Miriam danced and sung beside the sea."

Through the narrative break ever and again sharp, ominous cries, vaguely interblent, urgent, terrible: "Woe unto us who perish"—"Amen! amen! amen! We dance to death!" With the belt-fringed, silken-bound scrolls of the law, the perpetual lamp, and the silver vessels of the sanctuary, and the seven-branched candlestick, the procession marches deathward amid savage insult and triumph. Young and old, hale and infirm, young mothers with their babes, and lovers walking hand in hand, all scarfed and gemmed, and richly attired, pass on, with over and around them the screaming "Burn! burn!" of the citizens. But high above the crimson blaze wherein dance in a strange ecstasy the condemned, wherein flash the falling jewels, and wave veils and fiery raiment, rises the death-song of the Jewish youths, "Let us rejoice!" and the semichoric chant of the daughters of Israel:

"Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Zion, Within thy portals, O Jerusalem!"

No one who cares for Miss Lazarus's poetry—no one, rather, who has heed for what is really noteworthy in contemporary verse—will care to be without the first volume, which contains, in addition to an interesting memoir, her non-Jewish narrative and lyrical poems, and "Spagnoletto"; but lovers of poetry that belongs to a rarer and loftier atmosphere will do well not to deny themselves the second volume. Here, besides the "Dance to Death" and "By the Waters of Babylon," are several short Jewish poems of exceptional power and beauty, including the stirring "Banner of the Jew" and the "Feast of Lights," wherein "the Maccabean spirit leaps new-born." Here, also, are the beautiful and valuable translations from the sweet singers of old—Judah Ben Ha-Levi, Gabirol, and Moses Ben Esra; a notable and successful enlargement upon Heine's "Donna Clara"; several excellent sonnets from Petrarch; and distinctly able versions of Alfred de Musset's "October Night" and

"Night in May." It is regrettable, however, that a selection of the finest of her Heine translations had not been substituted for those, on the whole of less worth, from the French and Italian. It should be added that the sympathetic memoir, which has already appeared in an American magazine, is preceded by an excellent likeness of Miss Lazarus—as she was latterly, however, rather than at the time of her visit to London some years ago.

WILLIAM SHARP.

Norway Pilot. Part I. From the Naze to Christiania, thence to the Kattgat. Second Edition. Compiled by Lieut. G. T. Temple, R.N. (Printed for the Admiralty.)

THE Norway Pilot, Part I., is an ably compiled body of sailing directions for a coast which is much frequented by English yachts and merchant vessels, and occasionally visited by the channel and training squadrons of our navy. The volume is compiled from Norwegian sources; but, as the officer to whom the work has been entrusted is well acquainted both with the Norwegian language and with coasts of which he is the official guide, his special knowledge has enabled him to make several additions which give completeness and special value to the present edition. Thus a glossary of words and rules for pronunciation enable the navigator to converse with Norwegian pilots; and an introduction supplies information respecting the physical geography, statistics, and climate of Norway, and the hydrography of the North Sea.

Although there are generally deep-water channels between the numerous islands along the coast, yet the navigation is difficult, requiring great caution and promptitude; for these outlying islands and rocks are numberless, and the passages between them are very intricate, while in the winter the landmarks are often hidden by accumulations of snow. The importance of accurate and clear sailing directions and charts is, therefore, exceptionally great.

The coast described in Norway Pilot, No. 1, extends from the bluff headland of the Naze, the southern extreme of the mainland of Norway, to the old Castle of Marstrand in Sweden, including Christiansand and Christiania, the capital of the kingdom. The portion of the Swedish coast included in the volume, from the Koster Islands to Marstrand, is known as the Bohuslän, the home of the Vikings, and one of the cradles of the early northern sagas. Here are Strömstad, the northernmost Swedish town on this coast; Lysekil, a summer resort; and Marstrand, a much frequented watering-place, and a locality of great interest in Swedish history. The famous old castle of Marstrand, with its lofty round tower and batteries now abandoned, forms a conspicuous landmark. The southern channel leading to the anchorage at Marstrand is so narrow that the small passenger steamers which ply between the little sea-bathing town and Gothenburg have only about 2 feet to spare on either side in passing through it. This fact will give a good idea of the intricacy of the navigation, and of the importance of accurate and detailed sailing directions.

It is, therefore, a matter for congratulation that the services should have been available of so competent and accomplished an expert as Lieut. George Temple, whose local and linguistic knowledge enable him to collate all existing Norwegian publications bearing on the subject, as well as to contribute additional information from his own personal observations and experience.

Suspicion. By Christian Lys. (Ward & Downey.)

MR. GRANT ALLEN's latest work—The Tents of Shem—having run its course through the pages of an illustrated periodical, now appears in three-volume form. It is marked by the same manly and genial style of writing that has won for this author his reputation, and will prove no unworthy addition to his efforts in fiction. Prominent among the characters is Iris Knyvett, student of Girton, and "Third Classic" in the Cambridge Classical Tripos of her year. Though the author confesses to a prejudice against the "higher education of women," he has drawn the present specimen of a learned lady in anything but an unfriendly spirit; indeed, his treatment of the subject suggests a desire on his part to prove that the acquisition of Latin and Greek does not prevent a girl from being essentially a woman at heart after all. At the same time he has painted for us, with a still more loving hand, Miriem, a child of the desert by training and maternal descent, but on her father's side English, who eventually proves to be the cousin and co-heiress of the "Third Classic." There is plenty of spontaneous and well-sustained humour throughout; and, in this particular alone, Thomas Whitmarsh, Esquire, Q.C.—a shining light in his profession, but a man of childish simplicity in all matters not connected with the Probate and Divorce Court—is a host in himself. But it is in the descriptive parts that the author is, perhaps, seen to best advantage. Before the end of the first volume the action is entirely transferred to African soil, and the tale becomes intimately connected with the French occupation of Algiers. The remnants of Moorish magnificence that still lend grandeur to the capital city, the wild scenery of the Kabyle mountains of the interior, and the still wilder life of the Moalem nomads who dwell there, furnish effective material for Mr. Grant Allen's pen; and the narrative of the rising of the conquered tribes against their invaders should be read with special interest by English people, to whom the details will recall so many reminiscences of our own struggles with a similar people in the Soudan. The subtlety and stealthiness of native attack, the ferocity that spares nothing when once the Jihad or Holy War is proclaimed, and the utter collapse of a savage host when matched against the disciplined forces of civilisation, are all described here with a liveliness and effect that leave nothing to be desired.

From the second title which Mr. Dering has given to his book, and from some passages occurring in the first volume, it would appear that the author originally set out with the intention of proving that love is a sort of baleful influence, inimical to order and progress, and responsible for nearly all the miseries and misfortunes of mankind. If such was the case, we can only remark that this self-constituted champion of celibacy and humdrum has but poorly fulfilled his mission. In its stead he has given us a very charming novel; and as the last volume concludes with the usual marriages, either completed or prospective, he appears, so far from cursing his enemy, to have ended by blessing him altogether. The scene of the story is laid in the country town of Heathercombe, rejoicing in any number of religious denominations; and it is mainly to this aspect of the social life of the place that we are introduced. Mr. Dering is not only a keen observer of persons, but has a cultured and easy flow of language; and he may be congratulated on having made a very creditable first attempt in fiction. The only part of his book which—as conveying a rather unworthy suggestion of pique—might with advantage have been omitted is the dedication of it to Thomas Lowestoft, Esquire, "in recognition," to use the author's words, "of his unwearied attempts to discourage me in my literary career, and to dissuade me, in particular, from publishing the present work."

Of The Rambler Papers—a novel dealing mainly with military life—there is not much to be said, except that it is agreeably written, and may be taken as a tolerably faithful representation of the society it depicts. The heroine—a retired general's daughter, and a somewhat hoydenish young person—contrives to earn for herself a considerable amount of dislike among the ladies of a garrison town, and ultimately marries the least popular, though by no means the least worthy, officer of the regiment quartered there.

It is, perhaps, fortunate for Driven before the Storm that its interest does not depend upon originality of conception as regards the plot. The tales which centre upon the hero or heroine becoming suspected of a murder, the mystery about which is only cleared up by the dying confession of a repentant wretch in the last chapter, may be counted by hundreds, while the sprained ankle which evokes the first sentiments of tenderness towards Angelina on the part of Edwin has long ago passed into the category of stale devices. However, the rustiest peg may sometimes serve to support an abundance of beautiful clothing; and if Miss Forde's outlines err, as they undoubtedly do, on the side of conventionality, it must be admitted that her filling-in shows capacity of an almost first-rate kind. Her book has sharply marked characters, both men and women being pour-trayed with pretty equal fairness and fidelity—a characteristic not always observable in the works of lady novelists; and, though its action “hangs” occasionally owing to its over-elaborated analysis of feelings, it is, as a rule, written easily, naturally, and in good English.

On the other hand it would be impossible to find fault with the plot of My Spanish Sailor, for the simple reason that it possesses no plot at all. Nevertheless, it is anything but a dull story. Nanette Fairfax, a girl not yet out of her teens, is privately married—for reasons which disclose themselves as the narrative progresses—to the captain of a steam vessel, a man twice her age, who brings her with him to England as an ordinary passenger travelling under her maiden name. The story is nothing more than an autobiographical record of the petty embarrassments and predicaments that befall an impulsive young woman, and of her ever variant moods, affectionate, repellent, and remorseful; but there is a crispness in the humour and a piquancy in the dialogue that fairly entitle it to a place among the readable class of novels.

Where have you been? resembles My Spanish Sailor in being a mere narrative of day-to-day life, illustrating the progressive stages of a love affair, which, in this case, finally ends in a sharp disappointment. It is an amusing story, but too short to require an extended notice. The peculiar title of the work seems to be due to some eccentricity on the part of the author. So far as one can see, it has nothing to do with the action of the novel; at least, not in any sense in which such a heading as “How do you feel now?” or “What do you intend doing next?” would not be equally appropriate.

As has been before mentioned in these columns, it is scarcely possible to criticise seriously works of fiction which depend for effects and donnement upon charms, and potions, and magic crystals, and the general apparatus of sorcery. In A Strange Enchantment Mr. B. L. Farjeon gives forth to the world a novelette of 100 pages, in which the deceiver of a woman is compelled by an African magician to disclose his crime, under the influence of some mysterious globules, and through the instrumentality of an enchanted mirror. It seems a pity that so able an author should have recourse to such doubtful contrivances for lending an interest to his story. Mr. Farjeon reminds us at the outset that “we seem to be on the threshold of startling discoveries in the unseen world.” The fact may be so. In the meantime, however, anticipations of these discoveries, for purposes of fiction, are about on a par, as regards literary value, with critiques written in advance, and appearing in print, concerning an artistic performance, which, owing to some unlucky accident, never appears before the public at all.

Suspicion is an uncommonly well-written novelette, belonging to what we may call the detective class. There is an old country-house, popularly supposed to be haunted, situated close to a rocky shore. The former master has met his death there under peculiarly mysterious circumstances; and now, at the advent of fresh occupiers—a young married couple, who, as usual, have no fear of ghosts before their eyes—the weird noises again assert themselves to the terror of the house and neighbourhood. The interest almost entirely turns upon the detection of the mystery. There is no love story in the ordinary acceptation of the word, though circumstances arise in the course of the narrative which lead the husband to entertain suspicions of his wife, from which the novel derives its name.

THE Homilies of Aphraates, the Persian sage, were edited for the first time in this country by Dr. Wright in 1869. The first volume contained the Syriac text from MSS. of the fifth and sixth centuries in the British Museum; the second volume, which was to give the English translation, has not yet appeared, and it has been now anticipated by the German version of Dr. Bert. The Homilies have a singular interest, both from the character of their author, and the time in which they were written. The history of Aphraates can be gathered to some extent from his writings. Born about A.D. 280, he lived in the age of the first development of monasticism. He entered the monastery Mor Mattai, which lies twelve miles to the north of Nineveh, on the height of Makluba. That monastery still exists. It belongs to the Jacobite Church; and Dr. Badger, who visited it in October, 1843, has given, in his work, The Nestorians and their Ritual (i., p. 96 sq.), a description of its buildings. It was founded most probably by Christians who had, during the persecution of Diocletian, taken refuge in the kingdom of Persia. Aphraates belonged to the earlier generation of monks; and he held at the same time a high position in the hierarchy of his church, as is evident from his circular epistle to the clergy and congregations of Armenia (Hom., xiv., comp. vi., x., and xxii.). The letter of the Arab bishop Georg (ed. Lagarde, Analekta Syr., p. 108 sq.) to the presbyter Jesus, written A.D. 714, expressly states that Aphraates was a bishop, while belonging at the same time to a monastic order. For, unlike the other Eastern churches, the Syrians permitted their abbots to exercise episcopal functions; and there were among them no less than twenty-one monasteries which were centres of sees. The Christians who had settled down in Persia were not destined to find rest. Homily XXII. mentions

“the 36th year of King Shapur, who caused the persecution, and the 5th year since the churches were extirpated; the year in which the murder of the martyrs took place in the eastern country.”

It shows incidentally that the collection of sermons to which it belonged was made between A.D. 336 and 345. Dr. Bert points out in the introduction to his work how considerable is the importance of the sermons for the student of language as well as of history. Next to those of Origen the oldest Homilies in existence, twenty-three in number, drawn up in the form of letters, they touch on the various points of Christian doctrine and ethics, on faith and charity, on penitence and fasting, on celibacy and virginity, on the instruction of the brethren (monks), on their duties during the times of persecution, &c. They afford, as Nöldeke says, a picture of Christianity which is perfectly simple and truly oriental in its character. They lay stress on asceticism, yet without that exaggeration which belongs to a later time; they inveigh against Jews and heretics, against Valentine and Mani, yet without that bitterness which so frequently mars the polemical works of Catholic writers. Their doctrine appears untouched by the controversies of dogmatists; their language and diction are singularly pure, and free from foreign words. “Whoever would write a Syriac syntax,” says the same authority, “must take his standard from Aphraates.” A strange fate has overhung the sermons of the Persian sage; born out of time, they belonged to an age that had passed away. In the Roman empire the church had contracted an alliance with the state, conquering—and being conquered by—the world; and the church in Eastern Syria, under Persian rule, was endeavouring to conform to that of the neighbouring empire. The sermons remained unheeded by Western writers; Gennadius alone, who continued, A.D. 490-95, St. Jerome's book De Viris Illustribus, noticed them. But they were in the fifth century translated into Armenian; and, although almost forgotten at home, they have exercised till the present day considerable influence on the Armenian church and literature.

Prof. Harnack's contribution is of considerable interest. The historian Eusebius (H. E. iv. 15) closes an account of the martyrdom of Polycarp at Smyrna with an allusion to three sufferers—Carpus, Pappylus, and Agathonice—who died for their faith at Pergamus. The names of the three martyrs appear in the oldest calendar known to us, the Martyrologium Orientale, drawn up between 365 and 380 by an Arian cleric at Nicomedia. They have thence passed into the Latin and Greek calendars, and one day in the year—it was originally April 13—is devoted to their memory. The record contained in the martyrologies of the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries refer their death to the persecution under the Emperor Decius, 250. Aubé published in the Revue Archéologique (December, 1881, p. 348 sq.) a text far older than those hitherto known, and differing from them altogether. The French savant was not aware of the importance of the discovery he had made. He published his text without comment; and he also assigned the date of the martyrdom to the reign of Decius. Prof. Harnack has added an excellent commentary to his edition of the same text; and he believes that the event which it records took place as early as the second century, during the years that Marcus Aurelius was co-regent with Antoninus Pius. We are unable to agree with one argument which he adduces in favour of the earlier date. The Christian confessor, led before the judge, is reminded of the “orders τὰν Ἀγίων ἐντολῶν” enjoining him to worship the gods,” v. 4. The plural Ἀγίων, as well as Σεβαστῶν (v. 21) must refer to contemporary emperors—to the Antonines, says Prof. Harnack (p. 454 sq.), and not to Decius, who had neither a colleague nor a predecessor who had passed any such law. But surely the orders by which Christians were obliged “to worship the gods,” first enacted by Trajan, had been enforced by his successors, and could be cited during the reign of any single emperor as apostolus τῶν Ἀποστόλων. But we quite endorse the opinion of the editor that these records possess all the characteristics peculiar to the second century and to the age of Marcus Aurelius. The character of the judge, his patience, his endeavours to make the Christians recant, the simple confession of Carpus, which shows, however, traces of culture and learning, the sympathy of the crowd with the sufferers, and especially with Agathonice, who suddenly beholds in a vision, above the ghastly place of execution, "the glory of the Lord," and, with the exclamation, "The table is spread," steps forth to die at the stake—all these features recall to our mind the martyrdom of Polycarp, of Justin, and of the Christians at Lyons. The whole scene is of almost dramatic power. The numerous allusions to the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and especially of St. John, which the editor has carefully collected, are of considerable interest in a text which dates from a comparatively early age.

Six years have now passed, so E. Schwartz informs us in his preface, since O. von Gebhardt proposed to him an edition of the Greek Apologists of the second century in connexion with the series of "Texte und Untersuchungen," which he, together with A. Harnack, was then beginning to publish. Of these Apologists, Justin Martyr was to be undertaken by O. von Gebhardt; Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus by E. Schwartz. "Jam primus hujus societatis fructus prodit, Tatiani Oratio ad Græcos." The text of this speech has come down to us in three MSS., which are transcripts of one original, the celebrated codex Paris, 451, written in A.D. 914 by order of the Archbishop Aréthas of Caesarea ("Texte u. U." vol. i., p. 41 sq.), and dating from that revival of letters which took place during the reign of Leo the philosopher. This codex contains portions of the writings of Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Athenagoras; but, unfortunately, "triginti duo folia," on which was written the Oratio ad Græcos, have been lost. And all editions of the oration are dependent for their text on the three transcripts. Additional information, however, is obtained in the numerous quotations from Tatian which we meet with in Eusebius's Preparation and History. But the historian himself evidently used a copy of which the text had been altered in many instances. And E. Schwartz has, on his journeys to Paris and Italy, compared the various MSS. He has examined six containing the History and five containing the Preparation. Appended are the scholia (codex Paris, 174) which were added by the learned Archbishop of Caesarea, the quotations from Tatian found in later authors, as well as the opinions passed upon him by ecclesiastical writers like Irenæus, Eusebius, and Jerome. An index of authors, and of names and words met with in the oration, renders the edition complete. A pathetic interest attaches to the person of Tatian. Born in Assyria, nurtured in Hellenic culture (comp. "Texte u. U." vol. i., p. 212), a rhetorician of some renown, he came to Rome; converted to Christianity about 150 A.D., he became a member of the Church and a disciple of Justin Martyr. Two years later he composed the speech, the apologia pro vita sua, in which he at once vindicated the step he had taken and bid Hellenic learning a final farewell. A teacher of high position in the church, and, at the same time, the most intensely serious of Christian philosophers, he developed a system of his own, in which he laid stress on the dualism of the spirit and the flesh, the church and the world. Twenty years after he had entered, he left the church, which, in his estimate, had made a compromise with the world. His secession took place during the time of Bishop Soter of Rome, A.D. 172 or 173. Ecclesiastical writers have called him a heretic, but they have themselves involuntarily borne witness to the influence of his strong and solemn character. All his other writings, excepting the orations, have perished, and among them the Diatessaron, perhaps the earliest complete synopsis of the Gospels. There is much that is dark and difficult in this his Apology. It has been, owing to these very difficulties, neglected both in Germany and in England. And we do not doubt that this excellent edition of E. Schwartz, as well as the commentary on it, which is to form the second part of the fourth volume of "Texte u. U.," will tend to draw the attention of scholars to the oration of Tatian.

In determining the order in which the books of Tertullian were written, Dr. Noeldtchen has collected all the evidence which he could bring to bear on his task. He has taken into account, first of all, the idioms which appear in the different works.

"It is a well-known fact," he says (p. 2), "that in the course of a few decades the national language changes, that some words and expressions rise to the surface, others sink to the bottom, so to speak, of a swiftly flowing river; the pen of one writer creates new forms, and makes fresh words."

There are those of Tertullian's tracts in which expressions like "military service, the type of Christian life," or "Babylon, the emblem of heathen Rome," are taking shape, others in which they appear ready made. The attitude which the Father assumed with regard to the questions whether virgins should go veiled, or Christians should flee in times of persecution, and in the determining of which he grew severer as years passed on, are an indication of the order in which his works appeared. In the same way he learned, in course of time, to lay stress on the exact definition of the meaning of words (proprietas vocabulorum), on the difference between veritas and imago, on the doctrine of what is merely permissum or indultum, and on the conditions under which communion with the church should be granted or denied. He learned to regard natura, disciplina, and scriptura, as the three sources of knowledge, which must supplement each other. The position which he had taken up with regard to the Pastor of Hermas underwent a complete change during the course of his literary career. His later works show a greater wealth of quotations from Scripture; and not infrequently expressions escape him which betray the self-consciousness of a man who has become famous. Occasionally we meet with references to contemporary persons or events, e.g., ad Scapulam. Tertullian enumerates the proconsuls of North Africa who were friendly to the Christians, and contrasts them with Saturninus, 198-200, who first persecuted them; or in adv. Præream he gives the history of the Phrygian heresy, and speaks of the Roman bishops Victor (A.D. 189-199) and Eleutherus (A.D. 175-189). In this exhaustive work, Prof. Noeldtchen has availed himself of everything which may assist him in determining the order of that long series of famous tracts, which begins most probably with the exhortations addressed "to the nations" and "to the martyrs," and ends with a diatribe on chastity. His inquiry has the additional value of showing incidentally the various phases in the mental and spiritual development of the greatest writer which the Western Church brought forth before St. Augustine.

The appendix contains a series of quotations from the Code Baroccianus, 142 (comp. Brieger's Zeitschrift für Kirchengesch., vi., p. 478 sq.) by Dr. O. De Boor. This code contains, on fol. 212-224, a number of texts from Eusebius. The texts are followed by notes, taken from the Christian History of Philippus of Side (written about A.D. 430), containing some curious information, which is given on the authority of the early writers, Papias, Hegesippus, and Pierius. The sons of Jude, the brother of our Lord, who were summoned to Rome by the Emperor Domitian (Eus. iii. 17-29), bore the names Zoker and James, so we are told. To the remark of Clement of Alexandria (E. iii. 30) that Peter and Paul and Philip were married men, we find the note added that Paul "offered up his wife unto God for the sake of the church, having ceased to have communication with her." After the passage (E. iii. 39 and 25), we read:

"Papias says in his second book that John the divine and James his brother were killed by the Jews. Papias learned from the daughters of Philippus that Barsabas the Just, having been given the poison of an adder to drink, was preserved from injury by the name of Christ. He relates also other miracles, especially the one concerning the mother of Manæm [perhaps identical with Manaen, the foster brother of Herod the tetrarch, a teacher at Antioch, Acts xiii. 1] who rose from the dead. About those who were by Christ raised from the dead, he says that they lived till the time of Hadrian."

Into the questions connected with the history of Philippus of Side, or the authorities upon whom he drew, we cannot now enter. But the notes, some of which we have quoted, embody the traditions of an age which succeeded immediately that of the twelve apostles. And our thanks are due to Dr. De Boor for having drawn attention to these interesting relics, which appear to have escaped the observation of scholars, because they are in the Codex Baroccianus bracketed, so to speak, between well-known passages.

Of the Gospels which were not received into the canon of the New Testament, and which have been consequently lost, the most important is that according to the Hebrews. The question as to the relationship which it bore to the canonical Gospels has been very differently answered by various scholars. Lessing advanced the ingenious theory that an ancient Hebrew work, containing apostolical tradition, and called "Gospel according to the Hebrews," or "according to the Twelve Apostles," existed among the Jews of Palestine, and that it was translated into Greek by Matthew. This view was accepted in the main by the Tübingen school, and it has again recently been put forward by Hilgenfeld. On the other hand, scholars like Gieseler and De Wette maintained that this book, so far from being the source upon which Matthew and Luke have drawn, is of a later date, that it records a tradition which is frequently inaccurate, and that it deserves to be termed apocryphal. Dr. Handmann's opinion is that the accounts given by the early Christian writers refer not to one but to several Hebrew gospels. The ancient Jewish Christian community emigrated from Jerusalem to Pella (Eus. iii. 15). Some of its members settled down to the east of the Jordan. Distinguished from all other congregations by their old-fashioned mode of living, they were unable to follow the development of doctrine that took place in regard to the person of Christ; and they were at the end of the second century excluded from the Catholic Church. Among them there existed two distinct parties: the Ebionitic, imbued with Gnostic ideas, which has left a record of itself in the pseudo-Clementine Homilies, and in a spurious gospel "according to the Twelve," and the Nazarenes, who were descended from the Church founded at Jerusalem by the apostles, and whose sacred book was the Hebrew gospel. This book was at an early date translated into Greek. The original was used by the historians of early Christianity—by Hegesippus, himself of Jewish descent, who wrote about A.D. 170; and by Eusebius, who lived in Palestine (339). The translation is frequently alluded to by the Alexandrine divines, Clement and Origen. St. Jerome, who spent thirty-four years of his life in Palestine, found two copies of that Gospel: one in the library at Caesarea, and another which was still in use among Nazarenes in Syria; and he mentions expressly (Adv. Pelag. iii. 2) that it was composed in the Aramaic dialect, which had been spoken by Jesus and his disciples, but that it was written in Hebrew characters. So far we have stated Dr. Handmann's opinions, but we are unable to follow him in his conclusions as to the age and the importance of the Hebrew Gospel. That book was the original, he says (p. 133 sq.), of some of the narratives contained in Matthew as well as in Luke; but he seems unable in the first instance to account for the ecclesiastical tradition which connected it with Matthew alone. The clear statement of Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. i. 26)—"Ebionaei solo autem eo quod est secundum Matthaeum evangelio utuntur" (repeated iii. 12)—he sets aside with the remark that the Father, who spent his life in the south of Gaul, at Vienne and Lyons, was not accurately informed about a sect which existed in the East (p. 36). And the authority of St. Jerome he impugns on the ground that that Father, although himself better informed, did not venture to cast doubts on a tradition which identified the Hebrew gospel with Matthew, and which was supported by men like Epiphanius and Irenaeus (p. 64). This supposition, however, leaves the origin of that tradition unexplained; nor is it easy to see why St. Jerome should have been afraid of committing himself to a statement which the simplest reference to the two Gospels would have borne out. According to Dr. Handmann, the Hebrew Gospel is the most ancient record of Jesus's life; next comes Mark: from these two sources in the main the Gospels of Matthew and Luke have been compiled (p. 136 sq.). But when we eliminate from the first and the third Gospel all those portions which they have in common with the second, we do not see that the remaining chapters show any affinity with the Hebrew fragments which have come down to us. These fragments have a character of their own. Comparing passages like the one on the baptism of Jesus (St. Jer. Ad. Jes. ii. 1):

"It came to pass when the Lord ascended from the water, the font of the Holy Spirit descended upon him, and rested upon him, and said unto him: My son, in all the prophets did I expect thee, that thou mightest come, and that I might rest in thee. For thou art my rest, thou art my firstborn son, who reignest in eternity"; or that wonderful scene (St. Jer., De Vir. Ill., c. 2) where the risen Jesus appears to his brother James, with the fantastic description of the transfiguration where "the mother, the Spirit, seizes him by one hair of his head, and carries him to the great mountain of Thabor" (Orig. In Joh. 2, 6)—we understand at once the veneration with which the Alexandrine divines regarded this Gospel, and the sound judgment with which the church excluded it from the New Testament. We have no reason to regret this decision. Nor can we expect to derive from this book any information regarding the origin of our Gospels, unless by some happy chance a copy of one of St. Jerome's translations, or better still of the Aramaic original, now perhaps buried beneath the rubbish of some Eastern monastery, be brought to light. And this is not—considering the discovery of the codex Sinaiticus, and in late years of the Didaché—an altogether vain hope.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE death of Baron de Witte, the eminent Belgian archaeologist, creates a second vacancy among the eight Foreign Members of the Académie des Inscriptions. After his and Amari's death, there are at present but six Foreign Members left—Rossi at Rome (1867), Max Müller at Oxford (1869), Gorresio at Turin (1876), Cobet at Leiden (1876), Rawlinson at London (1887), and Miklosich at Vienna (1888).

THE following will, so far as we know, be the English members present at the eighth International Congress of Orientalists, which will meet at Stockholm and Christiania during the first fortnight of September. Prof. Max Müller will be the guest of the King of Sweden and Norway, the patron of the congress; Profs. Sayce and Maclonnell will represent Oxford, and Prof. Bensley Cambridge; while Mr. F. W. Percival has been chosen as their delegate by the Society of Antiquaries. Prof. Sayce and Mr. Percival propose to visit St. Petersburg before going to Stockholm.

MR. ANDREW LANG has collected or retold a number of fairy stories, which will be published early in the autumn season by Messrs. Longmans under the title of The Blue Fairy Book, with numerous illustrations by Mr. H. J. Ford and Mr. G. P. Jacob Hood.

MR. H. S. SALT, the biographer of James Thomson, is now engaged in writing a Life of Thoreau.

JEANIE MORISON—the author of a noticeable poem, entitled "The Purpose of the Ages"—has written an outline analysis of Mr. Browning's "Sordello," which will be published shortly by Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

MR. ALEXANDER GARDNER, of Paisley—who has made a speciality of handsomely printed books about Scottish history—announces a series to be called "The Historical Castles and Mansions of Scotland," by Mr. A. H. Millar. Each volume will be illustrated with a photograph frontispiece, and numerous other engravings. The first, to be issued in the present autumn, will deal with the counties of Perth, Forfar, and Fife. The impression will be strictly limited.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a sort of reply to Mr. Mowbray Morris's recent Life of Claverhouse, which will be called Clavers, the Despot's Champion: a Scot's Biography, by a Southerner.

THE next volume in the "Badminton Library," to be published in the autumn, is Fencing, Boxing, and Wrestling, written by Messrs. Walter H. Pollock, F. C. Grove, Walter Armstrong, E. B. Mitchell, and M. Prévost. This will be followed later by Golf, to which Mr. Horace Hutchinson, Mr. A. J. Balfour, and Sir William Simpson (among others) will contribute.

THE Early English Text Society will issue early in August, as its second text for this year in its Original Series, Mr. Rhodes's edition of the interlinear Anglo-Saxon glosses and original Latin of the Liber Scintillarum by an unknown Defensor; and in its Extra Series—the second and last book for 1889—part v. of Mr. A. J. Ellis's great work on Early English Pronunciation. This part deals with our modern English dialects, as illustrating the earlier ones, and contains nearly a thousand pages. The Philological and Chaucer Societies also unite in publishing this book.

DR. THOMAS MILLER, of Göttingen, has sent to press for the Early English Text Society his new edition of Bede's Ecclesiastical History in Latin and the Anglo-Saxon of King Alfred. For the benefit of the less learned members of the society a modern English version will be printed at the foot of the parallel Latin and Anglo-Saxon texts, according to the society's rule.

DR. LUICK is to edit for the Early English Text Society a small volume of Miscellaneous Alliterative Poems, from Robert Thornton's Additional MS. in the British Museum and other sources.

MR. EMIL WERNER has undertaken to edit for the Chaucer Society the Early English version of Boccaccio's De Claris Mulieribus, on which Chaucer founded (more or less) his "Legend of Good Women," though he had other sources for his poem, as Prof. Skeat points out in his excellent new edition of it for the Clarendon Press.

MR. W. DAVENPORT ADAMS has in the press a new volume of essays, entitled Rambles in Bookland. Mr. Elliot Stock will publish the work shortly.

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS will publish shortly a volume of sketches of maritime life, by Mr. W. Clark Russell, taking its title from "The Romance of Jenny Harlow," which recently appeared in the English Illustrated. The book will have a frontispiece drawn by Mr. F. Barnard.

MISS F. E. COOKE, the author of popular biographies of Richard Cobden, Lloyd Garrison, and others, is engaged upon a life of Father Damien for young people, which will be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. in September.

THE September volume in the "Camelot" series will be More's Utopia, with an introduction by Mr. Maurice Adams.

THE forthcoming number of the Library will contain the following articles: "The Library of the Royal College of Surgeons of England," by J. B. Bailey; "The Tōkyō Library," by S. Tegima, director of the library; a first instalment of "Caxtoniana," by F. Norgate; and Notes on Swedish libraries, by J. P. Briscoe.

THE Admiralty have placed the order for the supply of naval libraries in the hands of Mr. Thomas Laurie.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Boissier read a paper upon the religion of Boethius. Many authorities have recently maintained that he was a pagan; but M. Boissier supported the older view, that he was a Christian. He was certainly born of a Christian family, and was the friend and son-in-law of Symmachus. The authenticity of the Christian writings attributed to Boethius has been disputed; but this question is settled by Holder's discovery of the fragments of Cassiodorus, in which they are formally ascribed to him. The pagan character of the famous De Consolatione Philosophiae is to be explained by the fact that many Christians of that time who had received a classical education prided themselves on keeping their religion and their philosophy apart. Saint Augustine has left philosophical dialogues, which are full of Plato and Cicero, but contain no allusions to Christ or the Bible.

THE American resident of Florence, who is modestly content to be known under the initials W. F., has printed, as No. iv. of his "Bibliographical Notices," a second list of books printed in Iceland between 1578 and 1844, supplementary to the British Museum Catalogue. That Catalogue gives 170 titles of such books, of which 38 are absent from W. F.'s collection. This set of these "Bibliographical Notices" adds 139 to titles, and the second now adds 139 more, raising the total number of books known to have been printed in Iceland before the establishment of a press at Reykjavik (1844) to 448. As to one who cannot admit a passion for Icelandic bibliography this work must prove attractive, both from the extraordinary pains expended upon its production and the accuracy of its details. The earliest entry in chronological order is a Catechism translated from the Latin by Arngrímur Jónsson, and printed at Hólar in 1596. But the most interesting is the first edition of the Passion Hymns of Hallgrímur Pétursson (1666), to which is appended a complete bibliography of the work. There is also the second volume of the first newspaper published in Iceland, the Íslandske Maanedstidender of Hrappsey (1775). At the end are some corrections and additions to "Bibliographical Notices," I.; and a full index of names and titles, with a table of the books according to their places of printing.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have now added At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies, with the original illustrations, to their cheap edition of Charles Kingsley's Works. It is interesting to learn that this narrative of travel has been only less popular than the novels. It was first published, in two volumes, in 1871; a one volume edition was called for in the following year; and it has been since reprinted no less than ten times.

If my little mother dear,
If my little mother sweet,
Saw me passing in my pain,
Tears she'd rain upon the street.

Will you give me these pearly tears
That down your cheeks have rolled?
I will take them to Granada
To be set in rings of gold.

THE HOUSE-COMMUNITIES AND CO-OPERATIVE UNIONS OF BULGARIA.

MR. J. E. GUESHOV, the Bulgarian economist, whose name is identified with some important incidents in the struggle of his people for national life and freedom, has recently published three interesting articles in the leading Bulgarian review—Periodicheskoe Spisanie—which appears at Sofia. The subject which he treats is the system of house-communities and co-operative societies in his native country. The house-communities of the Slavs have been already discussed by Prof. Bogišić and the late Sir Henry Maine. It is chiefly, however, the Serbian zadrugas which are known in Western Europe. The Bulgarian communal systems have been described only by M. de Laveleye, with the exception of Herr Kanitz, who has told us something of a Bulgarian zadruga, which he found at Sukhin-dol.

In the first place it must be clearly stated that the word zadruga is met with only among the Croats and Serbs. It is unknown to the Bulgarians; but it is used as a convenient term by M. Gueshov, on account of its having been employed extensively by Western writers. The Bulgarians sometimes call it kupshtina, of which a form—skupstchina—is met with among the Croats. Our author thinks, with considerable reason, that the word zadruga is implied in the Greek σπουγγος, employed by the Byzantine writer, Michael Acominatus (De Thessalia, ejusque Agro). The head of the Bulgarian house-community is called domakin, the man of the house, and not starshina, the elder, as among the Serbs. The domakin is usually either married or a widower; he may, however, be a single man. M. Gueshov remembers at most only one zadruga the head of which was a woman, but the rule is to appoint a man; and this is natural, for the domakin not only governs the zadruga, but represents it to the outer world. He sells and buys for it, and is its mouthpiece, if such a need arises, before the law. To him respect and obedience are due from the rest. The property and the honour of the whole family are entrusted to him. The domakina must be either a wife or a widow; cases, however, have occurred where she is an unmarried woman. She is generally either the wife of the domakin, or widow of a previous one. If the house-master has no wife, the oldest woman of the community is elected domakina. It is she who regulates the work to be done by the women of the household—as, for instance, who is to bake or cook on particular days; and she arranges the domestic labour so as to allow the women time for attention to their children and other duties.

The principle of the zadruga is that each member must work for the common good according to his capacity. Anyone who is dissatisfied with the work assigned to him can leave the community, and the only goods which he is allowed to carry away with him as his peculium are his clothes. If one of the women contracts a second marriage with a man who is not a member of the zadruga, her children by her first husband remain in the community, although she herself quits it. When the young girls marry, they have nothing from the zadruga except the vestra, which consists of clothes and bed furniture, for which the zadruga receives what is called a prid—a money-payment from the bridegroom.

These house-communities are spread over Bulgaria from Leskovatz in the north to Macedonia; but concerning the latter part of the country, M. Gueshov is not able to give us any minute details. It was handed back to the Turks by the lamentable treaty of Berlin, and must wait patiently its reunion with Bulgaria—its inevitable destiny. As an instance of a well-known zadruga, details are given us of that of Gornya-Banya, not far from Sofia. The head of this community is a priest. About four years ago it consisted of twenty-eight and now has more than thirty-five members, and is ruled by the domakin, Todorin. With him work his six brothers, one of whom is a priest, a second a farmer, a third a shepherd, a fourth a miller, a fifth the keeper of an inn, and a sixth a tailor. No property is private among them with the exception of their clothes. All work for the house-community; even the priest, if he gets money from any quarter, from a wedding, christening, or funeral, is obliged to bring it into the common fund. The domakina, the wife of Todorin, arranges which of her sisters-in-law shall bake one day, and which shall cook. One oven and one kettle suffice for the thirty-five members of the zadruga. According to M. Gueshov, concord and love prevail in this community; and the priest assured him that if they had possessed in severalty, they could never have passed through the terrible period of the last Russo-Turkish war.

Since the independence of Bulgaria no legal sanction has been given to this customary right, but it remains deeply rooted as an institution in the public mind. An example is quoted of a member of a zadruga who purchased two plots of land, and sought the authority of the law to have them confirmed as his individual property. The law decided in his favour; but the whole village rose against him, and he was obliged to hand over his newly acquired property to the zadruga to be held in common. "Quid leges sine moribus?" says M. Gueshov. Of what use are the laws of a country, he asks, if they are not based upon the public conscience and national institutions?

The first article concludes with a discussion of the arguments which have been urged by legists for and against the communal system. But we must not trouble readers of the ACADEMY with the re-statement of a question which has been already threshed out. M. Gueshov is obliged to confess, in spite of his admiration for the system, that it is dying out. The mir in Russia is already being exploited by the kulaks and miroyeds. According to M. Reclus, the Serbian zadrugas are diminishing; and, by a law passed in Croatia in 1874, no fresh ones can be created in that part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, although the custom seems deeply rooted in the country.

In his second essay M. Gueshov gives us some interesting statistics regarding the co-operative market gardeners of Bulgaria. These industrious men do not confine themselves to any particular localities, but travel about and raise vegetables on plots of ground which they hire; and we must remember that before everything the Slav is an agriculturist. These co-operative societies remind us of the Russian artels, in which the artisans unite their earnings and maintain a common table. The unit of the gardeners' co-operative society is the working gardener. If a man has gained experience in this calling, he can easily enter one of the societies, even if he has no money, for capital is not a necessary condition of admission. The union is called a taifa, and is great or little according to the size of the garden which it is proposed to cultivate, and that of the town which offers a market for their products. The head is called master, or in the native terms chorbadja or taifadja—words of Turkish origin. He holds the purse, and keeps the accounts. After him in importance is the prodavach, or salesman, to whom is entrusted the sale of the vegetables. These two functionaries have greater shares than the rest; but the funds of the society are distributed in proportion among the ortatsi, or workers in the garden. Minute details are given on these points by M. Gueshov, who also enables us to form an idea of the great variety of vegetables cultivated.

In his third essay our author furnishes lists of other co-operative unions at present existing in Bulgaria, and the numbers of their members. Besides market-gardeners, there are co-operative societies of shepherds, reapers, masons, bakers, tinkers, and potters. The latter appear to have a jargon confined to themselves. Is not this to be accounted for by their probably being often gipsies?

All these statistics afford an interesting study of the industry and frugality of the Bulgarian, who seems to have great things in store for him now that he has shaken off the cruel Turkish yoke and has earned the respect of all Europe. One thing is certain: if co-operation be, as some economists have stated, the ultimate solution of the labour question, the Bulgarians exhibit a well-developed form of it, and their system is worth our study.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR IN ENGLAND IN THE REIGN OF GEORGE II.

London: July 31, 1889.

During his residence at the Russian embassy in London Prince Antiochus Cantemir made many friends, and his correspondence with J. J. Zamboni—the resident of the Duke of Darmstadt—which is preserved in the Bodleian Library,* may illustrate the cordial relations subsisting between them. "His house was the rendezvous of scholars," says the Abbé Guasco; and it is a well-known fact that the first Russian satirist wrote some satires in London. Here he learnt Italian, and arranged for publishing his father's History of the Growth and Decay of the Ottoman Empire.† Six years' residence in England was not time lost for a man who, even in the year 1724, in a most humble petition to Peter the Great, expressed his wish to go abroad for the purpose of study.

In the beginning of September, 1738, Lord Harrington informed the English resident at St. Petersburg that Prince A. Cantemir was going to leave London. By the letter of revocation, dated April 18, the Russian Empress Anne Ivanowna appointed Prince Cantemir to be minister plenipotentiary at the court of France.

† Translated into English by N. Tindall, 2 p., London, 1734-35.

"Our Affairs," wrote the empress to George II., "requiring at present to recall from your Royal Majesty's Court Our well-beloved and Right-trusty Prince Antiochus Cantemir, our Minister Plenipotentiary, and to employ him in another Commission, We cannot but friendly and sisterly acquaint your Majesty therewith by the present, kindly desiring Your Majesty favourably to dismiss from you the said our Minister."

The king's reply to this communication was in the following terms:

"George the Second, &c.,
 "To the Most High, Most Potent, and Most Illustrious Princess, Our Most dear Sister, the Great Lady Czarina and Great Duchess Anne, &c.,
 "Most High and most Potent, and most Illustrious Princess, Your Czarish Majesty having signified to Us by your letter of the 18th April Your Resolution of recalling from Our Court Your Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary, Prince Antiochus Cantemir, We could not in justice to his merit dismiss him from Our Presence without acquainting Your Imperial Majesty how worthy he has constantly shewed himself of the Trust You reposed in him, and how much to Our satisfaction he behaved himself during the whole course of his Ministry here, in endeavouring upon all occasions to promote and increase the happy Union which subsists between Us. The said Minister Plenipotentiary will not fail to inform Your Imperial Majesty how earnestly We desire and wish for the perpetuation of the present entire Harmony and Friendship, and how sensible We have always been and still are of Your Czarish Majesty's friendly and sisterly disposition towards Us, wherein We hope Your Majesty will give him entire credence, and so concluding with the most sincere assurance of Our best wishes for Your constant Welfare, We most earnestly recommend Your Czarish Majesty to the Protection of the Almighty. Given at our Imperial Palace of Kensington this eighth Day of September in the year of Our Lord God, 1738; and in the twelfth Year of Our Reign.

"Your most affectionate Brother,

"Harrington."†

"George R."

What was the real reason for the nomination of Prince Cantemir to France has never been satisfactorily explained. Some indications may be found, it seems to me, in the despatches between the Duke of Newcastle and Lord Harrington on the one side, and the English residents at Paris and St. Petersburg on the other.

In the beginning of the year 1738 Prince Cantemir had been instructed by his government to resume friendly intercourse with France; and, if credit may be given to the Duke of Newcastle's despatch, dated January 6, 1738, Prince Cantemir tried to ingratiate himself with M. Cambis, the French Ambassador at the Court of St. James's. Thanks to his efforts the relations between Russia and France improved. But this was not all. On June 24, C. Rondeau wrote as follows from St. Petersburg:

"Count Osterman had sent to desire me to come to his house this evening; where I was no sooner arrived than he read to me a paper by Her Czarish Majesty's order, and desired I would mention it to any body, because he had not been ordered to make the following declaration. Count Osterman told me in great confidence, that the Czarina had taken this sudden resolution of sending Prince Cantemir to France, in order to show and convince the Diet of Sweden that, in case they resolved to undertake any thing against Russia, they cannot reasonably expect any assistance from the French king, since the Czarina is on such good terms with France that she has sent a Minister Plenipotentiary to that Court."

Prince Cantemir resided at the Court of France till the last days of his life. On March 31, 1744 O.S., he died, to the sorrow of his friends, to one of whom the celebrated Montesquieu, on being informed of Cantemir's death, wrote the following lines of consolation:

"L'Abbé Venuti m'a fait part, mon cher Abbé, de l'affliction que vous a causée la mort de votre ami le prince de Cantemir. . . . Vous trouverez partout des amis pour remplacer celui que vous avez perdu, mais la Russie ne remplacera pas si aisément un ambassadeur du mérite du prince de Cantemir. . . ."

Generations have elapsed since the death of Prince Cantemir, but the words of Montesquieu remain true to the present time.

ADRIEN DE BUT'S TESTIMONY TO À KEMPIS.
London: July 31, 1889.

It may interest the many admirers of the Imitation and its author to know that Father Becker has just completed a series of articles in the Précis Historiques (Brussels) on the authorship, giving the results of the latest works on that subject, and many proofs in favour of Thomas à Kempis.

As a supplement, Dr. Cruise, of Dublin, has had photographed a page of the Chronicles of the Cistercian Monastery of the Dunes, with the note on à Kempis signed by Adrien de But. In this one can see at a glance, as Dr. Cruise points out, that this note refers to the year 1458, to the account of which year it is joined on. The use of the present tense "œdificat" shows that Thomas was then living; while the past tense "descripsit" refers to the Imitation as having been already written.

THE UNAUTHORISED REPRINTING OF POEMS.
Wordsworth's Cottage, Grasmere: July 26, 1889.

On public grounds I deem it my duty to protest in the most emphatic terms against the following infringement of the law relating to copyright. From the table of contents on the outside of The Bible Society Monthly Reporter I recently discovered that a poem of mine had been inserted in the May number of that periodical without my knowledge or permission. The poem in question was first published in my Sonnets, and other Verse, and afterwards in Sacred Song. It is needless to state that the copyright of these volumes has not yet expired.

Unfortunately, this appropriation of other people's property is not the only offence of which the editor has been guilty, nor is it the most serious. To suit his own taste he has thought fit to make various alterations in several of the lines, and has thus defaced any beauty which the poem may previously have possessed. To print my name at the foot of such a mangled and incorrect version of my work appears to me to be a most unkind and libellous untruth, for the poem as thus altered is not mine. If I am rightly informed, many thousand copies of this incorrect version of my lines will have been distributed in this periodical (price one half-penny), not only almost in every town of the United Kingdom, but also through Canada, Australia, the West Indies, and most of our other colonies.

In conclusion, I would state that I have no doubt that the editor has sinned through want of thought, and not through any wrong intention; but it is because it is so easy to err in these matters through want of thought that I am constrained to write this letter in the hope of preventing such misdoings in future.

Bird-Life of the Borders. By Abel Chapman. (Gurney & Jackson.)

He is the best observer of animal life who is a sportsman as well as a naturalist. The enthusiasm of the one quickens the patient watchfulness of the other. Most probably the sportsman who is also a naturalist will earn the black looks of those who are merely sportsmen when he hangs behind in the stubbles to determine the name of some little bird in a neighbouring hedge; and he will indubitably lose his chance, as the thickest of the pheasants approach his corner, because he will watch the proceedings of a green woodpecker on an old elm. But everywhere he gains double enjoyment for his hobbies, and if he only takes pains to write in fluent English a tithe of what he has thus seen and heard, the chances are that he produces a charming book. St. John, in the last generation, was the typical example of this union of outdoor tastes; Colquhoun and A. E. Knox in the present. All three have left lovers of the country delightful pictures of the quaint manners and habits of the native birds and beasts. And now Mr. Chapman, from the plenitude of experience garnered during years of shooting and observation of nature, has written a volume on the bird life of the fells and coast of Northumberland well worthy of being named with their books. The Bird Life of the Borders will enchant all who are fond of birds, and who have themselves penetrated into remote districts in order to study them at leisure; while stay-at-home naturalists will be pleased to possess the graphic pictures of border moor and moss which these ably written pages contain. Sympathy with all living creatures, careful observation with cautious deductions, and strong love for the bleak moors and wild scenery of the Cheviots—such are the characteristics of this most interesting book.

A student of the Reports on birds from the different lighthouses, issued by a Committee of the British Association, might grumble at Mr. Chapman's criticism—"They appear quite as remarkable for what they omit as for what they include." He speaks generously at other times on the usefulness of these Reports, in which we quite agree; but it is surely unreasonable to expect too much of the lighthouse-keepers, who are not trained ornithologists, and who give their time and trouble freely to the scheme. What is really wanted is an abstract and index to the whole series of reports, and this is now being done by a competent ornithologist. Mr. Chapman murmurs too at the legal restrictions imposed upon shooting wild fowl after March 2. That date was adopted after due consideration, and the Act passed in the interest of the many. Doubtless there may be friction in its working every here and there, but every protective law labours under the same objection. We know a trout river in Devon which would "fish" beautifully in January, but anglers wait loyally, however much they may chafe, until February 2. It is not "maudlin sentimentality" to fine a poor man for overworking his horse. One more grumble and we have done. With ordinary sporting writers the use of slang terms goes for granted. Mr. Chapman writes such pure English, and describes so well, that it is a pity to see his prose disfigured with such commercial solecisms as "in due course," to "negotiate" meaning to "shoot," a "contingent" of ducks, and the "inauguration" of a month for its "commencement."

Mr. Chapman conducts his reader through the bird year on the Cheviots, giving sketches of the birds seen at each season, together with its scenery, as he advances. This plan admits of much pleasant writing and many curious anecdotes of his favourites. He dwells especially on the regular succession season by season, almost week by week at some times, of different birds; and nowhere can the bird-lover meet with a better account of the migrations of these birds. He agrees with Dr. Tristram as to the polar origin of all bird life, and traces many of the northern birds to our shores and to the southern limit of their wanderings. April 20 is the day he fixes on for the stirring of birds on the hills. The common sandpiper then arrives, and a multitude of diverse birds begin laying, moved by the pulse of spring. Many birds have begun to leave the district by the middle of June, and summer for the birds which have fixed on the moors ends in July. A fresh set come into prominence during August. It will astonish many readers to find how destructive the telegraph wires which run along the border roads are to wild birds. The raven is scarce, it seems, on the Cheviots; but it is somewhat surprising to hear that the buzzard has disappeared, and that the peregrine is fast following it. There are some sensible pages on the grouse disease, and perhaps not every grouse shooter knows that this bird only feeds in the evening. In every page occur observations well worthy of being put on record. Thus, sportsmen may remember that the solitary snipe never occurs in the winter; by the middle of October it has passed to its southern home. The coquettishness of black game, grouse, and golden plover during mid-autumn is another noticeable fact. A blackcock's lek is generally associated with early spring. Many confuse the goosander with the merganser. The former is essentially a fresh-water bird, whereas the merganser is a sea duck. The resemblances between the wren and the water ouzel have struck observers before, but the details on the movements of snipe in the winter quarters are admirably described. Even in grouse shooting a novelty to most men is here treated—the Northumbrian method of approaching these birds when wild by means of accompanying an empty cart over the moors. Indeed, the sections on grouse and black cock are most carefully written. Even the oldest sportsmen might obtain wrinkles from them.

The second part of the book is occupied with punting for wild fowl on the ooze and sand flats of the north-eastern coast. The descriptions of midnight gunning amid ice and snow give a lively picture of the hardships which accompany a form of sport to which its devotees are strongly attached. Every sportsman will enjoy these recitals, but their technicality excuses us from entering further into their details.

A few pages are devoted to the trout and salmon fisher. Even here a curious fact is noted that salmon never ascend the eastern, or plutonic rock, channel of the Redewater for the purpose of spawning. They invariably prefer the main stream which flows through moor and moss.

It would be inexcusable, however, to forget the illustrations. Mr. Chapman too modestly describes them as "intended to serve as character-sketches." We have no difficulty in recognising every bird portrayed in them, so great is their fidelity to nature. Although rough pen-and-ink sketches reproduced by photo-zincography, their character exactly suits the wild scenes and the birds of the moorland and river delineated in them. They add a great charm to a book redolent of wild life and careful observation. The sketch of black game disturbed on a stone dyke, and just preparing to fly, is admirable; so are the golden plovers. If we take exception to the alarmed curlew represented on p. 73, it is only because the other sketches of birds are so excellent, and because the curlews depicted on p. 34 are lifelike.

These remarks should send many readers to Mr. Chapman's book. They will not be disappointed. It is a most valuable contribution to our knowledge of the birds which frequent mountain, moor, and estuary.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EGYPTIAN "TUR-SHA."

London: July 29, 1889.

In connexion with the great discoveries made in Egypt by Mr. Flinders Petrie concerning a light-haired people of "Tur-sha" origin, it may be useful to bring to recollection that Prof. Heinrich Brugsch identified the Tur-sha with the Trojans (see Dr. Schliemann's Ilios). Another people in Northern Africa, whom the Greeks called Maxyes, Prof. Brugsch identified with the Mashaua, or Mashaua-sha, of the Egyptians. The Maxyes, according to Herodotus, themselves said that "they were the descendants of men who came from Troy." The Thracian kinship of the Trojans would account for the light hair of the Tur-sha.

KARL BLIND.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL JOTTINGS.

THE most noteworthy papers in the August number of the Journal of the Anthropological Institute are by Major Conder on the Early Races of Western Asia, and by Messrs. Jacobs and Spielman on the Comparative Anthropometry of English Jews. The latter is illustrated by a plate of curves showing graphically the results obtained by the examination of 423 Jews and Jewesses, partly in the East End and partly in the West End of London, and comparing these results with those obtained in Mr. Galton's classical experiments in his anthropometric laboratory at the Health Exhibition in 1885.

WE would draw attention to an interesting paper, by Mr. Stuart Glennie, in the last volume of the Transactions of the Royal Historical Society (Longmans). Mr. Stuart Glennie has brought together a large mass of facts in support of the theory that the civilisations of the world are due to what he calls "the Arkhaian White Races," of whom the ancient Egyptians and Akkadians of Chaldea would be the leading representatives. These races were distinguished by a certain type of skull and feature, by their white skin, and by their masterful intelligence and originality. They possessed in common certain traditions of primitive kinship, of a Paradise and of a Deluge; and the civilisations they evolved under favouring conditions were, in the first instance, the result of a superior power of organisation, which enabled them to command the labour of the black or coloured races. The Arkhaian white races were succeeded about 3000 B.C. by the Semites, another branch of the white race; and about 600 B.C. the Semites were superseded as leaders of civilisation by the white-skinned Aryans. If this theory can be maintained—and the facts by which it is supported have been drawn from the best authorities, and are thoroughly up to date—it will have important consequences for the study of mythology, religion, and institutions. Instead, for instance, of finding in the grosser myths of the white races survivals of their primitive culture, we should find in them merely survivals of the superstitions of the lower races with whom the white races were in contact, and with whom their blood may have become partially mixed. So, again, myths found among the lower races may be but misunderstood symbolism of the higher races by whom they were subdued. Similarly the institutions of polyandry and matriarchy would be explained by the supremacy of the white woman over the members of an inferior race. Mr. Stuart Glennie's arguments deserve the serious attention of anthropologists and historians. At all events it is now certain that the old Egyptians belonged to the white race, Virchow's researches having satisfactorily settled the question; and it is highly probable that the Akkadians did so too.

WE have received three parts of the new volume of the Internationale Archiv für Ethnographie (London: Trübner.) The most important article is that by Dr. F. von Luschan, of Berlin, upon the shadow-play so popular throughout Asiatic Turkey, under the name of "Karagöz." Another elaborate article, by Mr. R. Parkinson, deals with the manners and customs of the natives of the Gilbert Islands, in New Britain. Mr. Felix Driessen describes, in English, a silk fabric manufactured at Samarang in Java by the process known as "tie and dye"; and Dr. H. Schurtz contributes a monograph on the throwing-knife or tomahawk used by various negro tribes in Central Africa. All these four articles are illustrated with fine chromo-lithographic plates. A new feature in the Archiv is the larger space now devoted to notes from museums and notices of anthropological publications, which contribute to make it invaluable to ethnologists. We would specially mention the bibliography in each part compiled by Dr. G. J. Dozy.

THE last number of the Journal of the Anthropological Society of Bombay (London: Trübner) contains several papers of more than usual interest. Mr. E. Rehatsek gives statistics of suicides in Bombay city. Their rate per million of the population is nearly 119, as compared with 170 in Berlin and 87 in London; and the proportion is excessively high among Parsis. Mr. H. H. Risley sends a preliminary report upon his ethnographic survey of Bengal, from which we learn that

"the higher castes seem to conform to a type which we are justified in describing as Aryan; the hill-tribes of Chutia Nagpur show some of the marked characteristics of the negro races; there is no material difference between the so-called Dravidian and Kolarian tribes, and neither of them contains any appreciable admixture of Mongolian blood."

Mr. Kedarnath Basu enumerates no less than 232 popular superstitions in Bengal, some of which are curious—e.g., the crossing of the path by a cat is most inauspicious. Mr. Purahotam Balkrishna Joshi gives an account of the Gondhalis—a class of Maratha bards, who have preserved many historical ballads of the last century. And, finally, Dr. Gerson da Cunha describes his unique collection of Indian talismans, amulets, lucky coins, &c., the origin of which he is disposed to assign to Babylonia. This collection includes thirty-seven examples of the Rāmatanka so highly prized in Southern India.

THE report of Mr. A. Rea, archaeological surveyor for Southern India—as printed in Trübner's Record—gives some interesting facts about the practice of erecting kistvaens at the present day in Kistna district. The practice is confined to certain low castes of the Vaishnava sect; all the Saivites burn their dead.

"The body is laid horizontally in a shallow grave, the earth is heaped over it in a long narrow mound, and these kistvaens are then placed over it. They do not approach a square, as in the ancient examples, but bear a proportion to the size of the body. At the head and feet are small upright slabs about two feet broad; long slabs are placed upright at the sides, and another of sufficient length and breadth to cover these four upright stones is laid on the top. In some instances a separate stone is placed upright at the head of the grave."

Mr. Rea points out that the practice serves to protect the remains from wild beasts; and he also suggests that the old megalithic kistvaens were superseded by the custom of placing the body of the dead in a large earthenware sarcophagus.

THE August number of the Indian Magazine (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.) contains two articles of interest to anthropologists. Mr. G. F. Sheppard, of the Bombay Civil Service, describes the marriage customs of the Kunbis—the great cultivating caste of Gujarat—with special reference to the movement for reducing the exaggerated expenses attendant on a wedding; and Munshi Milkha Ram contributes some notes on country life in Bhadr, one of the minor states in the plain of the Punjab. Both articles refer to infanticide as dying out.

THE Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund for July contains a set of "answers to questions concerning the inhabitants of the country," contributed by Mr. Joseph Jibrail, who has lived as a teacher among the Druzes on Mount Carmel. The most curious beliefs of the Druzes are those connected with China; they believe China to be a holy land, and that when they die they will be reborn in China. Eclipses are caused by a dragon eating a piece of the sun or moon. Some of their beliefs recall those of the early Gnostic and Manichaean sects in Syria.

MR. HENRY WITHERBEE HENSHAW has reprinted from the American Anthropologist a lecture which he recently delivered in the National Museum, Washington, on the question, "Who are the American Indians?" It is most remarkable for suggesting no solution of the problem, and is otherwise very sensible and clearly expressed. Perhaps the one definite statement is that the Indian race must have originated, whether in America or elsewhere, at an epoch so remote as to be reckoned only by geologic time. Incidentally, we are told that the researches of Major Powell and his assistants in the bureau of anthropology have revealed no less than fifty-eight distinct linguistic families in the country north of Mexico, comprising at least three hundred languages or dialects.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE first instalment (256 pages) of the Grundriss der Germanischen Philologie (Strassburg: Trübner) is principally occupied with the articles by the editor, Prof. Paul, on the history and the methodology of Teutonic philology. The astonishing width and accuracy of knowledge displayed in these articles are fully worthy of the author's high reputation, and the style is on the whole more lucid and attractive than that of Prof. Paul's writings usually is. Prof. Sievers contributes a brief paper on the runes, which is chiefly an abstract of the well-known work of Wimmer, though the writer dissents in some points from that scholar's conclusions, especially with regard to the late date assigned to the origin of runic writing. An interesting foot-note deals with the etymology of the word book. The common theory that this word is cognate with beech Prof. Sievers dismisses as improbable, and suggests that the word, in its primary sense, "board" or "tablet," may be derived from a root (= Sanskrit bhaja) meaning "to divide, split." The part further contains the opening paragraphs of an article by W. Arndt on the use of the Roman alphabet in the Teutonic languages.

In the last number of Prof. Viëtor's Phonetische Studien (Marburg: Elwert) the most important contribution is a German translation, by Prof. Johann Storm, of his paper on "Romanic Quantity," which was published in Danish so long ago as 1876. Some of Prof. Storm's conclusions are likely to occasion controversy, but the paper well deserves careful study. Incidentally the writer discusses the nature of Latin accent and the structural principle of the Saturnian verse. Among the other contents of the number may be mentioned the conclusion of the late W. R. Evans's acute and careful (though not always convincing) criticism of Bell's theory of vowel-formation, an interesting article by H. Hoffmann on the use of phonetics in leading the deaf and dumb to speak, and a review by R. M'Lintock of Sweet's Elementarbuch des gesprochenen Englisch. Mr. M'Lintock does not claim any scientific knowledge of phonetics, and some of his strictures appear to be based on misconception; but we agree with him in thinking that the pronunciation indicated in Mr. Sweet's phonetic notation is much more "cockneyish" than that adopted by the majority of educated Englishmen, even in London itself.

Messrs. TRÜBNER & Co., the English publishers of Sprague's Handbook of Volapük, send us a Volapük Dictionary, by Dr. M. W. Wood, whose preface is dated from Fort Randall, Dakota. The book, which is the first work of the kind in English, is conveniently arranged, the compiler having adopted the ingenious plan of Bellows's French Dictionary. The vocabulary, we should think, is quite ample enough for all the purposes to which Volapük ought to be applied. In some cases the English words are used in senses now peculiar to America. The Volapük equivalent for pig, for instance, is given as "smasvin," though the English sense of the word would be represented by evin. As Dr. Wood states that the proofs have been carefully read by Col. Sprague, the general accuracy of the renderings may probably be relied upon.

M. DELAÏTRE has published a careful and interesting study on Les Travaux hydrauliques en Babylonie (Brussels), which originally appeared in the Revue des Questions Scientifiques of October 1888. He has given in it a very complete account of the references to the canals of Babylonia and Assyria given in classical writers and the cuneiform inscriptions, and has pointed out their importance and immense size. We must congratulate him on his identification of the Pallacopas, or rather (as it should be read) Pallakottas, with the Pallukat, a canal mentioned on a contract tablet as starting from the city of Sippara. Equally satisfactory is his argument that the Median wall of Xenophon must be distinguished from the so-called wall of Semiramis. It goes without saying that we have noted some disputable points in the brochure, such as his translation of the Assyrian word tappati, which should rather be read sippati "papyri"; but this is inevitable in archaeological and linguistic research. As a whole the brochure is an excellent example of historical investigation, and throws light on an important but neglected question of ancient Babylonian history.

FINE ART.

The Minor Poems of John Milton. Illustrated by Samuel Palmer. (Seeley.)

ALL concerned may well be praised for their share in this beautiful book, which is itself a book of praise. No more true and perfect honour has ever been done to the poetry of Milton than these long pondered and reverent designs of Samuel Palmer, and never has care been more successfully bestowed on the interpretation of an artist's work than in these beautiful and highly finished plates by his son. To Mr. A. H. Palmer has also been due the careful edition of the text. While to complete a panegyric which is not stronger than it is just, a word is also needed to both printer and publisher for the beauty of type and paper. The publisher, indeed, has gone so far out of the usual way of publishers as to decorate the cover with a design adapted by his own hand from one of Samuel Palmer's sketches—an English shepherd lad beneath an oak tree, pipe in hand, "warbling his native wood notes wild."

Like this lad in his smock frock the book throughout is essentially English—English in its poetry, English in its pictures, English in the long and loving care which has gone to its production. Although poetical art of an ideal kind is generally supposed to be the one thing in which English artists have not distinguished themselves, there is perhaps no other modern nation which has produced so much of a high excellence. It is not to be found abundantly in the places where it is generally sought—that is to say in picture galleries; but if we look between the leaves of books which have been illustrated by such men as Blake and Flaxman and Stothard, not to mention Turner or more modern artists, we shall find a body of design which for beauty and refinement of feeling is not to be equalled by any other country. Among these names that of Samuel Palmer must be enrolled. What his few etchings might have failed to accomplish by themselves, from lack of quantity rather than quality, these "illustrations" to Milton, together with those to Virgil, should secure past danger; and the labours of Mr. A. H. Palmer in the production of these volumes are a service to English art as well as a worthy memorial of his father.

It is not in the nature of things that designs like these of Samuel Palmer to Milton should be otherwise than rare, for they can only be executed by men of unusually delicate sensibility and fine imagination, deliberate in conception and fastidious in execution; and as their most spiritual work is never in great demand there is little to stimulate or quicken the natural slowness of its production. It appears only too probable from Mr. A. H. Palmer's history of the "Milton series" that it would never have been completed if it had not been for the unexpected encouragement of one solitary individual who desired to see something "which specially affected the artist's inner sympathies." As it happened Samuel Palmer's "inner sympathies" had been "specially affected" by Milton's poems for half a century, and the "series" of drawings which, with some others, form the "illustrations" of this volume were soon projected; but it took him till the end of his life—some eighteen years—to complete the last of them with those final touches which he compared to "the few last sunglows which give the fruits their sweetness."

In engraving this series of drawings Mr. A. H. Palmer was practically carrying into effect a cherished project of his father, who intended to etch them.

"The etching dream came over me in this way: I am making my working sketches a quarter of the size of the drawings, and was surprised and not displeased to notice the variety, the difference of each from all the rest. I saw within, a set of highly finished etchings, the size of Turner's Liber Studiorum, and as finished as my moonlight with the cypresses [an etching called "The Rising Moon," published by the Etching Club in 1857], a set making a book, a compact block of work which I would fain hope might live when I am with the fallen leaves."

Not as he intended, for he only etched two of the series. This "compact block of work," together with engravings of four other drawings, now lives in this volume, and will live as long as there is any interest in English art of its kind. And surely it would be taking an unnecessary despondent view of the future to forecast a time in which work such as this will find no sympathy. It is true that the tendencies of modern art appear to be in a different direction, to the complete divorce between literature and pictorial art, to art impressionist and thoughtless, to art sensuous and unintellectual. But we may happily remember that, though Palmer's art may now seem to some to be, like the spelling of Milton's time, here reproduced, "behind the age" (an age which Samuel Palmer was, he said, not very anxious to overtake), ages pass but intellect and poetry remain; and some men will always live who will love both in poetry and picture the suggestion of something more than meets the eye or the ear.

We want some word to describe the plates. "Illustration" is now, as Mr. A. H. Palmer says, "inevitable"; for it is almost the only term we have to describe the most poetical or the most prosaic form of engraved design, from outlines to Dante to the cuts in a catalogue. Yet the word, though "inevitable," might be used much less aptly than in connexion with these beautiful pictures. The class to which they belong is the highest class of illustration, for they are true instances of the imagination of the artist inspired by the imagination of the writer. Even this class has its unnamed divisions, too numerous to mention. Yet, perhaps, it may be safely asserted that all such designs may be separated under two heads: one in which the artist strives to realise as nearly as possible the writer's own conception, as Hablot Browne in his designs to Dickens; and the other in which the conception, though suggested by and more or less in sympathy with the writer, is nevertheless distinctly the artist's own—a birth or rebirth of his own imagination. To this latter division belong such "illustrations" as those of Blake to Blair's "Grave," or these of Samuel Palmer to Milton's minor poems. In this form of illustration one art is not the servant of the other, but may be compared rather to a sister or companion. Milton does not need Palmer, and Palmer can be enjoyed without Milton, though each may be better loved by recalling the other. There are probably many persons now alive who, though cultivated and "fond of art," like the Lord Mulgrave of whom we read in Haydon's memoirs, may yet, like him, fail to appreciate the muse of Milton, and many also who are out of sympathy with the art of Palmer; but there are not many who, loving the one, will despise the other. By long study and meditation Samuel Palmer was unusually well qualified for the task which solaced the last years of his life, and required all the resources of imagery and suggestion which he had hoarded, all the "visions of chivalry and romance, and of a transcendent earth," which continually haunted him. He had already lit his torch at the same fire as Milton, and learnt to breathe the same fine air. The spirit of his work is anachronistic in the same way and in the same degree as that of Milton, whose "L'Allegro" with its pure and healthy mirth, whose "Penseroso" with its solemn and noble melancholy, could never have been born in these days when joy (at least in literature) requires a higher seasoning, and melancholy oscillates between the maudlin and the violent. I will not forestall the pleasure of those who have never seen these lovely "illustrations" by attempting to describe them. Ten out of the twelve will be quite new to those who do not know the original drawings. They are all of Samuel Palmer's best, the very flower of his genius, the last and finest fruit of the old tree. Their variety is great within the artist's well-known limits of style. We have the glen-like loveliness and romantic witchery of the scenes from "Comus," the richly wooded luxuriance of England, the fresh life of its mornings, the hallowed hush of its eves, the solemnity of its nights, with moon and stars kerchiefed in comely clouds. Perhaps the finest of all is the noble design of "The Eastern Gate," with its radiant sky overlaid with lawn-like films and broken with fantastic spires of cloud. Over all the designs reigns that rare quality of rest due to the exquisite harmony and finish of the parts executed under the command of a noble idea. They have one and all "the consecration and the poet's dream," and something even, it may be said with reverence, of that peace which passeth understanding.

Now that I am about to speak of Mr. A. H. Palmer's plates, I am reminded that it is not only with regard to the word "illustration" that the poverty of the English vocabulary restricts the resources of the writer on art. I have already used the word "engravings" to describe them; and this, on the whole, is the justest word, although they are not wholly engravings nor etchings. Neither are they wholly photogravures; but they are the result of one of those mixtures of handwork and photography which are now producing "plates" of such puzzling properties and unequal merits. In these plates of Mr. A. H. Palmer there is, however, no confusion as to the result. They, whatever may have been the history of their manufacture, are as perfect reproductions of the original drawings as is possible. Science and art have combined in their production; but the triumph is rather one of patience and affection. Anyone who is acquainted with photography and Samuel Palmer's water-colours must see at once how little the one was able to reproduce the other without help from handwork. Even the new process by which to a certain extent the effect of colour is neutralised could not unaided translate his rich yellows and purples into perfect tone. The result is a more satisfactory record of the painted series than could have been effected by the etching needle of the artist himself. Some sharpness may be lost, but the gradations are more subtle, the suffusion of light more even. What they have lost in glitter they have gained in glow; and, moreover, much of the "painter" quality has been preserved, something of touch and wash, and a fuller suggestion of colour.

COSMO MONKHOUSE.

THE CYPRUS EXPLORATION FUND.

THE work of archaeological exploration in Cyprus has now been carried on for two seasons. The important results obtained have been described in the reports presented by the committee to the subscribers; and a detailed and scientific account of the sites excavated and the monuments discovered in the course of the first season has been published in the Journal of Hellenic Studies. The antiquities hence obtained have been distributed between the British Museum, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and various public schools and other institutions, including the following: Eton, Harrow, Winchester, Rugby, Charterhouse, Westminster, Marlborough, Clifton. The committee desire to continue the work thus successfully begun; and they have decided, subject to the approval of the government, that a thorough exploration of the site of the ancient Salamis shall be undertaken during the next season. The High Commissioner of Cyprus, Sir Henry Bulwer, to whose support and kindness the committee have from the beginning of their work been especially indebted, has expressed a strong opinion in favour of their next operations being undertaken at this site. The committee hope that Mr. J. A. R. Munro, Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, may find it possible to place his valuable services at their disposal; and that some others of those who have already taken part in the excavations may be able to assist in the operations of next season.

The following considerations have determined the committee in their choice of a site. Salamis was beyond question by far the largest and most important city in Cyprus; for, if the many references of ancient authors were not sufficient, the great extent of ruin still existing would attest this fact. The legend which ascribes its foundation to Teucer, who crossed from Asia Minor to the Carpass, is constant; and we have certain evidence that in the eighth century B.C. it was a royal city, and that from this period until the end of the fourth century it ruled over a tract of country far more extensive and fertile than that possessed by any other town; indeed, at one period its dominion reached even to Tamassus and the Troodos range. At no time does it appear to have been Phœnician; whereas, as is well known, it obtained a very markedly Hellenic character under the influence of Evagoras, and from that period until late Byzantine times was the centre of civilisation in the island. Its great shrine of Zeus was accounted of equal splendour with that of Aphrodite at Paphos, and the site of this temple it should be the aim of the explorers to find. In political and commercial importance Salamis ranked far above all Cyprian cities.

From the excavator's point of view the site is promising—more so, possibly, than any other in the island. The villagers of Agios Sergios, Limnia, and Enkomi find upon the site, and in the tombs about the monastery of St. Barnabas, more coins, gems, and miscellaneous treasure-trove than is gathered from all the rest of the island; and Alexander di Cesnola, when his excavations were stopped by the British government in the first year of the occupation, was finding a large number of unripped tombs, extending inland from the city, and containing very fine specimens of western and native art. Large numbers of such tombs remain still unopened; indeed, no systematic excavation of them has ever been attempted.

The site of the city has been silted up very rapidly and deeply by the deposits of the Pedieus river and by drifting sand. It is, therefore, very probable that, under the late debris which now encombres the surface, successive layers may be found, and even the earliest city of Teucer reached. The deeper the covering the more hope for the digger. Vast as the site is, there are three spots at least where an excavation might be begun at once, and where there is reason to believe that good results would follow; and the fact that almost the whole is government land would enable the excavators to run exploratory trenches here and there with a freedom which is impossible where a number of small owners possess a site.

As compared with previous years, it may be safely said that excavation at Salamis is a larger and more serious undertaking than at Paphos or Arsinoë; and if it is (as it should be) supplemented by a little exploration in the strange district of the Carpass, it may yield results more important than those obtained in both the previous seasons put together. Many excavators have desired to uncover Salamis, and been deterred by considerations of time and expense; and therefore, except for one or two small undertakings in recent years, the site is virgin, and its thorough exploration would be worthy to be compared with the great enterprises of foreign archaeologists.

Most of the money in the hands of the committee has now been spent; and, in order that they may be able to undertake the excavation of Salamis, it is necessary for them to appeal for further subscriptions. It is evident that the thorough exploration of the site will be a work of considerable magnitude; and the committee consider that it should not be begun unless they have at their disposal a sum not less than £1000. With regard to the distribution of any objects which may be found, the committee will act upon the principles set forth in their former appeal. The British Museum will be regarded as having the right to a first choice among them; and, in apportioning the remainder, care will be taken to satisfy the legitimate claims of Oxford and Cambridge, according to the amount which may be contributed to the fund on behalf of either university.

Subscriptions to the fund are invited, and may be sent either direct to the treasurer (Mr. Walter Leaf), at Old Change, London, E.C., or to the account of the Cyprus Exploration Fund, at Messrs. Roberts, Lubbock and Co., Lombard Street, E.C.

Chairman of the Committee of the Cyprus Exploration Fund.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

A TUDOR Exhibition, of which the Queen has consented to be patron, and the Prince of Wales vice-patron, will be held at the New Gallery, during the months of January to April of next year. The exhibition will comprise pictures, miniatures, arms, armour, plate, embroideries, carvings, books, MSS., &c., of the time from Henry VII. to Elizabeth. The pictures will include the portraits of eminent men and women of the Tudor period, as well as those of the reigning sovereigns. The Hon. Harold Dillon has undertaken the duties of secretary.

MR. G. DURAND, of the Graphic, has received a commission from the Queen to paint a picture of the wedding of the Princess Louise of Wales and the Duke of Fife; and Mr. Sydney Hall will execute an important work in oils of the same ceremony for the Prince of Wales.

ON Thursday next, August 8, and the three following days, Messrs. Sotheby will sell a large number of engravings, etchings, &c., from various collections. There are included some early states from Turner's Liber Studiorum; a choice series of the work of William Woollett; and five portfolios of historical and political caricatures, from 1740 to 1850, numbering about 1400 pieces.

THE forty-sixth annual congress of the British Archaeological Association was held this week at Lincoln, under the presidency of the Earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham.

MR. MARTIN COLNAGHI has now on view, at the Marlborough Gallery, Pall Mall, a collection of modern pictures of various foreign schools, including examples of Prof. Müller, Joanovitz, Prof. Holmberg, and Domingo. There is also to be seen Sir Edwin Landseer's picture of the terrier "Jocko," which has been engraved by Mr. T. L. Atkinson.

PROF. S. STANHOPE ORRIS, of Princeton, has been appointed annual director of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens for the year 1889-90; but his office is subordinate to that of the permanent director, Dr. Charles Waldstein, who has obtained leave from Cambridge to spend the greater part of the winter in Greece.

IN the last number of the Deutsche Literaturzeitung, Prof. Hübner reviews Mr. Earwaker's Roman Remains found at Chester. When speaking of the age of the walls, he makes the same conjecture that Mr. Haverfield made in his review (ACADEMY, June 22), namely, that the masonry dates from the time of Septimius Severus.

THE STAGE.

"THE HEADLESS MAN" AND "THE CAT'S-PAW."

"THE HEADLESS MAN"—brought out at the Criterion last Saturday—would probably never have been produced at this season at all had it not been desirable to secure English criticism before performance in America. And though Mr. Charles Wyndham will not rely in chief upon "The Headless Man" for his American playbill, the new piece will unquestionably form a feature in his programme for the States. If it must be said, on the one hand, that a main object of the piece appears to have been to provide Mr. Wyndham with a characteristic part, it must be remembered, on the other, that the part is of the kind with which his name a few years since was habitually associated, and that it has nothing in common with the rôles which have been more recently assumed by a comedian who is rightly determined to be taken very seriously. Mr. Wyndham's part in "The Headless Man" is of the old-fashioned rollicking sort. He plays a gentleman whose circumstances, both private and professional, are inextricably confused—a solicitor who believes that, in his life and in his office, order reigns, if he does but docket his letters or make a memorandum on his shirt cuff—a solicitor who considers that his duties to his clients are admirably fulfilled at no cost to himself of effort or of skill. And Mr. Wyndham's gifts of temperament and his acquired talents enable him to make us believe, or very nearly believe, in the existence of this person in modern life. It has been well enough suggested—but the suggestion is as true of half the farcical comedy that was ever written as it is of "The Headless Man"—that "the confusion would be more amusing if it were less confounded." Perhaps, too, "The Headless Man" is not, in its dialogue, a thing of ideal wit; but it is entertaining, and the basis of its satire has undoubtedly been found in some observation of life. Mr. Wyndham rattles on effectively from start to finish, showing alike the character's noisy self-satisfaction and his luckless distresses. The ladies' parts are not strong; and among the men who support Mr. Wyndham—though Mr. Blakeley is good—no one perhaps is quite as effective as Mr. George Giddens, who, indeed, is well provided for by the author, and who makes the most of every opportunity he gets.

Miss Muriel Wylford—a young actress who has yet a good deal to learn, but who is already pleasantly distinguished by naturalness as well as by refinement—gave a matinée at Terry's Theatre a week ago and produced "The Cat's-paw," by Mr. John Tresahor. I went to the performance because I remembered that Miss Wylford had been admirable in the part of young Mrs. Errol in "The Real Little Lord Fauntleroy" upon its country tour last year; so good, indeed, that she came fairly into competition with a mistress of quiet pathos—Miss Mary Rorke. "The Cat's-paw" is truly not a drama which has any further recommendation than that it is supposed to be "stirring," and that it affords to the chief actress a part of overwhelming importance. In effect it is almost a one-part piece, and this is apt to be especially and disagreeably perceptible wherever there is a plentiful lack of literary charm. The material of "The Cat's-paw" has done duty many times, and the language is somewhat stilted. Mr. Laurence Cautley, however, was by no means bad in the piece. Mr. Conway, who, though he is not subtle, is manly—even to his fashion of taking off a great coat, or putting it on—lent useful assistance. And Miss Muriel Wylford proved to us, quite as much by her qualities as by her deficiencies, that melodrama is not a field of art in which she is destined to shine. The comedy that is founded on observation of life, or the drama that is essentially pathetic and poetic, are those fields of art to which unquestionably she should betake herself if she wishes to make the best use of a pleasant, I may even say a remarkable, individuality.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

STAGE NOTES.

Mrs. SARAH BERNHARDT's performances at the Lyceum conclude next week.

WE hear that Mr. Pinero is engaged upon a new play for Mr. Hare, which is to follow "Tosca" at the Garrick Theatre.

MR. CHARLES WYNDHAM and Miss Mary Moore take their farewell of the London public on Wednesday next, previous to their American tour.

"In Danger," by Mr. Cresswell and Mr. Lestocq was produced at the Vaudeville on Monday evening. It is well cast and mounted, and was favourably received. Mr. Lewis Waller gives a clever performance as the hero. Miss Florence West acts with some power, and is much applauded. Mr. Macklin's part is scarcely worthy of him. Mr. Julian Cross, as a pronounced villain, figures only in the first act. Some comedy lines are allotted to Mr. Sidney Brough, who—like the ballet girls in the famous letter to Mr. Winterbotham—"knows how to deal with them." Miss Agnes Miller is sympathetic as the heroine's sister. "In Danger" is of its kind quite a strong play. It is expected to suffice for the wants of the Vaudeville Theatre until the return of Mr. Thorne and the Vaudeville company in November.

MUSIC.

MUSIC BOOKS.

Chopin, and other Musical Essays. By Henry T. Finck. (Fisher Unwin.) The author of Romantic Love and Personal Beauty is an intense admirer of Chopin, and in this he is by no means singular. There are many, too, who will agree with him when he asserts that the Polish composer's music was underrated by his contemporaries, Schumann and Liszt excepted. But it is one thing to acknowledge his genius, and another "to place him in the front rank of composers, side by side with Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner." There is nothing in common between Chopin and these three giants to enable one to institute direct comparison. He wrote no fugues, no music-dramas; and surely his pianoforte sonatas will not place him by the side of Beethoven. It is just on this sonata question that Mr. Finck seems to show how untenable is the position he seeks to maintain. He has not the courage to assert that either the B flat minor or the B minor Sonata of Chopin is on a par with any written by Beethoven, so he seeks to prove that the sonata-form was unworthy of Chopin's genius. "Too much thematic beating out," he says, "is the bane of the sonata." And again: "A few bars of gold are worth more than many square yards of gold leaf; and Chopin's bars are solid gold." The first sentence will scarcely bear investigation, and if the second means that Beethoven is to Chopin as gold-leaf to gold, Mr. Finck will horrify many, even as—according to his own confession—he horrified Mr. Otto Singer, a distinguished Cincinnati musician, when he declared in the Nation that "Chopin is as distinctly superior to all other piano composers as Wagner to all other opera composers."

It is pleasant to turn from this attempt to place Chopin among the gods of Olympus to the next essay "How Composers Work." In speaking of operas he notes the stimulating effect of a "really poetic and dramatic text" on a composer; and the way in which Gluck, Mozart, Weber, and others looked after their librettists shows how much truth is contained in this statement. The "magic influence of love" is next named; and with Weber, Schumann, and Berlioz especially, our author has little difficulty in proving his point. Then comes "the beauty of nature," to which so many composers owe inspiration.

The third essay is on "Schumann, as mirrored in his Letters." Of course, with such fascinating material, the reading is light and pleasant; but there is nothing in it which calls for special comment.

"Music and Morals" is the not altogether original title of the following essay. Mr. Finck first notices the marvellous powers ascribed to music by the nations of antiquity. One ought not, however, to lay too much stress on the tales related by poets, or even by historians. Men are credulous, and prone to exaggeration; and, besides, "music" in the early ages, as our author indeed admits, was a very comprehensive term. He is surprised that any one can flatly deny the moral potency of music. But the statements and arguments brought forward by Mr. Finck in favour of this "moral potency" seem to us to show how difficult it is either to assert or deny that music affects morals. By "affecting morals" we understand our author to mean that music has a good influence over men. But all he really shows is that music, as every one admits, excites the emotions; and again, that some very good men were exceedingly fond of music. He gives no example of a bad man becoming good under its influence. It would, perhaps, be unfair to accept the author's statement, that "the irresistible power of Wagner's music changed the whole current of his life," in that light.

The essay, "Italian and German Vocal Styles," is one of great interest. Mr. Finck is an intense admirer of Wagner, yet he can do justice to Italian composers and Italian singers. The old-fashioned, merely sensuous, music cannot cope with modern dramatic music. Simple charm of melody, or beauty of tone and agility of execution in singing are now appreciated less than emotional expression and dramatic characterisation. To Glück, Weber, Schubert, and Wagner we owe especially this change.

"When," says Mr. Finck, "will American girls cease flocking by the hundreds to Milan to learn such rôles as Lucia and Amina, for which there is now no demand either in Europe or America, if we except the Wild Western audiences to which Emma Abbott caters?"

It is pleasing to find justice done to Schubert as one who "restored the voice to its true sphere as the wedded wife of poetry." Schumann, Brahms, and other composers did quite as much; but Schubert led the way. Mr. Finck does well to answer the oft-repeated assertion that Wagner assigned the voice a secondary place in his works because he cared less for it than for the orchestra, and did not understand its nature and uses, by pointing to Wagner's essays, "Schnorr von Carolsfeld" and "Actors and Vocalists," which show "unbounded admiration for the voice, and practical knowledge of its highest functions and correct use."

The last essay in the volume is entitled "German Opera in New York." The great success of German opera in that city during the past five years is a notable fact. "Fidelio," "Euryanthe," "Tannhäuser," and "Lohengrin," which for years had to fight for every inch of ground, are now masters of the situation, and gaining in popularity every year. And, adds Mr. Finck, "There is therefore no hope for the Italianissimi who sigh for their macaroni arias and their 'Ernani' or 'Gazza Ladra' soup."

LITERATURE.

Natural Religion. By F. Max Müller. (Longmans.)

THE late Lord Gifford bequeathed a considerable sum of money to endow a chair in each of the Scottish universities for the teaching of what he called natural theology. This he defined as

"the knowledge of God, the Infinite, the All, the First and Only Cause, the One and the Sole Substance, the Sole Being, the Sole Reality, and the Sole Existence, the Knowledge of His Nature and Attributes, the Knowledge of the Relations which men and the whole universe bear to Him, the Knowledge of the Nature and Foundation of Ethics and Morals, and of all Obligations and Duties hence arising" (pp. 5 sq.).

He desired that the lecturers appointed under his will should not be trammelled by theological tests or restrictions of any kind. They might, if otherwise well-qualified to fill the post, be of any religion or of no religion at all. When the chair attached to Glasgow University came to be filled for the first time Prof. Max Müller, though not a candidate, was elected to the office by a unanimous vote of the senate. The great Sanskrit scholar, whose engagements had at first made him unwilling to undertake this new and arduous duty, bowed to a decision which, as he expresses it, gave him "a splendid opportunity for summing up the whole work of" his "life" (p. 16). The course of lectures delivered last year, and now published, is to be followed by a second series; but all, or nearly all, the eminent author's characteristic opinions, together with some of the anecdotes by which he is wont to illustrate them, will be found restated in the present volume. The original matter consists principally of replies to criticisms somewhat more petulant, and autobiographical details somewhat more profuse, than in the learned lecturer's previous works. Some reverend and some irreverent persons may even find cause to complain that there is a good deal more in these pages about Prof. Max Müller than there is about God.

In fact, the name of God, which still figures in Lord Gifford's definition of natural theology, is excluded from the Gifford lecturer's definition of religion. It consists, we are told, "in the perception of the infinite under such manifestations as are able to influence the moral character of man" (p. 188). Prof. Max Müller appears throughout as the champion of religion, and frequently refers with severity to the notorious declaration of Gruppe that religious belief is and always has been essentially irrational. But whatever we may think of Gruppe's opinion in itself, as a criticism of what his opponent calls religion it would be perfectly valid. To begin with, there can be no perception of the infinite; for who could perceive boundlessness in the abstract? In the next place, we do not perceive any particular thing as infinite, for this would be contrary to the very conditions of perception itself. The lecturer admits this difficulty, but meets it by contending that the finite object of perception always implies a something beyond which is infinite. Now, granting thus much, it must still be observed that the something beyond is not perceived as unlimited, but rather as limited by the something here. Nor is this all. In two instances only do the "here" and the "beyond" taken together constitute a true infinite, that is in our perceptions of space and time; and there the infinite is not perceived but inferred. To these two the lecturer adds a third—causality; but the infinite regress of causes, so far from being a necessity of perception, is not even a necessity of thought, or it would not be denied by nearly every believer in a personal creator of the world, and in one particular series of events—that is our own moral actions—by every believer in free-will. Everything contained in space and time—in other words, every mode of existence—may be conceived as extending only to a certain point with nothing beyond it but the mere empty possibility of coexistence or succession. To help himself out of this difficulty the lecturer smuggles in an entirely different notion—that of the unknown, which he identifies with the infinite or the beyond (p. 139). But, in order to utilise this other notion, he must give up whatever aid was afforded by the analogy of space and time; for in affirming their infinity we imply that our knowledge of them is absolutely perfect, which, as the Professor must be well aware, was the reason why Kant argued that they are mere subjective forms, not real existences at all. But let us pass over all this, let us drop infinity, and content ourselves with the unknown, adhering strictly to what the name implies. We shall then find ourselves confronted by an insurmountable contradiction. There cannot be any such manifestations of the unknown as the lecturer's definition implies, since that which manifests itself is, ex vi termini, something known. The truth is that, while the unexplored regions of existence have always been assigned as a theatre to the persons, objects, and events with which religious beliefs are concerned, those persons, objects, and events have themselves been no more manifestations of the infinite or the unknown or the beyond—whichever expression be preferred—than the monsters formerly placed by geographers in the deserts of Africa were manifestations of the unexplored. It was indeed about what some would call the truths of religion, and others the figments of mythology, that the fullest knowledge was supposed to be possessed; and the few expressions of ignorance or uncertainty that have occasionally fallen from the lips of believers are wholly inadequate to prove the contrary.

Prof. Max Müller's notion of religion is, in truth, a hybrid offspring of modern theology and modern agnosticism; and the latent contradiction that he reads into the supernaturalist beliefs of mankind in general becomes overt in what is allowed to transpire of his own particular creed. We are told that the Historical School (to which he belongs) sees in the predicate of God thought, beginning with the vague consciousness of something invisible, unknown, and unlimited, which gradually assumes a more and more definite shape through similes, names, myths, and legends, till at last it is divested again of all names, and lives within us as the invisible, inconceivable, unnameable, the infinite God" (p. 219).

"There remained in the end the concept of a Supreme Being, still called, it may be, by its ancient and often no longer intelligible names, but representing in reality the highest ideal of the Infinite, as a father, or as a creator, or as a loving ruler of the universe" (p. 574).

How can that which is unnameable be named the infinite God? How can that which is infinite be defined as a father, or a creator, or a loving ruler of the universe? This is not the sort of light "which alone can dispel the darkness of doubt and fear that has come over the world." If this is "Natural Religion," then it is not "what our age wants more than anything else" (p. 571). What our age wants is lucidity; of logical contradictions it has swallowed enough and to spare.

A minor objection to the lecturer's definition is that it is too wide, that, for example, it would embrace the philosophy of Spinoza, or even the philosophy of Epicurus. Here Gruppe's definition, involving as it does a large social element (p. 77), seems to possess a decided advantage over that of his critic. But, of course, if we are to call by the name of religion "anything that lifts man above the realities of this material life" (p. 568), there is an end to all exact thinking on the subject.

According to Prof. Max Müller, the perception of the infinite, considered as a cause of religious beliefs eventually to be associated with morality, was developed along three distinct lines. The infinite behind nature was conceived under the form of divine beings by whom the physical objects about us were supposed to be animated or created. The infinite behind man as an object gave rise to a belief in the immortality of the soul and to ancestor-worship. The infinite behind man as a subject or self-conscious personality found, and still finds, expression in the belief that our various mental activities exist independently as so many separate entities under the name of imagination, reason, conscience, and the like. It seems somewhat paradoxical to assume that a perception of the unlimited led to the erection of arbitrary demarcations between one supposed faculty and another. The three lines of religious speculation find their ultimate outcome in the Christian Trinity—a curious survival of that German method of philosophising, now obsolete in Germany itself, which Schopenhauer aptly described as a commentary on the catechism.

The important question how these various forms of mythology came to be linked with morality as the sources or sanctions of its laws is very unsatisfactorily treated by the lecturer. No explanation is offered of the fact that nature-deities, in their origin essentially unmoral, were afterwards supposed to approve of good, and to disapprove of bad conduct. It is assumed without any proof that the belief in ancestral spirits necessarily made for righteousness. And as to what is called the "moral influence of psychological deities" (p. 176), the lecturer will hardly maintain that the influence of men's moral impulses on their conduct has ever been strengthened by the illusion that those impulses were the dictates of an independent entity named conscience. To look on conscience as the voice of God may indeed greatly enhance its authority; but this sort of mythology belongs to the first, not to the third, variety of natural religion. While on the subject of conscience, it may be as well to mention that Prof. Max Müller is entirely mistaken when he says that "Socrates did not use the word συνείδησις, but when he spoke of the δαίμων, the spirit within him, he meant the same thing" (p. 178). This is a question on which nobody has any business to dogmatise who is ignorant of Prof. Zeller's arguments against the identification of the Socratic monitor with conscience; for it is not credible that a writer who dwells so strongly on the deference due to experts (p. 511) should wilfully ignore what is taught by the greatest living expert in Greek philosophy.

The history of philosophy is not indeed a strong point with the illustrious philologist whom I have the honour to review. He twice refers to the De Mundo as a genuine work of Aristotle's (pp. 30 and 72); and on the second occasion he does it for the purpose of crediting Aristotle with the opinion, nowhere to be found in his genuine writings, that all things are full of gods. Again, the lecturer goes out of his way to tell us that "Darwin, if he had been better acquainted with the history of philosophy during the last century, ought to have known" that the theory of evolution was worked out in so comprehensive a spirit and in so much detail by Herder as to entitle him to the appellation of "the Darwin of the eighteenth century" (p. 261). Had Darwin read Herder and lived to read this book, he would probably have seen at a glance that his critic has completely missed the difference between the views of that divine and the modern theory of evolution. For neither in the passages here quoted, nor, I am confident, in any that can be quoted from the Ideen, does Herder hint at the transformation of one organic species into another. What Herder does teach is the now exploded doctrine, derived immediately from Leibnitz and, more remotely, from Aristotle, that the various species of minerals, plants, and animals form a contemporaneous series ascending through successive grades of perfection terminating in man as at once the crown and epitome of the whole. Equally unfounded is the somewhat supercilious assumption that the idea of evolution was at the time when Darwin's great work first appeared more familiar to the German than to the English mind (p. 257). To judge by the declarations of two highly qualified witnesses—Haeckel and Strauss—the effect produced in Germany by the new theory was even more startling than in England, where the ground had been thoroughly prepared by Lyell, Mill, Grove, and other well-known writers. Errors like these, taken together with such statements as that "blushes are only the effect of the quicker movement of the heart" (p. 181), and that a man may "learn to control the beating of his heart" (p. 179), suggest that the lecturer had better let biology alone for the present.

Prof. Max Müller is on much more familiar ground when he proceeds to explain by linguistic considerations the primitive tendency to seek for a mind in or behind nature—to represent physical phenomena as the acts of conscious beings like ourselves. According to his theory, not now expounded for the first time, all language springs from roots originally designating various modes of human activity. When the use of these signs became so extended as to embrace objects external to man, they carried with them the suggestion of a conscious action similarly exercised by those objects; after which step the development of a more or less luxuriant mythology was merely a matter of time. This enquiry gives the lecturer a welcome opportunity for re-opening the much debated question as to how language first originated. One is prepared for a repetition of the old gibes, at what he is pleased to call the "bow-wow" and "pooh-pooh" theories; but it is surprising to find the "yo-heho" theory innocently alluded to as a recent creation of "some philosophers" from whom the author is anxious to dissociate himself and his friend Ludwig Noiré (p. 362). Oddly enough it figures a few pages further on as an "old theory" (p. 373). Anyhow, according to it,

"language would have been derived directly from the cries uttered by people while engaged in pulling, rubbing, digging, rowing, and similar primitive occupations" (p. 362); whereas, "if, as we know, people in a primitive state accompany most of their common acts by sounds, then the clamor concomitans of those acts is not the sign of a single act, but the inseparable accompaniment of our consciousness of our many repeated acts as one action" (p. 374).

The lecturer proposes to call this explanation the synergistic theory, which no doubt sounds finer than the "yo-heho" theory, just as hylatomimetic or some such name would sound finer than "bow-wow." It might be asked how before the invention of language men could any more than animals arrive at the consciousness of many repeated acts as one action. But, at any rate, until it can be shown that sailors when hauling ropes do not possess such an integrating consciousness of their actions, it seems probable that their clamor concomitans of "yo-heho" will continue to pass current as the popular name for Ludwig Noiré's theory.

The present volume, like all the learned author's works, is charmingly written and replete with interesting information. Whether his lectures, so far as they have gone, will fulfil the purpose of Lord Gifford's bequest by promoting "the diffusion of sound views respecting" the knowledge of God "among the whole population of Scotland" may well be doubted by all who believe that such knowledge is actually attainable. But they will probably contribute towards the diffusion of something perhaps equally important, which is the toleration of other people's views on the subject. Speaking for myself, I can draw no other conclusion from the principles laid down by the Glasgow Gifford lecturer than that Natural Religion means agnosticism plus a congeries of discordant superstitions.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Verse Musings on Nature, Faith, and Freedom.
By John Owen. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

No writer demands less of his readers in proportion to what he has to give them than Mr. Owen in prose. He has something else to give them in verse; but what he has to give costs more to enjoy. His rhymes often suggest a corrupt following of Mrs. Browning, and his subjects are not always obviously happy. "The Thinker to his Headache" is trying by itself; and, if we turn five pages, we come to "The Earnest Truth-Seeker to his Brain." Perhaps we might stand one poem to the cat Muff, whom the cat-loving poet thought as sensible as a Christian, if there was not a second "Epitaph on Muff," describing the effects of cancer, which made it necessary to shoot him. Then there is a good deal that, without being provoking, is rather trivial. There are two poems on George Eliot which contain nothing which has not often been said in prose. There is a poem on Giordano Bruno's fête, versifying the ordinary cheap rhetoric of which too much has been spent on a clever, wrong-headed man, who benefited nobody by his grotesque anticipations of Spinoza and Schelling. The section headed "Narrative and Legendary Verse" contains hardly any narrative or legend. The best is in Devonshire dialect about a woman who knew she was dying, and cleaned up the house ready for "Her Berrin." The next best, on the self-sacrifice of Dr. Rabbeth, would have been better if it had not been written up to the second title, "The Religion of Science," which would have been much more appropriate to the legend of how Queen Eleanor saved her husband without sacrificing herself. If Dr. Rabbeth had been a little more skilful he might have saved his patient without costly or memorable heroism. A good many poems suggest comparisons which they do not sustain. "A Cloud Invocation" reminds us of Shelley; an "Ode to Nemesis" of Gray and Wordsworth. "The Nightingale and the Frog" is avowedly founded on a saying of P. Garasse, quoted by Pascal, and the comment adds nothing to the text; but, if Mr. Owen had invented the idea, he would have had a right to play with it. Again, Euripides says somewhere that the gods never let us know what is coming next, in order that we may revere them. This suggests not an epigram on the distance between agnosticism and atheism, but a song of Euripidean deities—as if the thought was too pleasant to be let go in a hurry.

And no doubt pretty conceits are more enjoyable when we take the time to play with them. And Mr. Owen's conceits are often pretty. The contrast between the new fallen snow and the old serves for an allegory of the intolerance of the young for the old. The snow and the rime symbolise the false idealism which buries its subject and the true idealism which illustrates it. A spider starving in an admirably spun web too high up to catch any flies is a warning to metaphysicians. A tree dreams of another world as it sees the grass and other trees reflected in a pool, and wonders whether a tree that has fallen into the pool knows the secrets of the future. The drooping snowdrop turned to mother earth is a figure of innocent sentimental souls regretting their unembodied state. Plotinus's speculations on this state, and the delight of returning to it suggests two or three poems worth reading, even after Wordworth's "Intimations of Immortality."

Now and then, again, we come upon something that is positively luminous, like the comparison of the illusion of the blue firmament, which hides the starry depths, to definitions of God, or the identification of heaven's silent tent with the tabernacle where He hides the chosen from the strife of tongues. It is a real contribution to the controversy on immortality to enquire how many would desire to live this life over again. The enquiry suggests that a future life might be a greater boon if it were not a conscious continuation of this. Again, in "Life and Love," the dictum—

" 'Tis better to have loved and lost Then never to have loved at all "— is dissected with a good deal of imaginative acuteness. "Dogma Method" is founded on a passage in the Koran where Mahomet was bidden to silence those who doubted the resurrection by swearing to it. Did the writer remember Newman's lines on the apostles—

"They argued not but preached and conscience did the rest"?

The contrast is suggestive; so is the contention in the poem, "What is Faith?", that faith and dogma exclude each other; that when we know, or think we know, enough to dogmatise there is no room for faith. This agrees with the doctrine of the fine poem "Pan is not Dead"—that we shall always feel and be stirred by the presence of the inexplicable and indefinable.

Perhaps enough has been said to show that readers who can fall in with Mr. Owen's moods will not lose their time by musing with him. Extracts do not do justice to a writer who does not carry his readers away at once; but the following stanzas from the "Wings of Hope" may give some idea of his method:

"In life's blithe spring, when Hope was young,
The child was wanton and laughed and sung,
His wings untried were his boyish pride
As he fondly eyed where they gracefully sprung.

So after due trial he purposed to fly.
He shook his wings, spread them, and mounted high.

So easy their flight, as his form was light,
He was soon out of sight in the clear blue sky.

But no less speedy was Hope's descent:
He could not soar to the height he meant,
So stagnant the air, so chill and raw,
Not all he could dare could achieve his intent.

Foiled and dismayed Hope fell to the ground,
Though his airy frame no great injury found;
Nor his earthward rush, though it made him bluish,
Could his buoyancy crush or prevent his rebound.

With lengthening life Hope older grew,
His wings remained buoyant but ceased to be new;
Yet his instincts retained their old ardour and gained O'er his strength that remained goodly triumphs not few.

But lesser and less were the ascents he essayed;
His wings became quilly and draggled and frayed;
Now also his flight was no longer light.
But of such drawbacks, spite new efforts he made;

At last, by mournful experience taught,
For loftiest aims more rarely he sought,
His ascents became all more airily small,
And whence a chance fall would signify naught.

Last of all, in late age Hope sadly furled
Worn wings that to earth had so oft been hurled;
But even now Hope, seeking loftier scope,
New wings seeks to open in a future world."

G. A. SIMCOX.

"TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN."—Henry the Seventh. By James Gairdner. (Macmillan.)

THE Bishop of Oxford, in the first of his two lectures on the reign of Henry VII., stated it as an unquestionable fact that this period was peculiarly dull, in spite both of the striking characteristics of the age and the element of romance presented by the changes and chances of Henry's early career. But we venture to assert that Mr. Gairdner has triumphed over his initial difficulty; and that no one who takes up his book will experience any weariness in the perusal, or reach the last page with anything but regret. It is an excellent account of the king and of his reign, written throughout in the fulness of knowledge, but with such perfect control of detail that the reader is never wearied or confused by the wealth of material.

Perhaps, however, some might at first sight think that this volume rather belied its character as a portrait of an English statesman; for, after a sketch of Henry's early life and struggle for the crown, Mr. Gairdner gives us what is undoubtedly rather a narrative of the reign than a disquisition on the policy of the king. Thus his chapters are headed: "Settlement in the Kingdom," "War with France," "Ireland," "Domestic History," and so forth. But, so far as this is true, it is no disadvantage, and the king is never lost sight of; for, indeed, Henry VII. is not a monarch who can be detached from the actual history of his time, and treated as a mere personality. Like all the Tudors, he was always his own minister, governing and not merely reigning; and we could not hope to form any adequate conception of the man except through the study of his reign.

Possibly some critics, while admitting the importance of this period as an epoch in the history of our country, would be inclined to cavil at the inclusion of Henry in a list of Twelve English Statesmen; certainly, Henry VII. does not strike us in the same way as does Edward I., or as do his own son and granddaughter. Much of this feeling, however, probably proceeds from the absence of anything to attract our fancy in the person of a king who was cool, calculating, reserved; who, perhaps, effected more by taking advantage of the impolitic action of others than by any independent performance of his own. Whatever the reason, Henry VII. has failed to live in the popular imagination more completely, perhaps, than has any other of the statesmen included in this series. But, even if Mr. Gairdner cannot present him to us as a hero, it is impossible not to feel that there is much justice in the favourable view which he takes of him both as a statesman and a man.

The part which Henry had to play was full of difficulties. There was, perhaps, never a more critical moment in the history not only of England, but also of Europe. In England, indeed, the people were weary of the long dynastic struggle, and wished only for a stable government; but the elements of discord were not so easily to be quieted down, and a less cautious monarch might have thought it skilful policy to divert them into some course of foreign aggression, for which the complications of European politics appeared to afford a favourable opportunity. So did not Henry, who perceived that the circumstances of the times were changed; and that it was no longer possible nor prudent, even if it once had been so, for England to aim at continental aggrandisement. Like his son, and his granddaughter after him, he made it the consistent endeavour of his foreign policy to keep England in independence of any other prince or potentate. It is not difficult to trace in the reign of Henry VII. some of that policy of playing off one foreign power against another, which Elizabeth adopted with so much success. The circumstances, of course, were different, but the general result was not dissimilar. At home, also, Henry's task was not unlike that which presented itself to Elizabeth. Both had to establish unity by harmonising a variety of discordant elements. The troubles of the past century had made too many masters in England. What the country needed was the enforcement of respect for the law. It was this determination to govern which has brought on Henry the charge of tyranny. Severe, however, Mr. Gairdner does not consider him. For Stanley's execution there was ample justification, the position of the offender only aggravating the offence; nor was the double execution of Warwick and Warbeck a piece of hasty cruelty, but rather due to a deliberate conviction of necessity. At the same time, Bacon's palliation of this act, as due to pressure from Spain, is shown by Mr. Gairdner to be an overstatement, for there is no such explicit declaration in the diplomatic correspondence of the time. As to the charge of miserliness so often brought against Henry, it is no doubt true in so far as he was fully aware that money is power, and was accordingly not only careful in husbanding his resources, but also extortionate in procuring them. But the prosperity of the country proves that the taxation was not really excessive; and there was a diplomacy in Henry's extortion of fines, which were not merely a means of raising money. In any case, he deserves the credit of having restored financial stability. As for legislation, despite Bacon's eulogy, it was not perhaps a great law-making epoch. Yet this is no proof of want of statesmanship; for, indeed, if parliaments were few, there was no lack of businesslike legislation.

But perhaps it may be asked, Was the work of the reign the work of the king? We will give Mr. Gairdner's own answer:

"From first to last his policy was essentially his own; for, though he knew well how to choose the ablest councillors, he asked or took their advice only to such an extent as he himself deemed expedient. In all his reign he never removed a councillor except Sir William Stanley; yet he allowed none of them to exercise any predominant influence with him, but kept all the strings of government in his own hand."

Henry was his own prime minister, who conscientiously went into the work of every department. Foreign affairs, finance, commerce, the social questions of the day, all received his personal attention. The good legislation also was due to him, as Bacon says, "In that part both of justice and of policy which is the most durable part, and cut, as it were, in brass or marble—the making of good laws—he did excel."

So much for the statesman, but what about the man? Was he not, after all, cold, calculating, unsympathetic? In some degree he was, but rather through the necessities of his position than from natural temperament. He was not by nature either severe or ungenial; as Mr. Gairdner points out, "there are indications of a kindly, pleasant, affable, and even humorous disposition." Certainly he seems to have had some power of attraction, notably in the cases of Kildare and the Spanish ambassador La Puebla, with neither of whom did most people find it easy to get on. Nor does Henry seem to have been without family affection, trafficker in matrimony though he was. The very touching narrative of how he and the queen comforted one another after the death of their son shows that beneath the seemingly cold exterior there was a warm and loving heart.

In conclusion, we would point out two small slips. On p. 107 Philip is called "stepson" of Margaret of Burgundy, and on p. 204 Charles is called the "son" of Maximilian; in both it should be "grandson." But slips like these detract nothing from the high merit of a book which all classes of readers will find well worth perusal.

C. L. KINGSFORD.

The Land of the Dragon. By W. S. Percival. (Hurst & Blackett.)

It is rather difficult to find a reason for the appearance of this book. There is no preface to guide the enquiry, and the author gives no hint to serve as a clue in regard to the motives that prompted him to write it, but launches it upon his readers with an abruptness that is almost startling. The very name too, so far from assisting in the matter, is misleading, as the work is not a general account of "the Land of the Dragon," its people, or its history, but only a disconnected series of sketches of shooting and boating expeditions and adventures; incidents in the Tai-ping rebellion; with disquisitions on religious and social matters, the opium question, and the civil and military training for the imperial service. But, however disjointed the various matters treated of may be, the author has certainly succeeded in producing a very readable book, both interesting and amusing, and well written throughout.

The first chapter contains a capital description of Shanghai, with its various amusements and distractions, among which racing plays a prominent part, as, indeed, it does at nearly all the treaty ports. Many who are only acquainted with such matters at home will be surprised at the excellent time made over the course by the hardy little Mongolian ponies that compose the studs in the Far East.

The next three chapters describe the author's adventures on his trip up the Yangtse and through the Gorges above Ichang; an account which will bear perusal even after Mr. Archibald Little's inimitable narrative of the same arduous voyage. The description of the trouble in getting the crew on board at Ichang is too good to be omitted:

"They were to be quite ready to start at daylight the following morning. . . . The previous afternoon we had foolishly advanced the men money to buy rice for the voyage, which they declared was absolutely necessary before they could start; and now behold the result! Half of them were drunk, the other half stupid with opium. It was no use lamenting or moralising over the uncertain and incomprehensible nature of the heathen; they had to be got on board somehow, before matters got worse. First of all, we got several bags of rice, and put these on board at once, for all the money we had advanced for this purpose yesterday was turned into samshu and opium. Then out of the crowd of amused onlookers we selected four of the most villainous and powerful-looking ruffians we could see, hiring them, there and then, to have our crews on board in three hours; no pay if they were not all there by that time, double pay if they were there in two hours. Then we retired and awaited results. In less than two hours our villains of the drama came and reported, 'All piece man have got, all man blong all ploppe, so, look see sampan.' We went on board the boats, and there certainly was our helpless crew; counting them over, we found the number correct; but I am quite sure there were a good many substitutes among them. Anyhow, the number was correct, and we could not say which were substitutes, and which were not, so we paid up, and exit [sic] ruffians. Into the ways and means adopted for getting these men into the boats, we thought it better not to enquire too closely" (pp. 84, 85).

The following suggestion as to a virgin peak in the Yangtse Gorges is worth the consideration of the committee at No. 8, St. Martin's Place:

"Close by was an exceedingly curious rock, named by the Chinese the 'Needle of Heaven,' 1800 feet high; affording an excellent opportunity to any member of the Alpine Club wishing for distinction, as its summit has never yet been reached" (p. 98).

Then follows a chapter devoted to Mr. Little, giving a description of his steamer, the Kuling, designed for the passage of the Gorges, and of the difficulties and opposition that he experienced from the authorities in his gallant attempt to navigate her from Ichang to Chungking. The seventh chapter records the author's very rash visit with his wife and daughter to the Tai-hu lake, and the dangers they encountered in forcing their way there against the advice of the natives. This is followed by an account of scenes in the rebellion, and of some waifs and strays from civilisation that the author came across, ending with an appeal for funds to get education for some of their children—a most deserving object, and one which it is to be hoped may be liberally responded to.

The three concluding chapters, which are particularly interesting, treat, among other things, of the opium question. On this difficult subject the author says:

"It might mitigate the rancour of some unlearned tongues if the anti-opium society would send out three independent men, or even one delegate in whom they had confidence, to travel through the provinces of China, and learn the place opium occupies as an article of consumption. He would find that in a single province, Szechuen [where it is estimated that twenty million pounds of opium are raised annually], seventy per cent. of the men, and a large proportion of the women, inhale the drug they cultivate so extensively. He would find also that all over the Empire men in easy circumstances take their whiffs of opium, much as the same class in Europe take their wine, and that it does them no more injury than the refreshing glass and soothing cigar at home. In the cities he may discover dens and evil places of many kinds, if his taste lies that way; but in cities at home there are also objectionable places, free from the use or abuse of opium. Victims of this vice are occasionally met with in the instance of a poor working-man who, instead of sustaining himself on his wholesome rice, &c., spends his earnings on this, to him, very expensive luxury. He has acquired the 'yen,' or craving that will not be denied. He perishes from starvation; the drug does not nourish him; and the exhaustion from lack of food probably intensifies the craving for the indulgence. There are weak brethren everywhere; but are we all to abjure the means of recreative pleasures because weaklings cannot control their appetite, or have an impaired digestion? Are there not an anti-tobacco society and a total abstinence society? And yet the trade in cigars and pipes flourishes, and the revenue on wines and spirits does not fail. In the same category is the anti-opium society. America has even her anti-tea-and-coffee missions. Where shall we stop, and whither are we being driven? Are we to go back to the days of mead and beer? Well, there were giants in those days, and England had her heroes then as now. We are not better or wiser than our fathers were, but we live longer and enjoy life more; and that this is the result of a more diversified and less heavy regimen may be safely assumed" (pp. 292, 293).

And this, it must be remembered, is not the hastily formed opinion of a casual tourist, but the deliberate judgment of a man who has resided for sixteen years in the country, and has had exceptional opportunities of knowing what he is writing about. That it will not affect the action of those who are clamouring that Indian opium should be entirely excluded from China is very probable, as their organisation has survived the crushing exposure of their errors by Sir Rutherford Alcock about eight years ago in two most able articles, in which he showed that, at the very time a man of the influence and position of Li Hung Chang was memorialising the emperor to stop the importation of the foreign drug on the ground that it was stealing away the intellects of the people, he was himself a principal shareholder in the opium production of Szechuen.

M. BEAZLEY.

Books and Men. By Agnes Repplier. (Boston, U.S.: Houghton, Mifflin, & Co.)

It is long since a pleasanter book of essays than this has reached us from America. It gives evidence of wide reading, intelligent observation, and a fine critical faculty on the part of its author; and withal it is written with a becoming lightness of humour, not untinged with satire, which would make any subject interesting.

In the paper on "Children Past and Present," the author compares the treatment of the young people of former generations with the treatment accorded to them to-day; and in what may be regarded as a companion essay, entitled "What Children read," she extends the comparison in the direction of character. The ideal child now is certainly an entirely different creature from the ideal child of the days of our grandmothers. "We cannot go back to any period when school life was not fraught with miseries," says Miss Repplier; and assuredly, if anything could convince us that we of this generation are morally better than our forefathers, and that the so-called good old times were in reality bad and brutal old times, it would be the difference between then and now in the treatment of women, of children, and of the brute creation. The children used to be something like a distinct, subordinate race which had to be suppressed; but now they are little men and little women who, if the truth must be told, rule rather than obey. Miss Repplier's comparison of the young people of Miss Edgeworth's Tales with the young people presented in the pages of Miss Alcott's books is well drawn. The "foolish, warm-hearted, impetuous" little Rosamond is "of importance in the household only through the love" her family bear her. Otherwise, her position is "strangely insignificant." Her opinions do not carry much weight, and she is never called on to act as "an especial providence" to anyone. "We do not behold her winning Godfrey away from his cigars, or Orlando from fast companions, or correcting anybody's faults, in fact, except her own, which are numerous enough and give her plenty of concern" (p. 83). When we come to the modern child, as depicted by Miss Alcott, all this is changed. Rose, the "bright little heroine" of Eight Cousins and of A Rose in Bloom is "of the utmost importance to all the grown-up people in the book, most of whom, it must be acknowledged, are extremely silly and incapable. Her aunts set the very highest value upon her society, and receive it with gratified rapture; while among her male cousins she is, from the first, like a missionary in the Feejees. It is she who cures them of their boyish vices, obtaining in return from their supine mothers 'a vote of thanks which made her feel as if she had done a service to her country.' At thirteen she discovers that 'girls are made to take care of boys,' and with dauntless assurance sets about her self-appointed task" (p. 84).

Possibly, as Miss Repplier hints, there is, under the new mode, some danger of the little people developing into little prigs; or perhaps—and to me this seems more likely—the little people of the past, like the women of the past, were only suppressed, and, essentially, were always very much what (now that they have liberty to grow according to nature) we discover them to be. Miss Alcott's father was a pioneer in establishing this liberty; Miss Alcott herself and her sisters were among the first children to enjoy it. Her books, while they expressed the spirit and tendency of the time, in their turn did, no doubt, help on the democratic movement. "Is it, after all, mere pique," asks Miss Repplier, "which inclines us to Miss Edgeworth's ordinary little boys and girls, who, standing half-dazed on the threshold of life, stretch out their hands with childish confidence for help?" (p. 93). But I suspect the truth to be that children have more real confidence in their elders in these days when they are encouraged to seek information and guidance, knowing that their questions will, at least, receive a civil response, than ever existed when such questions were pretty certain to be met with the chilling retort that boys and girls "should see, hear, and say nothing." Did the boys and girls see and hear less than they do now, merely because they dared not to speak, and therefore could not ask for guidance? Even Rosamond was, probably, hardly a fair specimen of the average child of those days. Miss Edgeworth, like Miss Alcott, was in advance rather than behind her times; and her stories were designed to teach lessons to parents in the management of their children, as well as to instil into the children proper behaviour to their elders.

In the essay "On the Benefits of Superstition," Miss Repplier makes incidental reference to this change in the behaviour—if not in the character—of children. Children, she says, "have ceased to read fairy stories, because they no longer believe in fairies. They find Hans Andersen silly, and the Arabian Nights stupid." She relates an experience of her own with one of these sceptical youngsters:

"What did Kriss Kringle bring you this Christmas?" I rashly asked a tiny mite of a girl; and her answer was as emphatic as Betty Prig's, when, with folded arms and a contemptuous mien, she let fall the ever memorable words, 'I don't believe there's no such a person'" (p. 40).

Yet, when I remember the popularity of Alice in Wonderland, I cannot but think that Miss Repplier has made too hasty a generalisation. I should like to know what ground she has for her statement that modern children "find Hans Andersen silly." As to the value of the supernatural, Miss Repplier is quite right when she says, "the supernatural, provided it be not too horrible, is legitimate food for a child's mind"; but that such beliefs as that "were-wolves roamed in the forests, and witches rode in the storm" are precisely the kind to make children, or anyone else, "happy," is, at least, doubtful. What is called superstition is valuable, whether to children or to men and women, only so far as it helps them out of a too narrow and "matter-of-fact" existence by teaching them that there is a higher truth than the truth of facts—namely, the truth of ideas.

In the pleasant paper on "Curiosities of Criticism" Miss Repplier remarks that "mere preference on the part of a critic" is not "sufficient sanction for his verdicts, or, at least, it does not warrant his imparting them to the public." Nevertheless, I will venture to say (merely as a statement of my individual experience) that I read Books and Men with more than ordinary interest and attention, and that, when I came to the end, I experienced a sensation of disappointment akin to that unforgotten misery of childhood when, dipping for another sugar-plum, I have found the bag empty.

An I. D. B. in South Africa. By Louise Vescelius-Sheldon. (Trübner.)

In Robert Leeman's Daughters Mr. Fogerty recovers much of the old power which made Lauterdale the novel of the season nearly twenty years ago. His present venture is strong in both branches of the fiction-writer's art—description and character-drawing. From the time when we are first introduced to the heroine to the last glimpse we obtain of her, Muriel Leeman, the elder of Leeman's two daughters, is limned with rare skill and individuality. It is a touching chapter where at two or three years of age Muriel is carried out to sea, off the Irish coast, the sole occupant of a small boat which had drifted with the tide. We cannot follow her fortunes very closely; but she is providentially rescued by a Dutch captain, and tended by his wife, until the vessel reaches Holland, and Muriel is adopted by M^{me}. Zelis, the wife of a Dutch advocate. Step by step, and with touching pathos, the author traces the affection which grows up between the waif and her guardian. Years roll on, and at length the news reaches Robert Leeman and his wife in the United States that their elder child still lives, having been miraculously preserved. Leeman journeys to Holland to bring her home; but he is disarmed by the strength of the tie between Muriel and her adopted mother, and with a noble self-sacrifice he resolves to honour the bond which, if rudely snapped, would mean death to two lives. On his return, the brave man has another desperate and heart-rending trial; for, in her anger, his wife curses the woman who has brought up her child, and lavished upon her all the wealth of affection of which her large womanly nature is capable. Many stirring scenes follow, with partings of a happy or a painful nature; and Mrs. Leeman is at length constrained to bless, where she had once bitterly cursed. The book is not without its amusing passages, also, as when Robert Leeman thus delivers his views upon the insignificant kingdom of Holland:

"This little water-logged country appears to me scarcely worth all the money expended in keeping it pumped out. If the people were to pack up all the nice crockery and paintings they have, and come out to the States, we could settle them somewhere in a dry corner, and absorb the population in a month."

This novel is very strong; human emotions and passions are dealt with in a manner that commands admiration and assent; and, in style, the work is infinitely superior to the vast majority of present-day novels, having much of the charm which distinguished the literary offspring of the older writers of fiction.

Mrs. Pirakis is a novelist of experience—one who has written many entertaining stories. She is an adept at weaving a plot, and this faculty has not failed her in composing At the Moment of Victory. Whatever faults might be found with it, it is eminently readable—which of itself is a considerable tribute to pay to any novel. There is, perhaps, something too much of the melodramatic in the career of Etelka McIvor, who unites in herself British and Italian qualities, and is a firm believer in fate. It was fearful to contemplate what might occur when a certain year "was a portentous one to Etelka; before it ended an evil planet would be at the square aspect of the place of the sun at her birth." We meet in these volumes with an attempted poisoning, villainy redundant on the part of a confidential servant, and planet-reading extraordinary. The love which poor Madge Cohen cherishes for Lance Clive, however, quite redeems everything; and we are glad when, after much suffering, happiness dawns for the heroine. Now and then we are shown a powerful scene, instinct with passion; and all through the interest is kept thoroughly alive.

George Ebers's Gred, a tale of Old Nuremberg, has been excellently translated by Mme. Clara Bell, under the title of Margery. Those who are acquainted with the writings of the first of living German novelists will require no commendation of this story. It is written in Ebers's best manner; and although the opening may seem to drag a little, the reader will be well repaid as he advances. German life and manners in the fifteenth century, as we learn them from the historians, have been happily caught by the novelist; and the many vicissitudes in the life of Margery Schopper are recited with genuine feeling. The translator, while avoiding essentially modern words and forms of speech, has wisely made no attempt to imitate English phraseology of a bygone age.

Mr. Muddock's stories are fairly entitled to the epithets he claims for them—"Weird and Wonderful." Persons of an imaginative temperament would do well not to read them about the witching hour of midnight, as some of them would be apt to make the flesh creep. "The Compact," "The Bell of Doom," and "The Shining Hand," are told with considerable literary skill, and all the sketches possess thrilling interest. This is a capital book for the seaside, because its strong sensations are not likely there to gain the upper hand.

The Wizard's Lute is in the fine old sensational vein, with horrors galore. As in the case of tradesmen and others, a sample or two of the goods supplied will be better than any amount of description. On p. 58 we find that furies of hideous aspect attack the hero, and tie him down tightly with strong cords. It is rather hard on him while thus helpless for other fiends to attack him—yet this is what they did: "The demons of the bottomless pits of hell surrounded me in on every side, and exulted triumphantly over me in my horrible misery." One more extract shall be given from the closing pages:

"See! See! The cruel villain is pouring a white and glistening powder into her cup containing her medicine, which he has just poured out for her to take, and I know that it is a most deadly poison which he is about to give her. 'Oh, stay his hand, thou great king, stay his impious hand!' I cry out; but the sable monarch, sighing gently, replies, 'Hast thou, then, not yet learnt that evil cannot be stayed?'"

Certainly, evil is not stayed in this story. As a whole, the book is beyond me; and, therefore, I can only commend it in the words of the resolution passed upon Artemus Ward's famous essay: "Is cats to be trusted?"—viz., "We prefer to express no opinion upon it, and trust it will be read in other towns."

There is nothing to distinguish Skill wins Favour from the multitude of superfluous novels which teem from the press; and the use of such phrases as "gentle reader" does not invest it with quaintness of style. A portrait of the author is prefixed to the work; which serves at least to show that all lady authors are not plain-looking, though it affords no particular guarantee of intellectuality. As for the novel itself, it is interesting enough in some respects, but all the changes and developments of plot have been rung again and again, time out of mind. There is a wicked baronet, who takes his fill of "the roses and raptures of vice," while a struggling artist—who is really too good for this world—is kept out of his inheritance.

The mysterious title of Miss Sheldon's story, An I. D. B. in South Africa, is likely to puzzle the reader considerably until he discovers the meaning of the capital letters to be "illicit diamond buyer." The career of one such individual is sketched with some vigour and a certain humour; and the manner in which he escapes being sent to prison, there to reap the due reward for his offences, is so original that we must leave the reader to find it out for himself. There is a good deal of local colour in the narrative, and the interest in it is further enhanced by a number of graphic illustrations scattered about the text.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

SOME MODERN-GREEK BOOKS.

On Erotocritos and its Author. (Περὶ Ἐρωτοκρίτου καὶ τοῦ Παινετοῦ αὐτοῦ.) By A. N. Jannaris. (Athens: Constantinides.) M. Jannaris, who is favourably known by his excellent collection of Cretan popular songs and by other works, has been commissioned by the National Assembly of Crete to bring out a new edition of the romance of Erotocritos, which was written in the Cretan dialect; and with a view to this he has visited the chief libraries of Europe, in the hope of discovering manuscripts of the poem, as well as historical and other notices which might elucidate it. The only existing MS. which he has been able to discover is in the Harleian Collection in the British Museum, and this will form the basis of the new edition. It is a handsome illuminated MS. of the commencement of the eighteenth century, written by a native of the island of Zante, and contains an accurate text of the original Cretan poem. The appearance of this poem, which is already advertised, will be looked forward to with much interest; and its importance will be appreciated when it is remembered that the text now in circulation is the result of a later adaptation, by which the forms of the language employed were assimilated to those of ordinary modern Greek. Meanwhile, in the present work M. Jannaris gives us his Prolegomena, consisting of information respecting the person, the nationality, and the date of the author; an analysis of the contents of the poem; a summary of the opinions of literary men concerning it; a history of the text; an account of its dialectal peculiarities; and a glossary. The editor has spared no pains in collecting materials which may serve to illustrate these points; and being himself by birth a Cretan, he is peculiarly fitted to deal with all questions which concern the language. As regards the author, it is stated in the subscription at the end of the poem that his name was Vincenzo Cornaro (Βιντσέντζος Κορνάρης), and that he was born at Steia (Στεία), a town in the eastern part of the island. The latter of these statements has been confirmed by M. Jannaris, who observes that the dialect used in the composition of the work displays features peculiar to the eastern districts of Crete, and to Seteia in particular; and the proofs which he brings of the connexion between the family of the Cornari and that place remove any doubt that might be felt as to the genuineness of the name—to which it may be added that the circumstance that this family lived in Carpathos before they settled in Crete would account for a person of Venetian extraction using Greek as if it were his mother tongue. The date is a more difficult question. In the family tree of the Cornari, which M. Jannaris has constructed from the works of the Venetian genealogists, Barbaro and Musazzo, extending from the fourteenth to the beginning of the seventeenth century, there are five persons of the name of Vincenzo; and he adduces reasons to show that all of these must be excluded from consideration except one, who was born in 1486. At the same time, he remarks that the town of Seteia was ruined by an earthquake in 1508—a catastrophe from which it never recovered; and that the poem must have been written before that year—that is to say, before the poet was twenty-two years of age. The improbability of this he explains away by saying that the subject of romantic love is one best suited to a youthful poet; but this will hardly satisfy us when we consider that the work extends to 8000 lines. Of the merits of Erotocritos very various estimates have been formed, the most favourable being that of Coray, who called it "the Homer of the popular Greek literature." With all deference to the judgment of this famous scholar, we cannot but regard this as a greatly exaggerated view. It is a graceful love-story of the days of chivalry, full of noble sentiments, and told in a spirited manner in correct verse; but it does not rise to the level of first-rate poetry, and in some parts it is wearisomely prolix. Its attractiveness is proved by its widespread popularity among the Greek people, which has won for it the character of a national poem; but by men of letters of other nationalities, while they will not ignore its literary merit, it will be valued rather as an interesting specimen of a poem in the Cretan dialect. The portion of M. Jannaris's work which relates to the forms of that dialect is excellent, though it would have been an advantage if those features which are peculiarly Cretan had been pointed out, whereas many that are noticed by him are common to other dialects, and some even to the ordinary popular language. The same praise and a similar criticism are applicable to the glossary, which is highly serviceable, but would have been more so if it had been simplified by the exclusion of the most ordinary Greek words, especially such as are identical in ancient and modern Greek, and are therefore familiar to all scholars.

Versionen. By John Schmitt. (Munich: Buchholz & Werner.) The Chronicle of the Morea, which is the chief authority for the early history and feudal organisation of the Frank Principality that was established in the Peloponnese subsequently to the Fourth Crusade, exists both in a Greek and a French version, besides translations or adaptations in Italian and Spanish. The French text, which is in prose, is found in a MS. in the library at Brussels; while the Greek metrical chronicle exists in two MSS., one of which is at Copenhagen, the other at Paris. Of these latter the Copenhagen text is the fuller and more complete, but the Paris text is superior in orthography, diction, and versification. The question has been much debated whether the French or the Greek version is the earlier, and the opinion of the learned has preponderated in favour of the former; but the relationship of the two Greek texts to one another has never hitherto been discussed, though this point is necessarily an important factor in determining the previous one. In the present treatise, Dr. Schmitt has investigated afresh these questions and others connected with them, and high praise is due to him for the learning and acuteness which he has shown in his work. His conclusion is that the Copenhagen Greek text is earlier than that contained in the Paris MS.; and that from this original composition the French chronicle was made, with considerable omissions, and a more compressed style. It is impossible, within the limits of a brief notice, to do justice to his arguments, and still more so to discuss such features in them as appear debateable; but we believe that he has succeeded in proving his point. His view is, that the original document, as we find it in the Copenhagen MS., was written about the year 1330; and he accounts for the mixture of fiction and legend with historical fact which it contains, by regarding it as an epic composed for the glorification of the chief personages of the early period of the occupation, about whom, in the course of time, various stories had gathered. The author seems to have been a Frenchman or a Gasmul, as the children of mixed marriages between a Frank father and a Greek mother were called; and this would account for the numerous faults of language and metre which are found in his verses. On the other hand, the compiler of the Paris Greek version, which was made about 1388, is shown to have been a Greek by his speaking of the conquerors as "them" in passages where the other version speaks of them as "us"; and this is corroborated by his softening down the violent expressions which the author, in his fervent partisanship for the Western Church, employs with reference to the Greeks and their religion. In this text the diction is improved, and the versification corrected; and Dr. Schmitt's argument, drawn from this point, in favour of the priority of the Copenhagen text seems to us unanswerable, viz., that no one would go out of his way to alter good verse into bad, which must have been the case if the more accurate form of the poem had been the earlier; for the errors which have been spoken of are not mere blunders, such as might be caused by careless transcription or ignorance, but arise from a radically wrong conception of the metre. In some instances the desire for metrical improvement has been carried so far that, in order to facilitate this, a proper name has been corrupted in the Paris version, which was accurately given in that of Copenhagen—e.g., Φαπάρ for Μονφάρ (Monferat). With regard to the still more important question of the relation of the Greek to the French chronicle, Dr. Schmitt points out that in places where the writer of the former narrates events in his own words, the French writer refers for the same to a "conte" as his authority, which seems to be the Greek chronicle. He also says that he will tell his story briefly, and not as he "found it written," by which he also implies that it was compressed from a longer work. Much stress is laid on the greater fullness of facts which is found in the Greek chronicle as a proof of its priority; and, in evidence of this, an elaborate comparison of the two is instituted in respect of the events narrated, the speeches introduced, and the descriptions. The arguments deduced from this are not absolutely conclusive, for it is allowed that the French chronicle contains some details which are wanting in the Greek. Indeed, these two versions are so free in their relation to one another that great caution is required in arguing on this subject, so as to distinguish what may be later amplifications, derived from independent sources, from facts which must have been introduced at an early period, and thereby imply priority of composition. Dr. Schmitt seems also rather to weaken his argument on this point, when he refers to the fact that the speeches which are found at length in the Greek are either not introduced at all, or only in a few words, in the French, as showing that the former was the earlier; for nothing would be more natural in a half-epic poem than that fictitious speeches should be put into the mouths of historical personages. Still, it cannot be denied that, on the whole, this comparison of passages is strongly in favour of Dr. Schmitt's view. Much interesting information will also be found in this volume respecting the Italian version of the Chronicle, and of that in the dialect of Aragon, which was made under the superintendence of Heredia, the Grand-master of the Knights of St. John, and is a compilation rather than a translation, for other documents have been laid under contribution in forming it.

History of the Greek Colony in Corsica. (Ἱστορία τῆς ἐν Κορσικῇ Ἑλληνικῆς ἀποικίας.) By N. B. Phardys. (Athens: Constantinides.) In the year 1675, when the Turks, having made themselves masters of Crete, were proceeding to subjugate those parts of the Morea which were still independent, six or seven hundred of the inhabitants of the district of Maina, as the old Taenarian peninsula is now called, having previously entered into negotiations with the Genoese government, left their homes, and migrated, first to Genoa, and afterwards to Corsica, which island was then in the possession of that power. There they were established at a place called Paomia, on the west coast, northward of Ajaccio, with the understanding that they should defend the interests of the Republic against the unruly Corsicans. This duty they conscientiously performed, and on several occasions they rendered signal service to the Genoese; but in consequence of the quarrels in which they were thus involved they were forced in 1731 to withdraw to Ajaccio. In 1768 Corsica passed from the hands of Genoa into those of France; and shortly after this the Greeks were restored by the French to the neighbourhood of their original settlement, and there they built the town of Cargese, where their descendants still dwell. The present volume is the most reliable account that has yet appeared of the romantic origin and stirring history of this little community; for, whereas former writers on the subject have trusted for the most part to the traditions of the people, the facts which are here narrated are derived from documentary evidence. The author, M. Phardys, took up his abode in Corsica as manager of a school which was established at Cargese by two patriotic Greeks of Marseilles, who desired to avert the threatened extinction of the Greek language in that colony; and during the two years that he resided in the island he investigated the municipal archives of Ajaccio, the archives of the Greek family of the Stephanopoli-Comneni in that city, and other sources of evidence. As regards the first-named of these collections, he tells us that, owing to the length of time which elapsed before he was able to consult it, it was impossible for him to examine it to his satisfaction, but he gives an account of its contents for the guidance of subsequent enquirers. Much information is drawn in this volume from a document written in the first half of the eighteenth century by one Papa-Nicolaos, which contains a history of these Greeks from their leaving their starting-place, the town of Vitylo in Maina, until they retired from Paomia to Ajaccio. Another very curious document, which M. Phardys prints in full, is the will of the Bishop of Maina, Parthenios Kalandes, who accompanied the settlement. Among the points on which light is thrown in this work is the original composition of the body of emigrants, which seems to some extent to have been made up of persons from various parts of Greece, refugees apparently, who had betaken themselves to independent Maina. Thus, in the early registers mention is made of natives of Oos, Smyrna, Chios, Paros, Roumelia, &c. The history of the relation of these Corsican Greeks to the see of Rome is also an interesting one. Originally it was agreed that they should retain the belief and the forms of worship of the Eastern Church, on condition of their acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope; and this arrangement was allowed on the whole to continue until the commencement of the present century. Then, however, the Propaganda interfered, and required that those among them who were intended for the priesthood should be educated at Rome. At the present time, according to M. Phardys, the Liturgy (Eucharistic Office) is the only service of the Eastern Church which is in use at Cargese. It is to be regretted that the question of the descent of Napoleon Bonaparte from these Greeks has been passed over very lightly here. The evidence on the subject may be unsatisfactory, but it is certainly curious; and attention has lately been drawn to it by the republication of the Memoirs of M^{me}. Junot, who was herself a Corsican Greek, and was intimate with the Bonaparte family. At the end of M. Phardys's volume there is a small collection of the Romaic songs of Cargese; some of these will be found—with slight variations, such as naturally arise from oral transmission—among the ballads from Corsica that were published in the Pandora of Athens by M. Pappadopoulos in 1864, and among those printed by the present writer in the Journal of Philology for 1876. Of the future of this community M. Phardys takes a despondent view. They are rapidly losing their language and their sense of nationality, and in the ordinary course of things they will soon be merged among their Corsican neighbours.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE understand that, besides all the 250 large paper copies of the new edition of Mr. Browning's works, three thousand copies of the ordinary post-octavo edition have been already sold. A thousand of these were taken by America.

MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE, who is at present at Buxton, is working steadily upon his volume on Balzac. He hopes to finish it during the autumn.

MR. GRANT ALLEN is collecting for republication a number of his popular scientific articles which have appeared during the past few years in the Cornhill.

MRS. HAWES will issue in September, with Messrs. Sampson Low, a new work, entitled the Art of Housekeeping: Elementary Advice addressed to Young Housekeepers in the Shape of Letters to a Daughter. The book contains a variety of useful hints served up in a novel form, and it is intended to be a sort of vade mecum to a bride.

MR. GUY LE STRANGE's long expected work on the descriptions of Palestine by Moslem geographers and travellers during the middle ages will be published by the Palestine Exploration Fund this autumn. In the chapter devoted to Jerusalem, a mass of evidence has been brought together (nearly all from Arabic authorities never before translated), which proves conclusively that the Dome of the Rock was built by the Arabs, and was not—as the late Mr. James Fergusson contended—a Christian edifice perverted from its original purpose. Another chapter will describe the glories of Damascus under the Omayyad Caliphs, and of the Great Mosque burnt to the ground by Timur. There will also be a list in alphabetical order of all the notices of minor towns, villages, &c., in Palestine and Syria mentioned by Moslem writers.

MR. J. F. HOGAN, author of "The Irish in Australia," &c., has nearly completed an Australian romance, which will be published in the autumn. A collection of his short colonial stories was published in Melbourne a few years ago. Mr. Hogan has recently been appointed London correspondent of the Melbourne Herald.

THE Syndics of the Cambridge University Press have decided to publish a smaller edition of the "Cambridge Bible for Schools," adapted to the requirements of junior students and elementary schools. The first volumes of the new series will be the First Book of Samuel, edited by Prof. A. F. Kirkpatrick, and the Gospel according to St. Matthew, edited by Rev. A. Carr, which will probably be published simultaneously in the autumn. Other volumes are in preparation.

MR. HODGES has ready for publication a new and revised edition, with introduction by Mr. Frederick Stokes, of Dr. Maitland's The Dark Ages: a Series of Essays illustrating the State of Religion and Literature in the Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Centuries.

MAISONNEUVE & Co., of Paris, have in the press a second and revised edition of Prof. Maspero's charming little volumes of Contes Populaires de l'Egypte Ancienne. The new edition will contain a translation in full of the Lepsius papyrus, entitled "Le Roi Khoufou et les Magiciens," and also translations of several fragments of a popular tale, entitled "Le Roman d'Alexandre," from a Theban-Optic document of the Arab period, partly based upon, and partly reproducing almost verbatim, certain of the fragments attributed to Callisthenes. The Lepsius papyrus, of which we have heard so much yet know so little, is of considerable length, and contains four complete tales relating to feats of magic. These tales are recounted to King Khufu by his four sons, in order to amuse him in his hours of idleness. The device by which the stories are introduced, and the extravagant character of the incidents, indicate how the Thousand and One Nights may have owed something of their origin to the literature of ancient Egypt.

THE Queen has been pleased to cause letters patent to be passed under the great seal granting a charter of incorporation to the Royal Historical Society, of which Her Majesty is patron.

WHEN the members of the British Archaeological Association visited Gainsborough last Saturday, the vicar (Canon Warner) exhibited a bundle of Cromwell letters, which were stated to be unpublished. One of them, from Mrs. Whistone, Oliver's only sister, contains a strong protest against "his killing of the king."

MR. WM. E. DOUBLEDAY, chief assistant in the Nottingham Free Public Reference Library, has been appointed librarian of the new library in Lisson Grove, Marylebone, which is to be formally opened on Monday next, August 12, at 6 p.m.

MRS. IRELAND has been asked to give six more lectures on Browning in February and March next, at Southport, and also to write three articles on Browning's Women in the Woman's World.

THE memorial from men of letters and others to the Home Secretary, already referred to in the ACADEMY, asking for a remission of the unexpired portion of the sentence passed on Mr. Henry Vizetelly, the publisher, received about one hundred signatures, including Sir Algernon Borthwick, Sir E. W. Watkin, T. P. O'Connor, Samuel Storey, Charles Bradlaugh, Dr. C. Cameron, the Earl of Desart, Sir J. E. Millais, Sir John Gilbert, W. P. Frith, Birket Foster, Prof. Henry Morley, Prof. Geddes, J. Arthur Thomson, Edmund Gosse, Dr. R. Garnett, Dr. F. J. Farnivall, Oscar Browning, J. Addington Symonds, Leslie Stephen, Dr. R. Maitland Coffin, Norman Macooll, Jas. S. Cotton, the Hon. Roden Noel, Havelock Ellis, Robert Buchanan, Walter Besant, the Hon. Lewis Wingfield, Thomas Hardy, W. Clark Russell, H. Rider Haggard, Hall Caine, "Ouida," Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, Mrs. E. Lynn Linton, Mrs. Mona Caird, G. A. Sala, Edmund Yates, Frank Harris, Archibald Forbes, H. W. Lucy, H. D. Traill, A. W. Pinero, William Archer, Augustus Harris, Henry Irving, Henry Arthur Jones, Fitzgerald Molloy, William Sharp, Ernest Rhys, and the Hon. F. C. Lawley. The memorial was duly presented to the Home Secretary on July 28; but, so far as we know, no answer has as yet been received beyond a formal acknowledgment.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. THOMAS CASE, fellow of Corpus Christi College, and formerly of Balliol, has been elected to the Waynflete professorship of moral and metaphysical philosophy at Oxford, vacant by the death of Prof. Chandler. Mr. Case is best known as the author of Physical Realism: an Analytical Philosophy from the Physical Objects of Science to the Physical Data of Sense, which was published by Messrs. Longmans at the end of last year.

MR. HUBERT HERKOMER, A.R.A., honorary fellow of All Souls College, has been re-elected to the Slade professorship of fine arts at Oxford for a further term of three years.

THE Camden professorship of ancient history at Oxford, vacant by the resignation of Canon Rawlinson, has not yet been filled up. But it is generally anticipated that the choice of the electors will fall upon Mr. H. F. Pelham, at present reader in ancient history.

IN addition to the names mentioned in the ACADEMY of last week, the Rev. Dr. C. H. H. Wright, examiner in Hebrew and New Testament Greek in the University of London, has been appointed by the senate of that university as their delegate at the forthcoming International Oriental Congress at Stockholm and Christiania; while Miss Amelia B. Edwards hopes also to be present as the representative of the Egypt Exploration Fund.

IT is understood that Prof. James Thomson will shortly be compelled by ill health to resign the professorship of civil engineering and mechanics at Glasgow. The appointment is in the gift of the Crown.

THE council of University College, London, have conferred the status of emeritus professor upon Mr. A. B. W. Kennedy, who recently resigned the chair of engineering and mechanical technology, after a tenure of several years.

THE Library of Trinity College, Dublin, will be closed from August 19 to August 31 inclusive.

THE University of Yale, at its recent commencement, conferred the degree of D.D. upon the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, principal of Mansfield College, Oxford; and also proposes to send a delegation to the opening of Mansfield College in October.

TWO women's colleges, Wellesley and Vassar, are now associated in the maintenance of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens; and each of them is represented by a woman on the managing committee. A woman was also a student at the school during the winter of 1885-86.

THE new buildings of the Sorbonne at Paris, though not yet completed, were formally opened on Monday last, August 5. The total expenditure is estimated at twenty-two million francs (£880,000), towards which the municipality will contribute one half. The largest theatre, which will seat 3000 persons, is decorated with an immense allegorical painting by M. Puvis de Chavannes.

THE results of the University of St. Andrews L.L.A. (Women's) Examination for the present year have just been issued, from which it appears that 536 candidates entered for examination at 26 centres. Of these, 194 entered for the first time, as compared with 174 in 1888, when the number of subjects in which a candidate required to pass in order to obtain the title was raised from five to seven. Taking a joint view of all the subjects in which candidates entered, passes were obtained in 570 instances, and honours in 182. 116 candidates passed in the full number of subjects required for the L.L.A. diploma. From the commencement of the scheme in 1877, 2210 candidates in all have entered for this examination, and of these 816 have obtained the title.

WHAT THE SONNET IS.

FOURTEEN small baleful berries on the hem
Of Circe's mantle, all of greenest gold;
Fourteen of lone Calypso's tears that roll'd
Into the sea, for pearls to come of them;
FOURTEEN small signs of omen in the gem
With which Medea human fate foretold;
Fourteen small drops, which Faustus, growing old,
Craved of the Fiend, to water Life's dry stem.
IT is the pure white diamond Dante brought To Beatrice; the sapphire Laura wore
When Petrarch out it sparkling out of thought;
The ruby Shakspeare hewed from his heart's core;
The dark, deep emerald that Rossetti wrought
For his own soul, to wear for evermore.

OBITUARY.

W. R. S. RALSTON.

A WIDE circle of friends, in Russia as well as in this country, will hear with deep regret of the death of Mr. W. R. S. Ralston, which took place, very suddenly, on the morning of Tuesday last, August 6, at North Crescent, Bedford Square, whither he had lately moved from his old rooms in Alfred Place. Of late years his health had broken down, and he had become subject to fainting fits, caused by a weak heart.

William Ralston Shedden Ralston was born in 1828, being the only son of W. P. Ralston Shedden, some time a resident at Brighton. He himself added the name of Ralston to his paternal name. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, taking the degree of M.A. in 1860; and he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1862, though he never practised. From 1863 to 1875 he served on the staff of the department of printed books in the British Museum. He was twice appointed Ilchester lecturer at Oxford by the Taylorian trustees; and he received many marks of distinction from learned societies in Russia. That which he most valued was the rare honour of being elected a corresponding member of the Imperial Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg in 1886.

Ralston's name will long be remembered as the first to introduce into England the popular literature of Russia. His earliest book, we believe, and also his best known one, is Kriloff and his Fables (1869), which has passed through several editions, and still retains its popularity despite the growing publication of folklore. The life of Kriloff, prefixed to this book, shows not a few traits of character that were common to the Russian story-teller and his English translator; for there can be no doubt that Ralston was attracted to the popular literature of Russia by certain features which most Englishmen are slow to recognise. It was the simplicity, the warm-heartedness, the loyalty, the religion of the peasants—as opposed to the artificial life of the cities and of the official classes—which won from Ralston his early and undying affection for the Russian people, so that he himself became in temperament, and to some extent in manner, a Russian among Englishmen. No one who was honoured with Ralston's acquaintance could fail to be struck by the extreme heat of his sympathies, which caused him to feel the wrongs and to suffer the misfortunes of others as keenly as if they had been his own. Devoted as he was to folklore, it was always the human element of pathos, not the scientific result, which attracted his interest; and it pleased him better to tell stories to an audience of children than to collect them for comparison.

Among his other works may be mentioned Songs of the Russian People (1872), Russian Folk-Tales (1873), and Early Russian History (1874), which last volume embodied a course of his Ilchester lectures at Oxford. He also translated into English, under the title of Liza (1869), one of the romances of his friend Turgeneff, whom he was proud to welcome to England as his guest a few years ago. During the period of his greatest literary activity he was a frequent contributor to the magazines and reviews, though he rarely wrote on anything outside his own special subjects—Russian and folklore. Perhaps the last article which his failing health allowed him to undertake was a review of Mr. Stead's The Truth about Russia, in the ACADEMY of January 19, 1889; and it was a source of gratification to him that his defence of the Orthodox Church against Mr. Stead's strictures was read and appreciated in the highest quarters. To the last, he was the enthusiastic interpreter of the Russian people in England.

J. S. C.

HORATIUS BONAR, D.D.

It is fitting that the ACADEMY should contain some record of this remarkable man, who died in Edinburgh on July 31, in his eighty-first year. For although to discuss his theological opinions, or the views on ecclesiastical questions which he consistently advocated during a long public life, is beyond the province of a literary journal, yet his claims as a writer, and especially as a religious poet, deserve recognition.

Dr. Bonar's works both in prose and verse are far too numerous to mention in detail; but he will be best remembered as the author of Hymns of Faith and Hope, which have attained wide popularity. His long poem, in blank verse, entitled My Old Letters, which appeared in 1877, though containing passages of delicacy and beauty, was not altogether successful. Indeed, it was as a lyricist that he reached his highest excellence. "I heard the Voice of Jesus say," and "A few more Years shall roll" (set to music by Sir Arthur Sullivan), are not only successful hymns, which appeal to the intelligence of uncultivated people, but beautiful poems with the qualities inseparable from lyrics of a high class. When this much is true of any short poem it takes rank as literature, and its author will never be forgotten.

Born in 1808, Horatius Bonar was ordained a minister of the Established Church of Scotland; but he was one of those who seceded in 1843, and founded the Free Church. For many years minister at Kelso, he subsequently removed to a charge at The Grange, Edinburgh, where he remained until his death. A staunch ecclesiastical Conservative, and one who in public controversies knew how to be bitter, in private life he was always genial, while his ripe scholarship and his knowledge of men and things made personal intercourse with him most pleasant. One could not be in his company, and notice his intellectual face with its massive forehead, without supposing him to be a man of power, and the impression was fully confirmed when one heard him talk. The present writer will never cease to remember gratefully Dr. Bonar's little acts of kindness and words of encouragement at a time when he much needed such sympathy.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE new number of the Contemporary Review contains an article by Mr. M. H. Spielmann on a subject that gentleman has made his own—the reorganisation of the Royal Academy. Mr. Spielmann insists both readably and strongly upon the insufficiency of the reforms proposed in the academical body. Without committing ourselves wholly to the advocacy of Mr. Spielmann's views, we recommend the article as one well worthy of attention. It comes from a close student of the matter.

THE most valuable article in the August number of the Archæological Review is the reprint of a lecture read before the British and American Archaeological Society at Rome by Domenico Tesoroni upon "The Anglo-Saxons at Rome." A good deal of new evidence from the papal archives is here brought together regarding the early settlement of Anglo-Saxon ecclesiastics in the neighbourhood of the Vatican, though we incline to think that the writer attaches too much weight to the statements of some of the Anglo-Saxon chroniclers. The first article, by Mr. David MacRitchie, entitled "The Finn-men of Britain," though it contains one or two statements of interest, seems to us to be, on the whole, a typical example of inconsequent theorising. Nor do we think that Dr. Gaster has much that is new to tell about the Runic inscription on the famous bracelet from Petroasa at Bucharest—except that Prof. Odobescu claims to have found in it an additional character (c), making the whole read "gutani ocvi hailag." The quarterly summary of archaeological discovery and work in Great Britain is useful. But why should Ireland be excluded?

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NAMES "PALEMON" AND "ARCITE"; AND THE DEATH OF ARCITE.

Cambridge: August 5, 1889.

We know that the names Palemon and Arcite in Chaucer are taken from the names Palemone and Arcita in Boccaccio; also, that Boccaccio's chief authority for his story was the Thebaid of Statius. I see no reason why Boccaccio may not have been thinking of Statius when he adopted these names. "Palaemona" occurs, as an accusative case, in Th.b., vii. 421, where the reference is to the sea-god so named; and Statius even has the adjective "Palaemonius," Theb. ii. 381. As to Arcite, it may have been suggested by the name "Atys" in Statius. If any one cares to dispute these suggestions, I set no store by them, and am not prepared to defend them; indeed, Arcite is much more like the Archytas of Horace. But this, at any rate, I am clear about, that, whether Arcite and Atys are connected or not, it can hardly be denied that the pathetic description of the death of Arcite is precisely parallel to that of the death of Atys, as described in the Thebaid, viii. 637-651. I make no apology for quoting this fine passage at length.

"Talla nectebant, subito cum pigra tumultu
Expauit domus, et multo sudore receptus
Fertur Atys, seruens animam iam sanguine nullo,
Qui manus in plaga, dependet languida ceruix
Exterior clypeo, crinesque a fronte supini.
Prima uidet, caramque tremens Iocasta uocabat
Ismenen: namque hoc solum moribunda precatur
Uox generi, solum hoc gelidis iam nomen inerrat
Faucibus: exclamant famulae: tollebat in ora
Ulrgo manus; tenuit saeuus pudor; attamen ire
Cogitur (indulget summum hoc Iocasta iacenti),
Ostenditque offertque: quater iam morte sub ipse
Ad nomen uisus, delectaque fortiter ora
Sustulit: illam unam neglecto lumine coeli
Adspicit, et uultu non exsatiatur amato."

It must be remembered that Ismene was Atys's intended bride. When we read the words of Chaucer:

"Dunken his eyen two, and failleth breeth:
But on his lady yit caste he his ye,
His laste word was—Meroy, Emelye!"

it is only fair to remember that Statius had already written such lines as

"illam unam neglecto lumine coeli Adspicit, et uultu non exsatiatur amato:"
and again:

"solum hoc gelidis iam nomen inerrat Faucibus."

THE TRIPARTITE LIFE OF ST. PATRICK.

Oxford: July 29, 1889.

The ACADEMY for July 13, 1889, contains a letter by Dr. MacCarthy, which I should have noticed at once had I then been at Oxford; for, though it corrects, I am glad to say, some errors (mostly clerical or typographical) in the Rolls edition of the Tripartite Life, it makes nine misstatements as to Rawl. B. 512, the Bodleian MS. whence the bulk of the text is printed.

Fo. 5 a. Here, according to Dr. MacCarthy, the MS. has Padraic, without a mark of length over the former a. This matter, like most of his criticisms, is of little importance. The mark in question is faint; but to-day, in a good light, I certainly saw it. Here, also, he alleges that the MS. has fetarlicci. It has fetarli, with a dash over the i.

Fo. 8 a. 2. The MS., according to Dr. MacCarthy, has herent haitem. Here are two misstatements. First, for the alleged herent, the MS. has distinctly h, then a combination of r and e, then t, and, lastly, a flat stroke over the compound character. This, according to palaeographers who know their business, stands for haberet, and is, no doubt, a scribal error. The habetur of the Rolls edition is taken from Colgan, Trias Thaum., p. 128, col. 2, who seems to have had that word in one or more of his codices. If our scribe had meant Dr. MacCarthy's herent, he would either have written the word at length or expressed the her by h with a horizontal line through the first downstroke; but, for a contraction of herent or other forms from herco I have looked in vain through Walther's Lexicon Diplomaticum, Chassant's Paléographie des Chartes, and Hardy's list of abbreviations in vol. iv. of the Registrum Palatinum Dunelmense.

Secondly, for Dr. MacCarthy's haitem (a mere vox nihili), the MS. has the ordinary sign for autem, namely h, with an apex touching the top of the second downstroke.

In the same column the MS. has, according to Dr. MacCarthy (pro) fidem. It has, however, (profid), the d being followed by the curve used by Irish scribes to denote such desineness as sense and grammar may require. I printed, accordingly, pro fide. So in fo. 5 a. 2 the MS. has, according to Dr. MacCarthy (re) táisechaid. It has, however, ré táisech, the h being followed by a similar curve.

Fo. 14 b. 1. The MS., according to Dr. MacCarthy, has nomen. Here, for the fourth time, he suppresses the fact that he is giving merely his extension of a contraction, which in the present case is nō.

Fo. 20 a. 2. In order to support his contention (which I do not dispute) that "ipse" begins a sentence, Dr. MacCarthy alleges that the MS. has Ipse (with a capital "I"). It has ipse.

Fo. 25 a. 1. Here he alleges that the first word in this column is (as, no doubt, it ought to be) Sicque. But it is Sic, followed by the ordinary compendium of quod.

The letter under notice also contains a criticism on the quotation from the copy of Tigernach's Annals, in Rawl. B. 488, printed in p. 572 of the Rolls edition of the Tripartite Life. Here the cruel kindness of the editor of the ACADEMY has again permitted Dr. MacCarthy to expose his ignorance of the elements of Irish grammar. The third line of the first quatrain, printed in p. 572, stands thus in the MS.:

u in each. muidmedoin, that is, cóic maic Eachach Muidmedoin "five sons of Eachu Muidmedon." In transcribing Irish MSS. the contraction m must be read, according to the requirements of sense and grammar, mac "son" or maic (Middle-Irish meic, mec, or mic) "son's" or "sons." Here Dr. MacCarthy actually prints cóic mac. What would be said of a person, professing to be a Latin scholar, who, meaning "five sons," wrote quinque filius? This, mutatis mutandis, is what has been done here by the "Todd Professor of the Celtic Languages."

Dr. MacCarthy, lastly, blames me for printing effectus, Constantinopolitanis, archiepiscopus, &c., for the effectus, Constantinobalistanis, arciepiscopus, &c., of an ignorant copyist. My answer is that the rules regulating the Rolls series require that each document should be edited so as to represent with all possible correctness the text of the author, and that it would have been absurd to attribute to a scholar like Tigernach the blunders of the scribe of Rawl. B. 488.

Dr. MacCarthy is so obviously eager to find fault that he must be pained by the fewness of the errors which he has detected in the 875 pages of the Rolls Tripartite Life, &c. I will try to comfort him by pointing out three mistakes in that book which I have lately discovered.†

P. 38, l. 17, for semen read semed; and in the translation (p. 39, l. 20) transpose "offspring" and "seed."

P. 151, l. 12, for fragrant (?)—the bal of the Irish text—read bright.

P. 228, l. 25, for [Ma]nisechfaid read Nisech-faid, and in the translation (p. 229, ll. 29, 30) for "Unless . . . saith Patrick" read "What the woman has done is no error. [Otherwise], saith Patrick." The Index of Irish words (pp. 612, 657) should be corrected accordingly.

The three words just quoted—semed (rectius sedmed or sedmeth, as in the Book of Lismore, fo. 134 a 2), bal and sechfaid are etymologically interesting. Semed "offspring," with its hard m and long e, points to a primeval segmeto-, cognate with Latin seges, the British relative of which has been found by Prof. Rhys in the Welsh hau "to sow," heuodd "sevit." Bal

* See the ACADEMY for September 15, 1888, p. 173, col. 1, where Dr. MacCarthy gives cell as an accusative singular. See also the ACADEMY for April 2, p. 238, and for July 30, 1887, p. 72, col. 3.
† There is a typographical error in the Index of places, p. 635, col. 2, l. 91, where "Scire, gen. 310," should form a separate article.

"bright," or perhaps "brightness," occurs in the Book of Lismore, fo. 23 b 1, as the name of a well. It is probably equivalent to the Hesychian adj. φάλλος λευκός, or the subst. φάλλος of the grammarians. And sechfaid "error, mistake," also written sechbaid, is cognate with the Latin secus and sequior.

WHITLEY STOKES.

P.S.—In the ACADEMY for September 15, 1888, Dr. MacCarthy says that the verb dorargert is a vox nihili, and thus proves that he does not know that it is a common practice of Irish scribes to express ng by gg. I have since found that this practice is not mentioned by O'Donovan, Zeuss, or Windisch. It may therefore be well to give a few examples from Middle-Irish MSS. in Oxford, London, and Dublin. First, from the Rawlinson copy of the Tripartite Life: aggel fo. 26 a 2, coggab-sat 6 b 2, coggabtais 15 a 1, Conaigg 9 a 1, doraiggert 21 a 1, eggnamo 11 a 2, iggebad 9 b 1, 10 a 2, igGránard 19 b 2. Secondly, from the Egerton copy of the same Life: coggarar fo. 3 a 2, róchoggair fo. 3 b 1. Thirdly, from Harl. 5280: loggair, fo. 63 a, Sregg 63 a, mogg 63 b, inscigg 65 a. Fourthly, from H. 3, 18, mogg p. 64 a, bagg, crobagg 64 c. In the Trinity College Liber Hymnorum, we find dosreggat (Goidilica, p. 71). In short, Dr. MacCarthy might almost as well say (perhaps, indeed, he would say) that the Greek τέρας or the Gothic laggs was a vox nihili. The mediaeval Welsh also sometimes expressed ng by gg. Thus loggeu, lyggesawo, Gram. Celt. 117. W. S.

VIRGIL IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

New York: July 25, 1889.

My thanks are due for the kindly review of Master Virgil in the ACADEMY of June 8, from the pen of Count Ugo Balzani. My genial critic will hardly expect me, however, to yield those points on which we differ, inasmuch as he credits me with careful research, and doubtless anticipated the obstinacy of conviction such as is natural and human.

Frankly, there is much to be said for each of the hypotheses formed respecting the origin of the Virgilian legends. For that reason I was much interested by Prof. Viator's letter in the ACADEMY of July 6. I was not aware of his essay, "Der Ursprung der Virgilsage," until after my book was printed; and then it was called to my attention by that good scholar and critic, Prof. Crane, of Cornell University. But it seems to me, judging from the abstract now presented in English, that I can agree with Prof. Viator in his conclusions; and I can almost believe that, were he to glance at my book, he would find there the supplement to his methodically destructive criticism of Prof. Comparetti's theory. His merits as a scholar give propriety to the controversial air which he assumes; but as for myself, after I stated once and for all my opinion, to have persisted in a disputatious mood towards the distinguished Italian, whose erudition is so thorough and whose field of labour is so wide, would have been absurd. Moreover, my purpose was constructive, and the argument was necessarily laid down upon lines unsuited to the purpose of analytical review.

The objection to the duplex theory of learned and popular tradition to account for the origin of the Virgilian legends rests, it seems to me, upon the two facts—that this theory is altogether outside of the record, and that to go outside of the record in the case is needless. Now the record shows that tales, the same in every respect with the exception of proper names, were told of others before they were told of Virgil; that these tales—for example, the burial of a magical book with its author, the making of a metallic head which talked, the moulding of talismanic figures and automatic statues, the planting of magical gardens, the creation of magical ships and the like—were so well generalised by use as to make extremely important changes necessary in giving them a local habitat, and that those additions which would have given them the appearance of being indigenous, say to Italy, were not attached to them as told concerning Virgil. Of course, this statement would have to be modified for a time subsequent to that in which the legends first appeared, but it is only their origin that is in dispute.

The record also shows that it was a Lotharingian monk, John of Alta Silva, who created the figure of Virgil, as a small, round-shouldered, absent-minded philosopher, and credited him with the authorship of a work on the science of astrology, the very theme which in the lapse of centuries has fallen out of the MSS. of Macrobius; that it was a French poet, Herbers, who popularised this romantic figure, to which the real Virgil stands almost in the same relation that Dr. Jekyll stands to Mr. Hyde; that an Englishman, John of Salisbury, was the first to allude to the magical anecdotes of Virgil; that another Englishman, Alexander Neckam, was the first to gather them in a group, and his paragraph covers all the motives which inspired this legendary movement from first to last; that those who first expanded Neckam's collection were Conrad of Querfurt, a German; Gervase of Tilbury, an Englishman, and Helinand, a Fleming; that the first to add alchemy to the list of Virgil's attainments was Vincent of Beauvais, a Frenchman—and finally, that all these were men of some education, members of that republic of letters which transmitted from one age to another the traditions of learning.

I submit that this record needs no additions or interlineations from a hypothetical popular lore to connect it with the known facts, opinions and beliefs of post-classical times. Possibly the controversy is not important in itself; but it becomes important when viewed in its relation to the development of natural science, mechanic arts, and literary expression in the middle ages. I cannot help feeling that there would have been less difference between Comparesetti's position and my own, if some accident had forced him to rewrite his work; for, in that case he might have given more prominence to this remark (Virgilio nel Medio Evo, parte seconda, p. 97)—

" Questa corrispondenza fra i risultati di due fasi diversissime del nome virgiliano è veramente uno dei fatti più considerevoli nella storia di questo nome, il quale nelle sue peripezie, non solo subisce la influenza di più vicissitudini del pensiero, ma molte di queste riassume in è tanto profondamente che ne deviene il simbolo e il rappresentante."

It seems to me that this sentence involves a large concession to the doctrine that the real, solution of the Virgilian problem is in its unity, and not in its diversity.

"CLEANSHIP."

Oxford: August 6, 1889.

In Cockayne's edition of Hali Meidenhad for the Early English Text Society, p. 21, l. 28, we find " to herien hare drihtin & þonken him zearne þat his mihte hare icleanschipe chaste after þatha heften ifondet flesches fulða," which makes no sense.

I am indebted to Mr. G. F. Warner of the British Museum for collating the passage with the MS., which shows that the printed text omits held before ham. Read

" þat his mihte held ham i cleanschipe chaste, a'fer þat ha heften ifondet flesches fulða"—i.e., "that his might held them in cleanship chaste, after that they had experienced flesh's filth."

Possessors of the Early English Text Society publications, and of Mätzner's Wörterbuch, where the passage is quoted under "cleanship," may be glad to make the correction. I fear that Cockayne's edition of O.E. and early MS. texts require a good deal of revision for purposes of modern scholarship. When "the inevitable German" takes them in hand, he will do a service to the dictionary.

Berkeley, California: July 15, 1889.

It seems to me that there should be no special difficulty about the first component of Prof. Napier's new Northumbrian gloss (see ACADEMY, July 29). Surely brond (brand) is well enough known in the sense of "mildew," which is the one here intended. This meaning is the seventh under "Brand" in the New Oxford Dictionary, is common in Modern High German, and recognised in OHG. (Graff. 3, 309), and is, moreover, found as No. 1757 of the Corpus Glossary, where Sweet has "Brondoom," but Wright-Wulker (Anglo-Saxon and Old English Vocabularies, 44, 14) the undoubtedly better reading "brond," "oom," as a gloss for rubigo.

As for the latter half of the Northumbrian gloss, I am scarcely prepared to hazard even a conjecture. On the one hand, since erugini is a dative, one might consider the e following brond to be the dative case-ending. On the other, there is a temptation to assume that we have in egur a corruption of part of the Latin word, namely, erug-. This hypothesis would gain some support from the citation of the corresponding passage in the Old English poetical version of the Psalms, where the translator, unable to extract any meaning from aerugini (or did he have a different Latin text before him?) renders it by erucan. The translation runs in Grein (Ps. 77, 461):

"Sealde erucan yfelan wyrme, lét hiora wyrta westme forelitan."

If the Northumbrian glossator felt similarly uncertain about the Latin word in question, he might possibly have written erugini i. brond, erug. Out of this some copyist, or he himself if he were careless, could perhaps have made brond egur, that is, brondegur. But this is a fancy which I should not think it worth while seriously to defend.

THE UNAUTHORISED REPRINTING OF POEMS.

British and Foreign Bible Society,
London: August 7, 1889.

In reply to Mr. Waddington's letter in the ACADEMY of last week I can only express my hearty regret that some alterations have occurred in the reprint of his sonnet. This was, of course, by oversight, not design. The character of the poem seemed to me to warrant the belief that I only honoured the author by its wider circulation; and that he would have welcomed this. I am sorry that, in a moment of overwork, any miscalculation was made, and that in the rapid passage through the press the slightest injury was done to Mr. Waddington's lines. I have forwarded to him the guinea which he states would have been his charge for the use of the poem.

Hymns from the Rigveda. By Peter Peterson. (Bombay Sanskrit Series, No. XXXVI.)

It is pleasant to notice the publication of any work intended to facilitate the native study of the book which, both historically and poetically, is the most important literary monument of ancient India. Portions of the Rigveda are prescribed among the subjects for the M.A. degree in the universities of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay; and selections from the Sima and the Yajurveda as well are set for the Shastri, or highest examination in the Punjab University. But the knowledge of the Veda acquired by the few students who take up these higher examinations cannot but remain superficial and barren till the results of Western research have been made more accessible to them than has hitherto been the case. If the necessary aids can be supplied, Vedic studies are more likely to be promoted in India by being brought within the sphere of the B.A. degree. The only Indian university, apparently, in which they are prescribed in the B.A. course is Bombay. Here a well selected list of thirty-four hymns of the Rigveda (a large proportion, as might have been expected, coming from the seventh book) has been set for that examination in the years 1888 and 1889. Prof. Peterson's book aims at furnishing the student with the materials necessary for understanding these hymns as far as is possible in the present state of Vedic research.

The volume consists of three parts. The first part contains the text of the hymns in the Samhitā form, with the accents marked as in Max Müller's edition. Prof. Peterson wisely follows the lead of Hillebrandt in printing the stanzas in such a way as to bring out their strophic character. It is, however, not clear why the gāyatrī stanza, which contains three pādas, should not be printed in three lines. It would probably have been an advantage to prefix to each hymn at least the name of the deity invoked, if not that of the metre in which it is composed. For the benefit of such students as do not possess a copy of the Bombay University calendar, it might also have been worth while to insert a list of the hymns the book contains in the table of contents.

The second and longest part (p. 205) contains the Padapāṭha, Sāyana's commentary in extenso, reprinted from Max Müller's edition, but with collations made by Prof. Peterson; and, lastly, copious exegetical notes, embodying, among other matter, the opinions of Max Müller, Roth, and other leading Vedic scholars, on difficulties of interpretation. For the explanation of Vedic forms the student is referred to the Sanskrit grammar of Prof. Whitney, whose chapter on the accent in the Veda is reprinted as an appendix. A few more notes in the department of literary history might, perhaps, have been added with advantage; as, for instance, on the Bṛhaddevatā (p. 105). The student is, however, possibly supposed to consult Weber's History of Literature in such matters.

When Prof. Peterson speaks of Sāyana, quoting the anukramanikā of "Sakaśāyana" (p. 53) he, no doubt, means "Kātyāyana." It is not quite accurate to say that the particle śi is in the Pada text "always put to call attention to a dual" (p. 13). It is rather employed, among other uses, to indicate pragrihya vowel. Duals in d are not followed by iti in the Padapāṭha. In note 1, p. 222, Prof. Peterson rejects Max Müller's reading, abhitah sthitan, as contrary to the MSS.; but the correction abhitah sthan ought surely not to be written as two words. In note 2, on the same page, it might have been added that whether yagnam or yagna be read, Śāyana is misquoting the verse (X. 14, 4) referred to in Aśvalāyana, II. 19.

Both text and commentary appear to be very correctly printed—a matter of no small importance in a work designed for students. The prose translation of the hymns, which forms the last part of the volume, is closely and at the same time tastefully done. To take note of the following points in it will, perhaps, almost savour of hypercriticism. In verse 5 of X. 14, it is hardly admissible to take d nishadya as referring to Yama. In verse 12 of the same hymn Asutrip is rendered "by insatiate" (a-su-); but the Padapāṭha, the accent, and the obvious connexion with the word asum in the same verse, are all in favour of taking the word to be asutrip, "life-devouring." To render rdganau, referring to Yama and Varuna, as "twin kings" may be misleading in verse 7. Some attempt might have been made to reproduce the remarkable alliteration of this latter verse: Prehi, prehi pathibhih paviebhish yatrá nah páruve pitarah parayuh ("Proceed, proceed, along those pristine paths by which our progenitors have passed away").

Some may be of opinion that to furnish the student with notes and a translation only is to make him too dependent, and that a better intellectual stimulus would have been supplied by substituting additional notes and a vocabulary for the translation, and possibly adding a sketch of Vedic accidence and metre. This, however, is after all only a matter of opinion. In any case, Prof. Peterson is to be congratulated on having contributed to the advancement of Vedic study in India; and native students should be grateful to him for having given them so much valuable help towards an appreciation of what is most valuable in the ancient literature of their country.

SOME GEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Fossils of the British Islands, stratigraphically and zoologically arranged. Vol. I.—Palaeozoic. By Robert Etheridge. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) Many years ago, while Mr. Etheridge was engaged in his palaeontological labours as an officer of the Geological Survey, he realised the necessity of obtaining a complete census of the ancient forms of life which are represented in our British rocks. It needed a bold man to attempt such a task—the task of registering the stratigraphical distribution of all the fossil animals and vegetables entombed in the strata of these islands; but Mr. Etheridge felt equal to the work, and set about it in earnest, commencing his labours as far back as 1865. Twenty years passed—every day having recorded at least its line—and he found himself in possession of a mass of manuscript information absolutely unique. Book after book, containing hundreds of columns and many thousands of original references, had been patiently compiled: and every palaeontologist who had the privilege of consulting these registers not only admitted their extreme value, but desired their publication. It was evident, however, that the publication of a dense mass of tabular matter, appealing only to a limited section of the scientific world, would be a serious undertaking and might involve considerable loss. The Clarendon Press is consequently to be congratulated on having undertaken the issue of so useful a work, thus giving to every student of palaeontology the immense advantage of having at his command the stores of information which had been accumulated for the compiler's private use. Mr. Etheridge has given, in his introduction to these tables, an interesting statistical sketch of the progress of British palaeontology. It appears that, going back to 1822, we find only 752 extinct species recorded from all the rocks of Britain. In 1854 Morris catalogued 4000 species; but this number was more than trebled in the next twenty years, for by the end of 1874 no fewer than 13,300 had been described; and in 1888 the number had grown to 18,000. In the present volume the author deals only with palaeozoic fossils, numbering 6022 species, referable to 1588 genera. It is, therefore, evident that some 12,000 species, occurring in the secondary and tertiary strata, remain to be registered; and it is satisfactory to learn from the preface that this mass of matter is already complete in manuscript. Such a work as Mr. Etheridge's hardly admits of criticism of the usual kind, inasmuch as its value lies mainly in the accuracy of its tabular information and its overwhelming multitude of references. All that can reasonably be done is to pick out a few examples and deal with them as test cases. This we have done, and are able to report with satisfaction as to the result. It is only by continued use that the real value of such a work comes to be fully realised. There can be no doubt that to those who are in any way occupied with the study of the palaeozoic fossils of Britain, Mr. Etheridge's volume must prove of great service; while to those who have occasion to name, classify, and arrange a collection of such fossils it will become simply indispensable.

Geology and Mining Industry of Leadville, Colorado. With Atlas. By S. F. Emmons. (Washington: Government Printing Office.) The publication of this volume—which forms the twelfth "Monograph" of the United States Geological Survey—has been anxiously expected for several years, a full abstract having been issued in advance as far back as 1881. Now that the noble volume, with its atlas, is in our hands, it is easy to realise the difficulties and delay involved in its production. The importance of Leadville as a mining centre justified the production of a comprehensive report which should describe the district in detail not less from an industrial than from a scientific standpoint. Mr. Emmons, who was entrusted with the survey of the district, has proved himself in every way equal to the task—a task rendered peculiarly difficult by the high altitude, and consequently inclement climate, of the mining region, by the fact that the surface of the country is concealed beneath detritus, and that when the survey was commenced there was no accurate topographical map for the use of the geological surveyors. Notwithstanding these difficulties, Mr. Emmons has produced a volume which may be described as one of the finest in the series of monographs which the survey has hitherto issued; and this is saying a good deal where the standard all round is so high. The volume is divided into two parts, the first describing the geological structure of the district, while the second deals with the mining industry. Some of the most interesting chapters in the book are those relating to the genesis of the Leadville ores. The ore-bodies are for the most part deposits of silver-ores in the blue limestone, near its contact with over-lying sheets of porphyry, known as white porphyry. The ultimate source of the metallic minerals seems to have been in the eruptive rocks; and analysis of the porphyry has revealed the existence of minute proportions of the heavy metals, including gold, silver, and lead. It is supposed that solutions containing these metals derived from the porphyry circulated through the limestone—which is a dolomitic rock of lower carboniferous age—and as each particle of the carbonate of lime was dissolved out, a particle of the metallic mineral was deposited in its place. The ore was, therefore, not formed in pre-existing cavities in the limestone, but it merely replaced the solid rock by a gradual process of interchange, known technically as "metasomatism." The minerals appear to have been deposited originally as sulphides—as galena, blende, argentite, and pyrites—which by alteration through meteoric agencies became converted into oxidised products. It is proved that the deposition of the ores could not have been later than the orstaceous period. In order to arrive at these conclusions it was necessary that the geological field-work should be supplemented by a thorough petrographical and chemical examination of the rocks and ores. The rocks were accordingly studied, with all the refinements of modern microscopy, by Mr. Whitman Cross, while the ores and rocks were examined chemically by Mr. W. F. Hillebrand. To complete the monograph, it was desirable that the metallurgical operations involved in the treatment of the Leadville ores should be scientifically examined. This work was entrusted to Anthony Guyard—a well-known metallurgical chemist, whose contribution to the monograph has a melancholy interest, in consequence of his sudden death in Paris, followed, as it was, soon afterwards by that of his brother Stanislas, the distinguished orientalist.

Mineral Resources of the United States, 1887. By David T. Day. (Washington: Government Printing Office.) Notwithstanding the importance of the mineral industries of this country, we have no work exactly corresponding with the Mineral Resources of the United States. It is not simply a collection of statistics, like the volume which annually issues from our Home Office; but, in addition to its tables of figures, it forms a repertory of general information on minerals and metals, containing numerous articles of sufficient interest to stamp it with permanent value. The present volume, which is the fifth of the series, is quite equal to any of its predecessors. Coal and petroleum, iron and iron-ores, copper and lead, are, as a matter of course, the subjects which occupy the bulk of the book, each of these subjects being treated in a masterly manner by a specialist. It is, however, among the minor articles that some of the most interesting passages are to be found. Thus, Mr. Packard, in reporting on aluminium, describes the recent advances in the production of some of its alloys, like ferro-aluminium; Mr. Weeks, in dealing with manganese, gives an account of Hadfield's manganese-steel; Mr. Kunz, in contributing his annual article on precious stones, sketches the history of the rise and progress of diamond-mining in South Africa; while Mr. W. C. Day treats of the industries connected with salts of potassium and sodium. Altogether, the Mineral Resources for 1887 is a volume which reflects much credit on the chief of the department of mineral statistics and technology, under whose superintendence it is prepared, and on the Geological Survey, by whose enlightened policy it is given to the world.

Practical Metallurgy and Assaying. By Arthur H. Hurns. (Macmillan.) In connexion with the Birmingham and Midland

Institute, there has been established a School of Metallurgy, of which Mr. Hiorns is the principal. In this capacity, he has felt the need of a text-book for students in his laboratory, and to supply this need has prepared the present work. His knowledge seems to have been derived, in large measure, from the course of instruction at the Normal School of Science and Royal School of Mines, at South Kensington. Those who have passed through the courses at that institution will recognise at once the extent of the author's indebtedness in this direction. All the ordinary operations of the metallurgical laboratory, and the usual methods of dry and wet assaying, are clearly and concisely described; while the addition of a section on electro-metallurgy, contributed by Mr. T. J. Baker, gives a special character to the book. As an introduction to practical metallurgy, Mr. Hiorns's work will be of much service to the student.

The Metallurgy of Gold. By M. Eissler. Second Edition. (Crosby Lockwood.) The processes of gold-extraction have now been brought to such perfection that even low-grade ores can be profitably treated; and the art ought to settle down as a steady industry, removed as far as possible from its speculative phase. Mr. Eissler's long experience of the subject, obtained chiefly in the mining districts of California and Idaho, fully entitles him to write with authority. The new edition of his work has been much improved by the introduction of additional matter, such as a description of the Newbery-Vautin process, which was curiously overlooked in the former issue, though the section on chlorination was otherwise good. As English books on the metallurgy of gold are very scarce, Mr. Eissler's volume will no doubt work its way into favour with practical students of mining and metallurgy interested in the extraction of the noble metal.

Petrographical Tables. By Prof. H. Rosenbusch. Translated and edited by Dr. F. H. Hatch. (Sonnenschein.) The very convenient tables for the microscopic determination of rock-forming minerals, issued a short time ago by Prof. Rosenbusch, of Heidelberg, have been rendered into English by Dr. Hatch, of the Geological Survey. The technical terms have been translated with accuracy, the arrangement of the tables has been slightly improved, and some additional data have been introduced. The student of petrography, with these tables before him, is not likely to go far wrong in the diagnosis of minerals under the microscope.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE following are the arrangements for the forthcoming meeting of the British Association at Newcastle-on-Tyne:—At the first general meeting, on September 11, at 8 p.m., Sir F. Bramwell will resign the chair, and Prof. Flower, the president-elect, will assume the presidency, and deliver an address. The different sections will assemble on the following morning for the reading and discussion of reports and other communications. The following are the presidents of the sections: (A) mathematical and physical science, Capt. W. de W. Abney; (B) chemical science, Sir I. Lowthian Bell; (C) geology, Prof. James Geikie; (D) biology, Prof. J. S. Burdon-Sanderson; (E) geography, Col. Sir F. De Winton; (F) economic science and statistics, Prof. F. Y. Edgeworth; (G) mechanical science, Mr. William Anderson; (H) anthropology, Prof. Sir W. Turner. On Thursday evening, September 12, there will be a soirée; on Friday evening, September 13, Prof. W. C. Roberts-Austen will deliver a discourse on "The Hardening and Tempering of Steel"; on Saturday evening, September 14, Mr. B. Baker will deliver a discourse on "The Forth Bridge"; on Monday evening, September 16, Mr. Walter Gardiner will deliver a discourse on "How Plants maintain themselves in the Struggle for Existence"; on Tuesday evening, September 17, there will be a soirée; and the concluding meeting will be held on the afternoon of Wednesday, September 18. Excursions to places of interest in the neighbourhood of Newcastle will be made on the afternoon of Saturday, September 14, and on Thursday, September 19.

DR. R. SCHÄFER and Mr. H. B. Woodward have called attention, in the August number of the Geological Magazine, to the pressing need of an "International Record of Palaeontology." New species of fossils are being daily described in various countries, and it is of first importance to the student that an authentic register should be preserved. It was one of the objects of the Geological Record to secure such a register; but as this annual has not been sufficiently supported, it is now suggested that the Palaeontological Record should be taken up by the International Geological Congress.

THE Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching has begun the formation of a library of reference of mathematical text-books. It is, of course, intended chiefly for works of recent date; but it contains a loan collection of older works, lent by Mr. F. Hockliffe, of Bedford, among which may be mentioned Cocker's Arithmetic, Tacquet's Elementa Geometriæ, and D'Chales's Elements of Euclid. The library is at present under the charge of Mr. C. V. Coates (2 Prince's-mansions, Victoria-street), who will be glad to receive donations of books, pamphlets, &c., on behalf of the association.

DR. E. J. ROUTH's Treatise on Elementary Statics will be published shortly by the Cambridge University Press.

THE Rev. H. A. Macpherson, author of "The Birds of Cumberland," has published a pamphlet (R. H. Porter) upon The Visitation of Pallas's Sand-Grouse to Scotland in 1888, together with an Account of its Nesting, Habits, and Migrations, prepared chiefly from information collected by Prof. Alfred Newton and Mr. J. A. Harvie Brown. At the end is a rough map, showing the earliest arrivals of the bird. The most noteworthy features in this report are (1) the almost simultaneous presence of flocks of sand-grouse in many parts, including the western and northern islands, during the latter half of the month of May; and (2) their almost complete disappearance before the end of the year. There is some evidence for their having bred in one spot on the Moray Firth; but this evidence is not strengthened by Mr. Macpherson's assurance that he "saw the spaniel that found the nestlings." Though the preface is dated June 25, nothing is said about the appearance of the bird within the present year; nor is any mention made of the "Sand-Grouse Protection Act," which received the royal assent on December 24, 1888.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MR. HUGH RAYNBIRD—whom we assume to have been a missionary in Chutia Nagpur—contributes to the current number of Trübner's Record an Uraon folk-tale of the Sun and Moon, which bears some likeness to the Greek myth of Chronos devouring his own children. Mr. Raynbird adds that he has ready for publication (if means be forthcoming) an ethnological sketch of the Uraons, with a collection of their tales, songs, and riddles in the original, with translations and a full grammar and vocabulary—in fact, an Uraon chrestomathy. The Uraons, or Uraons, as Mr. Raynbird spells the name, are an aboriginal tribe of Dravidian origin in Chutia Nagpur, best known from Col. Dalton's description of them in his Ethnology of Bengal. As they are rapidly becoming converted to Hinduism on the one hand, and to Christianity on the other, it is the more important that we should have an authentic record of their beliefs and customs.

PROF. KÖLBING has published (Breslau: Koebner) a careful and thoroughly satisfactory edition of the three Middle-English versions of Ipomedon, a romance originally written in French by Hue de Rotelande, in the twelfth century. Only one of these versions has been printed before—viz., that of the Harleian MS. 2252, which may be found in Weber's Metrical Romances; and this version happens to be by far the least interesting of the three. The text which Prof. Kölbings has printed from a MS. in the Chetham Library is nearly four times as long, and in all respects greatly superior, though unfortunately the MS. is late and bad. The third version is in prose, and is preserved in a MS. belonging to the Marquis of Bath. Prof. Kölbings's introduction and notes are a marvel of exhaustive research. The index of proper names is only too full. We see no advantage, for instance, in filling a whole page with the numbers of the lines in which the name of Ipomedon occurs. If an index is to be so minute as this, it ought to be so frame as to constitute an analysis of the story. Prof. Kölbings has in preparation an edition of the original Old French poem, which has not hitherto been printed.

Latinsk Litteraturhistorie for Gymnasier og Filologiske Studerende. Af Bastian Dahl. (Christiania: Cammermeyer.) This book is professedly based on a similar but smaller manual by Prof. Onorato Occioni of Rome. We have not seen Prof. Occioni's book; but the present work is certainly superior in fulness of information to any other history of Latin literature, of the same moderate size, that we have seen. Although it may fairly be described as a pocket volume, it gives an account of all the extant works of Latin literature down to the end of the Western Empire, excluding only what may be classed as patristic, together with lists of the MSS. and the more important editions. There are also notices, sometimes very full, of the lost works of which we possess descriptions in ancient writers. Notwithstanding its necessary conciseness, the book is no mere catalogue, but is really interesting reading. The history is divided into five periods, and within the limits of each period the several departments of literature are separately treated. This is the right plan, though it has the disadvantage that the works of writers like Cicero and Seneca have to be dealt with in four or five different places, so that the reader fails to obtain a connected view of their literary activity as a whole. One feature of the book which deserves imitation is the ingenious device (which we have not elsewhere met with) of printing the titles of lost works, and the names of authors whose writings have perished, in special forms of type.

FINE ART.

THE SWORDS OF THE WIKINGS.

Den Yngre Jernalders Sværd. Et Bidrag til Vikingetidens Historie og Teknologi, ved A. L. Lorange. Udgivet ved Ch. Delglobe. (Bergen: John Griegs Bogtrykkeri.) Large 4to, pp. 80 With Engravings and Eight colour-printed Plates.

AFTER the brilliant Bronze culture of Scandinavia comes its Iron Age, now generally acknowledged to be very old, some five centuries before Christ.* This last gradual revolution is for practical purposes divided into two, or perhaps three, periods. But the very last is hard to date, from the paucity of characteristic grave-finds; for convenience it has been commonly called the Heathen Wiking period, from the close of the eighth to the close of the tenth century. Our material is chiefly the contents of grave-hows—the mounds raised over the dead and hiding their grave-gear. In Denmark and South Sweden, however, these grave-mounds are comparatively few when iron first comes in. In any number they are found only in one Scandinavian folk-land (Norway), where, though burning the dead was more common than burial, both customs were in use at the same time in different parts of the country. But the tumuli increase as Iron progresses, and their contents also multiply, with the wonderful result that more than half the old-finds of Norway, from the Stone Age downwards through the Bronze Age, and till the rise of the Wiking period, belong to the narrow Wiking period. For this there must have been a cause; and Lorange reasonably thinks it was simply the continued heathendom of the country, the grave-customs more and more accentuating the gift to the dead of arms and ornaments worthy the halls of Walhall. This signifies a special worship of the Aea-gods by the chief clans of Norway—the surrounding lands being wholly or partially Christian, and heathen tumuli and grave-goods for the deceased having there fallen away, often, in fact, prohibited on pain of death. Hence the extreme scarcity of weapons from this period outside Scandinavia in general, Norway in particular. For instance, the Wiking sword, with its great differences of material and shape and size, but always the special arm of the high-born and the cavalry—in Sweden and Denmark together, the number found scarce reaches 100; in Norway alone, chiefly in grave-hows, the total, as far back as 1885 (and many have turned up since), was, according to that first-rate authority, Prof. Olaf Rygh, 288 one-handed, of the large and costly double-edged 716, while 468 were doubtful—thus, in all, 1472.

Now, more and more during the present century, opinion has gained ground among the leading European antiquaries that the Wiking weapons, especially the sword, were of fine quality, usually far superior to the arms wielded by their foes, were of native Scandinavian make, and, of course, proved the excellence of the iron of Scandinavia and the skill of its smiths. But, the types of the Wiking brands being so distinct and easy to recognise, every such blade, wherever exhumed, in France, England, Germany, or elsewhere, was claimed as Wiking, and brought into connexion with their forays and settlements and conquests. It was at this point, a good many years ago, that the gifted Norwegian archaeologist, A. L. Lorange, keeper of the Bergen Museum, determined to collect facts and to draw his own conclusions. The result is an energetic reaction and protest against the received theories. The one extreme begets the other, and he almost teaches us that the swords were nearly all foreign and imported.

He proves this (1) negatively. He ransacks the metallurgy of the North, especially its iron, collects all references to smith's-work, gathers up local tradition and actual usage in village districts still, and shows that under the circumstances, down to late in the middle age, the production in thinly peopled Scandinavia of a good Wiking-blade at a price possible to a soldier was physically and mechanically impossible. They had no cast iron, still less any puddling. The only iron available there, as in other lands generally, was bog-ore (limonite), from which were painfully extracted, by the well-known primitive wood and charcoal fed furnace and the helpful hand-bellows, small balls of Osmund-iron with their minute percentage of steel, which grew less with every hardening and every welding. Thus, a bog-iron brand would bend or break, as we know that everywhere in Europe it did, even in skilled Gallic and Roman hands. Hence, the gradual introduction into the Roman armies of swords with a greater amount of steel, manufactured for general sale in factories established where the native ore was fitter for steel, and where mechanical appliances and a large supply of skilled labour were at hand. To make sure of victory, the Roman chiefs had even legionary smiths, working with choice local or imported steel. It is, therefore, clear that the Northern smiths could only produce from inland resources everyday things and simple implements—at the best, axes, and now and then a helmet.

(2) Positively.—Legend and saga in the North call their swords "Welsh" (= foreign) or "Hunnish"; and we know that they were acquired by purchase or war from the French and German kingdom of the Franks, from Noricum, the Rhine, Switzerland, Bayeux, Poitou, Dorestad, and elsewhere, splendid specimens being also given to his brother-in-law, Theoderic, the Ostrogoth in Italy, by the Vandal king, Traamund (ob. 523). Thus, heathen or half-heathen Northmen, and Christian or half-Christian Westerns, fought with more or less equal weapons. But the well-armed pitiless pagan was so much the more dangerous; and accordingly Charlemagne and his followers forbade the export of arms and horses to unfriendly lands, just as we English forbid the sale of muskets and powder to our own dangerous neighbours.

(3) Lastly, by direct proof.—Gradually feeling his way by various methods of cleaning, Lorange found that the more or less ruined or eaten blades or fragments were often beautifully damascened in the later or "unflowered" way, and that numbers of them bore either a trade mark, or a foreign manufacturer's name in Roman letters, or both—usually not stamped, but the punched openings filled in with bits of iron or steel or silver wire, hammered down so as to be almost indestructible. Even where the wire was gone, it had left traces. The Northern early iron swords, third to sixth century, damascened or manufacturer-marked, or both, are spoken of by the author at p. 25. On this later "Wiking" class the factory marks are lines or circles, or cross-hatchments of various kinds. More than a dozen swords, wire-named Vlfberht, still remain from Norse finds, besides many where the name part has mouldered away. One maker's short name is Rex. Another little group, but found outside Norway, has a name whose first link is Ingel. Of all these cutlers we know nothing; as little as we do of the firms or factories called "The Wolfmark," Toledo, Solingen, and Andrea Ferrara, whose excellent (genuine or imitated) blades are still so highly prized. I have myself a "Toledo" which, doubled up from hilt to point, springs back again like a flash of lightning.

The above is only a slight outline of a most interesting volume, abounding in all sorts of curious learning connected with the subject. Of course in time students will see that the author has overshot his mark. No one can gainsay that the same Northern races which could locally buy flint in the Stone Age and produce their neolithic masterpieces, which could import bronze and add to their gold in the Bronze Age and make their bronzes the finest in Europe, could also purchase steel and silver in the Iron Age, as we know they did, turning out splendid work with the means at their command, as good workmen can still. That the sword import was yet larger, though the imitation of the foreign models was respectable, we must all admit. There were skilled men in the North as well as abroad, in spite of Scandinavia not having weapon factories.

But still, with all drawbacks, this original essay is the most valuable work ever written by the lamented author, and in several large points it will hold its own. It does honour to Norway and the Bergen Museum which has issued it, as well as to the princely fund ("Joachim Frieles Legat") which has defrayed the cost, and the energetic printer (John Grieg) in his provincial town. It is a sumptuous volume—good paper, and fine types. The museum official, Herr Ch. Delglobe, who has carried out the author's dying wish by seeing the not quite finished MS. through the press with some small re-arrangements, has done his work well, and deserves our thanks. He has added the résumé in French. Of course, we can see that many things would have been shortened or softened down, had the author lived finally to edit his MS.

But now comes my right as fault-finder. There is no index. Nor can I see by what accident the Northern hero in our national epic Beowulf is (p. 26) called a German ("den tyske Beowulf"); and the line referred to should be 1697, not 630. Lastly, one, only one, of all the Wiking swords here spoken of was Runic, bore the name of its owner in Old-Northern Runes, as I was able to point out to my friend Lorange. It was the fine and then nearly perfect two-edged Sæbi brand (Hoprekstad, Sognefjord), taken from a barrow in 1825. Lorange cleaned the blade in 1881, detected the trade-mark, and at once sent me drawings, afterwards kindly forwarding the sword itself with several others to the Danish Museum for my examination and opinion. I found that the staves were Runes; and they were clear enough, one solitary letter being slightly indistinct, but fully legible. My drawing was acknowledged to be correct by the officials, and by my artist, Prof. Magnus Petersen. Yet more, the blade was in excellent condition, the edge on each side a little injured here and there, while the substance of the sword was quite sound. All this will be admitted by anyone glancing at the careful chemitypes in my work. Long before this was published, I communicated to Lorange my reading:

* See hereon my notice of Prof. O. Montelius's valuable work on the Bronze Age (Academy, May 8, 1886, p. 332).

OH ÞURMUB

(Owns-me Thurmuth=Thurmuth is my owner).

He gives it so accordingly, on my authority, on p. 15.

The remarkable fact here was, my discovery and proof that the mark for ÞUR was phonetic, was expressed by Thur's sign, the famous Asiatic Swastika (卐), also found (as I showed) on early Christian monuments for the divine lord in the new creed, CHRISTUS. Just so we write Xmas, but pronounce Christmas, &c. Accordingly, I published my exact chemitypes of the whole sword (one-fifth) and of the runic part separately (full size), in vol. iii. of my folio Old Northern Runic Monuments (1884), with a long text, pp. 407-411; and, repeating the chemitypes, with a very short text, in my quarto Hand-book (1884), p. 242.

Now, as stated by me in my text (folio, p. 408), without my knowledge and by whose direction I know not, this runic blade while in the Danish Museum was treated with strong acid. The result is that the inscription is nearly ruined and can no longer be deciphered. Even more, great gaps are now on the edges above and below, and there are holes right through the very body of the sword, still further destroying the letters themselves. Unhappily, during Lorange's long illness, it is this ruined blade which was sent to Leipzig and engraved for his book (plate iv., 1a and 1b), instead of the chemitypes of the real sword, as given in my folio and quarto. This untoward accident is the only serious mistake in the execution of the plates. It is my right and duty to mention this, as otherwise a reader who perceives that no such inscription as that given in my name by Lorange is now to be seen on the colour-printed plate might think that in 1884 I was guilty of something like "falsarium" or "lively imagination."

The Bergen Museum has generously distributed a number of copies to men of science in different countries, and has also just concluded arrangements by which copies may be obtained in London from Messrs. Williams & Norgate for the moderate sum of twelve shillings.

GEORGE STEPHENS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. RICHARD PINKER—a sculptor whose work in portraiture is rightly esteemed—has just completed in the clay the statue of the late W. E. Forster, which is to be cast in bronze and finally set up on the Thames Embankment. It represents Mr. Forster in the act of addressing an audience—presumably the House of Commons. A book—doubtless none other than a blue book—is held in one hand, and the other hand is placed behind the hip. Mr. Pinker has but a very little softened what has been described as the occasional asperity of aspect which was worn by the regretted statesman. The likeness is upon the whole as true as it is agreeable and convincing; and we are glad that the country possesses—in addition to the medallion in Westminster Abbey—this interesting record of the face and presence of a notable man.

THERE is now on view at the People's Palace in Mile-End Road a loan exhibition of high-class pictures and other works of art, which will remain open until the middle of September. Sir J. Linton has superintended the hanging, and there are altogether 355 specimens, arranged in twelve rooms. Of owners, the largest contribution comes from Mr. D. Massey Mainwaring, including several masterpieces of the old Dutch school, an "Assumption" by Murillo, "The Italian Masquerade" by Watteau, and Sir Joshua Reynolds's portrait of Admiral Keppel. Lord Revelstoke has sent a landscape by Cuyp, a portrait by Rubens of his first wife, and Sir F. Leighton's "Golden Hours"; and Mr. W. H. Smith specimens of Canaletti, Ross Bonheur, and Clarkson Stanfield. Among artists who have lent their own works we may mention Mr. Watts, Mr. Briton Riviere, Mr. Pettie, Mr. John Collier, Mr. Aumonier, Mr. Henry Moore, and Mr. North. There are also a series of Rembrandt's etchings, contributed by Mr. J. S. Heseltine; a collection of drawings in black and white, by Mr. W. L. Thomas; and a set of contemporary copies of Hogarth's "Harlot's Progress."

THE annual congress of the Archaeological Institute has been held during the present week at Norwich, under the presidency of the Duke of Norfolk. Mr. J. Willis Clark, of Cambridge, was president of the architectural section; and the Rev. C. R. Manning, rector of Diss, was president of the antiquarian section.

MR. HENRY LITTLEHALES—who dates from Clovelly, Bexley Heath—has published (Rivingtons) a useful little pamphlet, containing a list of the parish churches in England (not including Wales) which retain special mediæval features, glass, vestments, plate, &c. The list is arranged in alphabetical order of counties, though the principle on which the parishes are classified within the counties is not apparent. It seems that Norfolk has by far the larger proportion of these interesting relics (77 churches); then follow Kent, Suffolk, Gloucestershire, Derbyshire, and Essex. Yorkshire is very poorly represented for its size; while Cheshire, Middlesex, and Monmouthshire have each only one such church. An engraving is given of the pewter christmatory at Granborough, Bucks. Of course, such a list as this can only be tentative; and the compiler will be glad to receive any additions and corrections sent to him at the above address.

MESSRS. TRÜBNER have issued this week, in a handsome quarto volume, twenty lithograph plates containing the copies of inscriptions at Siût and Dêr Bîfeh, made by Mr. F. Ll. Griffith during the winter of 1886-87, when he was working as student of the Egypt Exploration Fund. Mr. Griffith has already given some account of these inscriptions in recent numbers of the Babylonian and Oriental Record.

MUSIC.

MUSIO BOOKS.

Half a Century of Music in England. By F. Hueffer. (Chapman & Hall.) This work was completed by Dr. Hueffer only a short time before his death, and the volume has been prepared for the press by Mr. H. A. Rudall. Had the author revised the proofs himself he would probably have made several alterations. In the introductory chapter, for instance, praise is bestowed in somewhat too liberal a manner, and the list of English composers of repute could have been improved both by addition and by subtraction. In this chapter the author traces the progress of music in England generally from 1837 to 1887, and he had to compress much matter into little space. The production of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was a noteworthy feature of the first year of the Queen's reign; but otherwise the season was described by a contemporary writer as "dull and dreary." But now, what with our Philharmonic, Crystal Palace, Richter, Henschel, and Popular Concerts, not to speak of many other musical attractions, our seasons are busy and interesting. The prominence given to English music at our provincial festivals is one of the many signs of progress. Dr. Hueffer speaks hopefully of the future prospects of English art. He thinks it by no means impossible that a composer worthy to compare with Schumann, Mendelssohn, and other illustrious names, may soon arise in this country. He devotes his next chapter to Wagner, and very naturally makes copious extracts from the recently published Wagner and Liszt correspondence, which he himself translated. Wagner's letter accepting the invitation to conduct the Philharmonic Concerts in 1855 is published for the first time. It was placed at the author's disposal by Mr. Ousins. Wagner visited London three times during the present reign. He came in 1839, a "poor, unknown, and struggling" man; he was here, as just mentioned, in 1855; and again in 1877, when he was at the zenith of his fame. Liszt, of course, has a chapter to himself. His fourth visit to this country was in 1840, as a pianoforte player, when his clever, but apparently eccentric, performances were, with one or two exceptions, unfavourably criticised. After a lapse of forty-six years, he came again in 1886. His reception was enthusiastic, and Dr. Hueffer asserts "that much of this enthusiasm proceeded from genuine admiration of his music." Yet, immediately afterwards, he tells us "that the multitude, even the musical multitude, know little and care less about the real essence of his music." It was, we believe, Liszt's past fame as a pianist—for his praises had been told by many illustrious men and women of note—which caused the excitement. In the account of Liszt's various visits to England (the earlier ones in 1824, 1825, 1827, are briefly noticed) the author found Miss Ramann's Franz Liszt and Moscheles's diary of much service. Berlioz in England is the subject of the next chapter; and many interesting details are given about his doings here, and about the production and failure of "Benvenuto Cellini" in 1853. In a few concluding remarks Dr. Hueffer discusses the question of form. He very properly pleads that a distinction should be made between the essential and the accidental; that no form "be placed on the pedestal of immutable things like a dogma of the Roman Church." Sage advice; but musicians do not agree as to what ought to be retained and what rejected.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

LITERATURE.

CHAUCER.—The Legend of Good Women.
Edited by the Rev. Walter W. Skeat.
(Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

LITTLE more than a half a year has elapsed since Prof. Skeat published his admirable edition of Chaucer's Minor Poems; and already he is re-awakening the gratitude of all students of Middle English and lovers of its great poet by a fresh gift, distinguished by all the excellent qualities of its predecessor. His new volume is not indeed so large nor so varied in its contents as that containing the Minor Poems, nor does it offer to Prof. Skeat's ingenuity and erudition nearly so many knotty points for discussion and explanation. Yet the position of "The Legend of Good Women" in the list of Chaucer's works is one of great importance. To quote the professor's own words, Chaucer

"here, for the first time, writes a series of tales to which he prefixes a prologue. He adopts a new style, in which he seeks to delineate characters; and, at the same time, he introduces a new metre previously unknown to English writers, but now famous as the 'heroic couplet.' In all these respects the legend is evidently the forerunner of the 'Canterbury Tales,' and we see how Chaucer was gradually, yet unconsciously, preparing himself for that supreme work."

Important, however, as for all these reasons the "Legend" is, it has hitherto fared badly at the hands of editors. The introduction into the text of a balade of twenty-one lines upsets the regularity of the numeration of the couplets; and, till Dr. Furnivall arose, no one ever succeeded in counting the number of lines in the poem correctly. Genuine verses were omitted or inserted in their wrong order, and a spurious line accepted after l. 2338. Worse than this, of the two groups into which the MSS. for the "Legend" naturally fall, headed respectively by MS. Gg. 4.27 of the Cambridge University Library, and MS. Fairfax 16 from the Bodleian, until the Chaucer Society published its splendid Parallel Texts only the second and inferior group had been adequately represented in any printed edition. Unfortunately the MSS. of this second group have a bad trick of leaving out very essential words; and thus in edition after edition Chaucer was credited with having written a very large percentage of lines which by no possibility could be made to scan. Among these, however, as Prof. Skeat is careful to point out, we are not to reckon the numerous clipped lines, in which the first foot consists of only a single syllable. On this subject, indeed, the editor has a grievance. The existence of such lines in Chaucer's couplets, both octosyllabic and decasyllabic, cannot be seriously doubted for a minute by anyone who has given attention to the witness of the best MSS. Nevertheless, Prof. Skeat tells us, "most persistent efforts are constantly made to deny this fact, to declare it 'impossible,' and to deride 'him' for having pointed it out." Sad to say, if the present writer's memory is to be trusted, the ringleader in these attacks has been no less a person than Mr. Russell Lowell in his delightful article on Chaucer in My Study Window, published now some twenty years ago. Nor was Mr. Lowell's ear altogether at fault, although in his anxiety for Chaucer's honour he was unjust to Prof. Skeat. Great metrist as he was, Chaucer had yet to feel his way to success; and while he often uses the single-syllable foot with notable effect, often, alas, its appearance raises an unholy desire to tamper with MS. authority! Thus in line 245 of the "Legend."

Or, again, in line 1828—

"Fa | der, moder, husbond, al y-fere,"

the stress falls naturally on the first syllable and helps the sense, as well as the rhythm, of the verse. But often this is not the case, and the stress which falls on such words as "of," "with," "for," "in," &c., is only meaningless and unpleasant; witness such lines as 111:

"Of | this flour, when that it shuld uncloze,"

or, from the prologue to the "Canterbury Tales"—

"In | a gown of faldyng to the kne."

But a great poet's peculiarities, even when regrettable, are not to be smoothed away; and thanks are due to Prof. Skeat for his present able defence of an honest text.

Not the least interesting feature in the "Legend of Good Women" is that the existence of an earlier form of the prologue in the Cambridge MS. enables us to see Chaucer at work. By a little manipulation Prof. Skeat is able to exhibit both the draught and the revised version in a manner which points out very clearly their agreements and differences. Of the 545 lines of which the original prologue consisted about one-half were retained unaltered; while upwards of a hundred were expunged altogether and their place taken by a somewhat greater number of new lines, raising the new total to 579. The longest and most important of the expunged passages is that which (with the exception of ll. 265, 266, and 288) extends from l. 258 to l. 312. Here the God of Love reminds Chaucer of how

"Sixty bokes olde and newe
Hast thou thyself, alle fulle of stories grete
That bothe Romains and eek Grekes trete
Of sundry women, which lyf that they ladde,
And eek an hundred gode ageyn oon badde."

An interesting reference to the extent of one branch of a mediæval poet's library, if only it may be taken literally. The whole passage, with its vigorous ending

"What eyleth thee to wryte
The draf of stories, and forgo the corn?"

is of extreme interest; and, as Prof. Skeat remarks, its preservation in the Cambridge MS. is a clear gain. Many of the altered lines show that Chaucer was more successful than many of his fellow poets in the matter of revision. The famous

"Farwel my book and my devocioun" appears but poorly in the first draught as:

"Farwel my studie, as lasting that sesoun."

and similar improvements abound. All these are very conveniently shown in Prof. Skeat's arrangement of the text; while students who wish to read straight on without regarding such minutiae have only to confine their attention to the second of the two versions.

It has been already said that "The Legend of Good Women" does not offer to the commentator the same field for ingenuity as some of Chaucer's earlier works. At the outset Prof. Skeat seems to have felt this rather keenly, as the first two or three pages of his commentary are needlessly diffuse and discursive, and explain points, such as the use of the double negative, of which it is hardly conceivable that any students likely to use this edition should be ignorant. It is needless, however, to say that as soon as real difficulties begin to arise Prof. Skeat's notes at once attain their usual excellence. Especially good are his explanations of such words as "totelere," "lavender," "estres," "rade-nore," &c., while his references to Chaucer's authorities leave little to be desired. Surely, however, it is misleading to quote Virgil's beautiful line—

"Non ignara mali miseris succurrere disco"

—as having suggested Chaucer's

"And, for he was a straunger, somewhat she Lyked him the bet, as, god do bote,
To som folk ofte newe thing is swote, where the thought seems quite different and much less creditable to Dido.

The useful glossary to this volume, as to the Minor Poems, is mainly, Prof. Skeat tells us, the work of Mr. C. Sapsworth, Scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge. A glossary can be thoroughly tested only by use; but so far as this one errs, it appears to do so chiefly on the side of redundancy. Surely, anyone capable of reading Chaucer at all cannot stand in need of explanations of such current words as "dote," "drake," "erst," "eventide," "fain," "florins," and "forsworn"—glaring superfluities culled from only a few pages. It may be noted, also, that "Forgat" is misprinted "Forgat," that the word "Chevisaunce" occurs in l. 2434, not, as stated, in l. 2439, and that "Halwes," in l. 1310, is better explained as referring to shrines than to saints. But we shall soon be saying, with Edward Fitzgerald, "These are my crosses, Mr. Wesley"; and to note such minutiae is itself a compliment. Everyone who cares for Chaucer must possess himself of this work, and no one who possesses it can be otherwise than grateful to its editor.

"EMINENT WOMEN SERIES."—Jane Austen.
By Mrs. Charles Malden. (W. H. Allen.)

No writer in this series, not even Mr. Ingram in his memoir of Mrs. Browning, has been more heavily handicapped by paucity of material than Mrs. Charles Malden. If it could be truthfully said of any human being that he or she lived a life in which nothing happened, surely no life could more completely justify the saying than that of Jane Austen. Even the books which are probably destined to secure for her a literary immortality slid into the world so quietly that it is difficult to think even of the publication of Pride and Prejudice, or Sense and Sensibility, as an occurrence which rises to the dignity of an event. She was born; she lived for forty-one years, during which she had not the commonplace but always interesting experience of love and marriage; she wrote her half-dozen books; and then she died: this is literally all there is to be told about Jane Austen. Nor does the life of the writer provide any more material than the life of the woman. Her nephew says that while she lived "few of her readers knew even her name, and none more than her name"; and, though Mrs. Malden remarks that "this is, perhaps, too broad an assertion," there is no reason to doubt its substantial accuracy. All the novels of Jane Austen which appeared before her death were published anonymously, not because of that love of mystery which is only one form of the passion for fame, but because the writer had a genuine shrinking from anything like personal publicity, and an equally genuine but much more extraordinary belief that there was nothing in her books calculated to rouse the interest or curiosity of strangers. As a matter of fact, it may be said that while Miss Austen, during her life-time, found not a few appreciative readers, she had been dead some time before the world at large made the discovery that a novelist of exceptional genius had lived and written and passed away.

Jane Austen's father, George Austen, was a member of an old Kentish family, a clergyman, and the holder of two adjacent Hampshire livings, Deane and Steventon, his distinguished daughter being born at the rectory of the latter parish in the year 1775. Her mother, Cassandra Leigh, was the daughter of another clergyman, and niece of Dr. Theophilus Leigh, who held the mastership of Balliol College for more than half a century, and was one of the wits of his day. Mrs. George Austen is reported to have possessed much of her uncle's brilliance; and, though it is by no means easy to make here any definite application of the law of heredity, it seems probable that Jane Austen inherited her intellectual outfit mainly from the Leigh family. At Steventon, the girl who was destined to be known wherever English books have penetrated spent the first twenty-five years of her placid life, beginning early to read, to observe, and to write, but not disdaining more commonplace activities, being a capital needlewoman and a fair musician. Visiting in the country was less easy a hundred years ago than it is now; but the Austens seemed to have mixed freely with the society of the neighbourhood, though Jane's greatest social delight was found in the companionship of her elder sister Cassandra, the object of her life-long devotion and the sympathetic recipient of all her thoughts and plans. As a rule, sisterly love, however ardent, must be to some other passion "as moonlight unto sunlight, or as water unto wine"; but Jane Austen knew no other passion, and so in her little kingdom Cassandra remained supreme. The three or four incipient romances of which she appears to have been the heroine never came to anything; and Mrs. Malden is successful in showing that the love story told with much circumstantiality in the Reminiscences of Sir Francis Doyle is either altogether foundation-less, or is an incorrect version of a true story in which Cassandra, not Jane, Austen was an actor.

Her life was therefore emphatically the life of a writer, and in very early childhood her mind showed its bent in the direction of letters. At twelve years of age we find her providing little dramas for home representation. And a little dramatic jeu d'esprit, "The Mystery: an Unfinished Comedy," which Mrs. Malden has been able to reproduce in its completeness—or rather in its incompleteness—shows that the childish playwright was already a humourist; and that she had even thus early acquired some of that easy lightness of touch which gave to her mature work one of its greatest charms.

Jane Austen was about seventeen when she made her first attempt in narrative fiction; and her two earliest stories were written in letters—an inartistic form which had been made fashionable by the success of Richardson and Miss Burney, but which her true instinct led her soon to abandon. The tales were shortly afterwards entirely recast. One of them, Lady Susan, was thrown aside, and remained unpublished until many years after the author's death; while the other, which had been originally called Elinor and Marianne, received the new title of Sense and Sensibility, and was the first of Miss Austen's novels to be presented to the world. Though written so early, the book did not appear until 1811, and in the meantime she had had a somewhat discouraging experience of publishers. In 1797, Cadell had refused Sense and Sensibility without seeing it; but in 1803, Northanger Abbey was offered to a publisher at Bath, who not only accepted it, but gave its author the magnificent sum of ten pounds. The conclusion of the story is curious. Mrs. Malden tells that:

"on second thoughts the worthy man seems to have repented of his bargain, for he never brought it out, and the MS. remained in oblivion for thirteen years longer. By that time Jane Austen had begun to recognise her position as a successful author, and thought with justice that if she could recover the MS. it might be published without detracting from her fame. Henry Austen, her third brother, who had often helped her in her intercourse with publishers and printers, undertook the errand, and found no difficulty whatever in regaining the work, copyright and all, by repaying the original ten pounds. On this occasion the publishers learnt his error (which Mr. Cadell probably never did); for as soon as Henry Austen had safely concluded the bargain, and gained possession of the MS., he quietly informed the unlucky man that it was by the author of Pride and Prejudice, and left him, we may hope, raging at himself over the opportunities he had missed of making so good a stroke of business."

Pity for publishers may be supposed to be an emotion unknown to authors; but it is impossible to a mere bystander not to pity the poor man of Bath who, even in a very small way, had been the first to appreciate Jane Austen, and who was surely a victim of rather sharp practice on the part of her clever brother. Other publishers were at once more discriminating and less unlucky, and the success of Sense and Sensibility brought her small struggles to an end. Henceforward there is nothing to tell but the story of a quiet continuous success. Her admirers steadily increased in number, among the warmest of them being the Prince Regent—a much abler man than it has of late been fashionable to regard him—who invited her to Carlton House, and expressed his desire to have one of her novels dedicated to him. This was in 1815, when it seemed probable that a long and prosperous career was ahead of her; but the end was nearer than anyone could have supposed. In the early part of 1816, while she was at work upon Persuasion, we find her complaining of feverishness and bad nights. She rapidly lost strength, and it was with great difficulty she finished the book in the July of that year. In the January of 1817 she felt so much better that she began another novel; but again strength failed her, the work was abandoned, and, on July 18, Jane Austen passed quietly away.

Mrs. Malden has done her work carefully and conscientiously; though it must be said that she might, and doubtless could, have produced a volume which would have been more interesting and satisfactory to those by whom Miss Austen's works are known and loved. She has chosen the possibly more useful, but certainly duller, task of endeavouring to attract what, it is to be feared, is the much larger number of those to whom the great writer is almost or altogether unknown; and to this end she gives a summary of each story, illustrated by copious quotations. I cannot think the plan a well-chosen one. The charm of Miss Austen lies not in her outline, but in her modelling; in the finish and harmony of her detail, in her penetrative imagination, in the exquisite delicacy of her literary touch. A mere sketch of the course of her narratives can render none of these things; and even quotation—at any rate, such quotation as is possible in a book of some 200 pages—can render them very feebly and ineffectively. It is not easy to assume the mental attitude of one to whom Jane Austen is a name and nothing more; but my feeling certainly is that were I such a person I should not feel specially drawn to the perusal of Sense and Sensibility or Mansfield Park by Mrs. Malden's summaries and samples. No one will deny that it is difficult to write mere criticisms of books which shall be interesting, instructive, and appetising to those who have not read the books criticised; but though difficult it is not impossible, and the attempt to produce such descriptive criticism is worth making. It has, indeed, been successfully made with regard to this very writer; for it is not too much to say that the ignoramus will obtain a clearer impression of the nature of Miss Austen's power and charm from a few sentences in Macaulay's essay on Mdme. D'Arblay than from Mrs. Malden's six chapters of running description and comment. It is a pity that this should be so, for the author's occasional critical remarks are characterised by a sympathetic discrimination which would have enabled her to produce a really interesting book had she hit upon a happier method.

Of Jane Austen herself this is not the place in which to speak. The remarkable and admirable qualities of her work have long been obvious to every cultivated reader; and of a writer who has justly taken rank as a classic it can do no harm to say that her limitations are not less visible. Her work displays creative imagination, wonderful power of observing, fine feeling for dramatic situation, and perfect command of her literary vehicle; but we cannot help feeling conscious of a certain lack of weight which comes of her steady avoidance of the heights and the depths of human nature. We are charmed always, but seldom, if ever, deeply moved. Though in various respects Jane Austen may be compared favourably with George Sand, George Eliot, and Charlotte Brontë, we feel that these writers have spells of which she knew not the secret. It is in virtue of their combination of veracious and uncompromising realism with unfailing vivacity and ever-present grace that the novels of Jane Austen are unique in literature.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

Swiss Travel and Swiss Guide-Books. By W. A. B. Coolidge. (Longmans.)

It would be difficult to find a better instance of the specialisation of study at the present day than is afforded by this book. Mr. Coolidge, the well-known editor of the Alpine Journal, is recognised as the leading authority on the Alps. He has, doubtless, climbed more mountains and read more books about mountains than any other living man; and now, lo! he comes to us not with a string of thrilling adventures and picturesque descriptions, but with a history of Swiss guide-books, the like of which was never before heard of. We trust that his book will find readers, for, indeed, it deserves them, little attractive as its title may appear. Much of its contents is extremely interesting, and not least interesting are the notes.

The volume consists of two parts of unequal length. The first and longest deals with the subject from which the book derives its title.

"Three main periods may be distinguished in the history of Swiss travel. Roughly speaking, we may say that, before the Reformation, travellers, not being merchants, came to what is now Switzerland bent on some serious errand, military, religious, or medicinal. During the next three centuries Switzerland became the home and field of the renewed study of the physical sciences. Then, from about 1750 onwards, pleasure-travelling came into fashion, confined at first to cities, later extended to lakes and the hills around them, finally aiming at the complete conquest of the highest summits and the exploration of the most remote and most insignificant nooks of the ice and snow region."

The accounts of the journeys of travellers in the first period are all interesting. Pilgrims to Rome from the north and west had to cross the Alps somewhere, and for the most part they chose the great St. Bernard. About 1154, Nicholas, Abbot of Thingö in Iceland, drew up a careful itinerary of the road from Basel to Aosta, and this must be considered the first known germ of the Swiss guide-book. Henceforward, books on parts of the Alps were written from time to time. Most important is Scheuchzer's work (Leyden, 1723), which covers a large area and already foreshadows the modern epoch. We need not here follow our author into his learned and exhaustive bibliographical studies. Suffice it to say that as travelling facilities increased, as roads were made, bridges built, houses of entertainment set up, and so forth, travellers came in greater numbers and for longer visits, and thus guide-books of increasing fulness were required. In 1793 the first edition of Ebel's guide appeared at Zürich, and this soon swallowed up all competitors. The first edition of Murray (founded on Ebel) came out in 1838. Baedeker arose in 1844, Von Tschudi in 1855, and Ball in 1863. Each of these authors wrote for a particular class of travellers. In 1793 Gibbon complained of the "incursions of foreigners" to which Lausanne was then open on all sides; for such Ebel catered. By 1863 the full-blown climber existed in sufficient quantity to make possible the publication of that remarkable work, Ball's Alpine Guide.

In relating the development, which has thus been briefly sketched, our author informs us of a multitude of interesting facts, which are accessible in no other modern work. His long foot-notes are full of good things. But there seems to be no reference to John Evelyn's delightful account of his passage of the Simplon in 1646; and in the list of early huts built at great heights, there is no mention of those on the south slope of Monte Rosa.

The second part of the book is entitled "How Zermatt became a Mountaineering Centre." The history of the village is traced from 1280, when it is first mentioned, down to the present day. The author has laid all manner of materials under contribution, and has produced a delightful continuous story. It is much to be hoped that he will not be contented with this single example of his constructive skill. At the present time, the mediæval village politics of Switzerland might well receive more attention than they do. A charming work might be written upon them, and no one is richer in the needful preliminary knowledge than Mr. Coolidge.

W. M. CONWAY.

An Author's Love. Being the Unpublished Letters of Prosper Mérimée's "Inconnue." (Macmillan.)

ACCORDING to Victor Hugo, if I remember right, Mérimée possessed a grovelling soul. According to M. Jules Lemaitre, who represents one of the latest phases in French criticism, Mérimée's attitude towards the great sum of things was "the most distinguished" that can be adopted by the human "mind" and "conscience." Both blame and praise may well seem a little exaggerated. A man is not necessarily base because he declines, even when summoned by the sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer of Victor Hugo's incomparable verse, to fall down and worship the Republican fetish which that great poet had set up. Neither is it a mark of unusual heroism to affect to despise the world, and yet to neglect no opportunity of securing the world's good things.

Whether Mérimée, however, was base or of supreme distinction, this at least is certain, —and from a critical point of view much more important—that he knew how to write. His stories are admirable. They are well constructed. They are varied in subject. They are short. They are telling. The style, while "sober, expurgate, and spare" of ornament and picturesque detail, possesses a kind of classic interest rare in these Corinthian times, and so retains a charm which is above fashion. In brief, Colomba, La Vénus d'Ille, Tamango, and half a dozen more that I could name, are young still, though half a century has passed since most of them first saw the light. And not only was Mérimée a good book-writer, he was, what many authors otherwise great are not, a delightful correspondent. His letters are all that letters should be, light, bright, graceful, easy, like talk when talk is at its best, yet possessing that daintier perfection of form which belongs to written as distinct from spoken speech.

And his letters have served him in good stead. When he died on the 23rd of September, 1870, amid the crash of the Franco-German War, it may well have seemed as if the interest attaching to his person and fame would thenceforward be very Platonic. Cold and reserved in manner, with something of Britannic formality and aloofness in his general bearing — so at least his livelier compatriots were wont to affirm—it is clear that he did not strike contemporaries as a particularly sympathetic figure. They admired his literary craftsmanship, held in due respect the keen edge of his tongue, and otherwise did not care very much about him. Nor was there apparently any reason to suppose that posterity would care very much either. But with the publication of the Lettres à une Inconnue, in 1873, all this was changed. These letters supplied the human interest which had been wanting in the life of the man who seemed to be so merely a littérateur and man of the world. Here was a Mérimée no longer distant, cold, almost supercilious; but, on the contrary, familiar, kindly, tender—at least in so far as his fair correspondent was concerned—passionate too at times, and perfectly ready to draw aside the veil of reserve with which he habitually hid what was in his heart.

Further, there was a mystery connected with the letters, and also a psychological problem of great subtlety and interest. Who was this mysterious correspondent? What was her nationality? Was she an Englishwoman, as so many of the incidents in the story seemed to suggest? How had her friendship with the famous author escaped observation for such long years? Why did the world find it so difficult to give her a name? Here were several questions round which human curiosity could chafe and dash itself into spray. And beside and beyond such minor questions lay the problem how far this woman—beautiful, rich, unmarried, evidently quite young at the date of the beginning of the acquaintance—how far she had "given all to the false one pursuing her." Had she yielded to his love-sophistries, and been overborne by his passionate array of argument? or had she early recognised that, if she gave all, she might indeed, owing to accidental circumstance, escape one half of Goldsmith's penalty, and not "make a penitent," but that she would inevitably "lose a lover"; and that, virtue apart, it was not worth while to risk the loss of a lover so clever, so sympathetic, so perennially interesting, and with whom it was so delightful to make secret excursions round and about Paris, and to carry on a clandestine correspondence.

The advantage to Mérimée's name and fame of the publication of the letters was so great and obvious that some persons, of cynical temperament, have been found to doubt whether there ever was a real "Inconnue" at all; and whether Mérimée did not invent her, and write the letters in cold blood to serve as a kind of posthumous "mystification." This I do not myself believe. Mérimée was clever enough for anything, and in no sense what the French call "un naïf"; yet even he would have found it difficult to give to a correspondence wholly imaginary such a very genuine ring. The letters, however, being there, the temptation to give them a complement, and supply the "Inconnue's" replies, was great. What more alluring literary exercise than to go through each letter and endeavour to reconstruct in thought the letter from which it partly sprang, or to which it was in part an answer? Is it to a temptation of this kind that we owe the two volumes before me?

The preface helps us very little. It consists mainly of extracts from earlier criticisms on Mérimée's letters; but contains no word that might serve to explain whence the replies had been obtained, or furnish a guarantee of their authenticity. And if the preface is reticent, the "epilogue" is particularly ambiguous. It runs thus:

"By the tideless sea at Cannes on a summer day I had fallen asleep, and the plashing of the waves upon the shore had doubtless made me dream. When I awoke the yellow paper-coloured volumes of Prosper Mérimée's Lettres à une Inconnue lay beside me. I had been reading the book before I fell asleep; but the answers—had they ever been written, or had I only dreamed?—The Author."

After this I think even simplicity itself is not bound to believe that "the author" of these volumes and the "Inconnue" are one and the same person. Would the real "Inconnue," wishing to re-read her dead friend's letters by the shores of the blue Mediterranean, have read them in the "yellow paper-coloured volumes?" Would she have wandered so far into dreamland as not to know whether her answers had ever been written? I trow not. With the help of the "epilogue" it seems not difficult to account for certain slight apparent anachronisms of speech and thought in these letters—anachronisms which might otherwise be puzzling. When I read that "epilogue" I ceased to wonder why letter ci, which purports to bear the date of September 1844, had so distinctly reminded me of Robert Elsmere.

But though the reader of An Author's Love may not feel sure that he is reading a "true story," yet he will be hard to satisfy if he does not acknowledge that he is reading very good fiction. The replies of the imaginary "Inconnue"—if so be, as I venture to think, that she is imaginary—are clever, interesting, and conceived with much dramatic power, though with too great a tendency perhaps to passion and "gush." In short, the correspondence is a correspondence decidedly bin trovato. I can imagine Mérimée himself enjoying it thoroughly, and smiling his fine smile as he compared each imaginary letter with the one he had actually received.

FRANK T. MARZIALS.

The Prophecies of Isaiah. Expounded by Dr. C. von Orelli. Translated by J. S. Banks. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

THE orthodoxy of Germany is the heresy of England. Who can fancy one of our short church commentaries prefaced with such a frank admission as this?

"The traditional views on the origin of many Old Testament books and parts of books cannot be justified upon tenable grounds, as serious-minded research, which seeks but for truth and not for the proof of a thesis, has shown, and will again and again show" (German edition, p. 8).

But even in England and Scotland the clouds are drifting away. An English Wesleyan professor has been found to translate, and an Edinburgh publisher to issue, a part of the first volume of this commentary—that which relates to the much-studied school or succession of prophets known collectively as "Isaiah." The importance of this work is small enough for the pure scholar, but not inconsiderable for the churchman. Direct attacks on critical (as distinguished from hypercritical) Biblical study may in our day be disregarded as overshooting the mark. But the cultivated clerical disdain which is still "waiting," with an affectation of a critical spirit, for something to be "made out" is a more dangerous adversary; and such a book as Orelli's Isaiah, with all its imperfections—nay, by reason of them—may tend to produce a healthful change in the attitude of the clergy towards facts. For both Prof. von Orelli and his friend Prof. Hermann Strack are, in spite of appearances, essentially as orthodox from an English as from a German point of view. They will only concede to criticism as much as they see to be compatible with the highest possible estimate of Old Testament inspiration. And yet see how much they grant! Prof. Strack is not indeed prepared for Maccabean psalms, but as compared with Delitzsch he is certainly a somewhat strict critic; and both Delitzsch and he (and, we may be pretty sure, Prof. von Orelli) are agreed as to the Maccabean date of the Book of Daniel. It is almost needless to add that even in the Hexateuch the right of critical analysis and the existence of some critical results are conceded by this neo-orthodox school with a distinctness which contrasts refreshingly with the opposition or significant silence of leading churchmen in England.

The critical student will, as I have hinted, be disappointed with this book. Prof. von Orelli gives no help towards the settlement of those critical and exegetical problems which, in spite of the facts once for all ascertained, do undoubtedly exist. Bredenkamp's commentary is scarcely larger than Prof. von Orelli's, and yet how much more attention it gives to the open questions! Prof. von Orelli actually endorses as original the symmetrical arrangement of Is. xl.-lxvi. in their parts first suggested by Friedrich Rückert; and he thinks it enough to quiet the troublesome critics of ch. vii.-xii. with the remark that these chapters "form a compact whole," and that "the attacks upon the Isaianic composition of ch. vii. really rest upon objection to the miraculous element in the narrative." Chap. x. 5-xii. 6, too, he boldly assigns to the age of Tiglath-Pileser in the teeth of the monumental statements. And yet if English clergymen can only be induced to follow such a guide as Prof. von Orelli not merely in their private study, but in their public teaching, he will have earned the gratitude of lovers of prophecy. How distinctly he maintains the view, which is at any rate so much nearer historical truth than the traditional, that "Isa. xl.-lxvi. springs from the last of the three sections of the Babylonian exile" (p. 212)! How frankly he admits, with regard to 2 Isaiah and 2 Zechariah, that "the sacred writings of the Old Testament lose nothing in dignity, while they gain in intelligibility, and therefore in value for the reader, if assured results of real science are accepted" (p. vi.)!

The fault which I find with Prof. von Orelli as a church critic is that he determines points which, from his own orthodox point of view, ought rather to have been left open. It were surely madness to deny that the theories which assign certain prophecies in Isa. i.-xxxix. to dates later than 586 B.C. are highly plausible. The right course would have been to admit this, and to add that the commentator waited for more light, being anxious to avoid disintegration so long as any hope of psychologically explaining Isaiah's authorship of these chapters, and so magnifying his divinely given power of predicting the future, could fairly be cherished. I do not think that the critical remarks on Isa. xiii. 1-xiv. 23 and the other disputed chapters will often strike any well-trained student as having more than a provisional value, as being more than a sop to the questioning intellect not yet arrived at its full strength. Nor is this misplaced dogmatism compensated for by helpfulness either in linguistic difficulties or in Biblical theology. The philological notes are meagre in the extreme. Only in text-critical matters is there a sign of somewhat more boldness than we are accustomed to in orthodox critics—a boldness which, of course, falls far short of Klostermann's or Bredenkamp's. On Biblical theology more suggestive notes certainly ought to find a place. That the author of Old Testament Prophecy—now becoming pretty well known to the higher class of our students—could have furnished such I cannot for a moment doubt.

The greatest drawback is the woodenness of the translation. What is to be said of "Howl, ye Tarshish-farers" (p. 135); "The earth aches [?] and pines" (p. 140); "Those strike up loud songs" (p. 140); "For a place of horror is prepared of old" (p. 175); "I girdled thee" (p. 255); "A Miracle of a Councillor" (p. 63); and many another unfortunate or unintelligible collocation of words? It will, I think, be hopeless for this volume, in its present form, to compete with Dr. Driver's more complete, more thoroughgoing, and not less fundamentally Christian text-book on Isaiah. In his next edition the author will, I suppose, take account of this fine specimen of moderate and reverent criticism, and perhaps correct his unintentionally misleading references to myself (see p. 346, for instance, where I am made to say the opposite of what I have really stated, and many a passage in which my early volume of 1860 seems to be referred to). If he will also make some concessions to the not unfriendly criticisms offered above, I shall welcome him as an ally in the advocacy of that compromise which the clergy must soon enter into with a power too strong for good or evil to be slighted—the historical criticism of the older Scriptures.

T. K. CHEYNE.

The Divine Comedy of Dante. Translated into English Verse, with Notes, by J. A. Wilstach. In 2 vols. (Boston, U.S.: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

THE public is again presented with a new translation of Dante. It is one which, unfortunately, cannot be pronounced successful either in form or execution. The form seems quite original; and in the absence of any explanation or justification of its choice by the author it is difficult to divine the motive for such a selection. It consists of stanzas of nine lines each, at first sight like those of Spenser, but with a very peculiar arrangement of the rhymes as follows:

a bb a cc dd ee | d ff gh gg ii, and so on. This complicated system of rhymes has the disadvantage of retaining all the difficulties involved in a tersa rima translation, without the counterbalancing advantage of preserving (more or less) the metrical form of the original.

Next as to the execution, the author starts with the excellent principle that "fidelity to the Italian poet has been the jus et norma of the translator dealing with the text." How far he has succeeded in this may best be judged by allowing a few specimens of one of the most familiar cantos to speak for themselves. We will take Inf., canto iii., 1-9:

"Through me are found the grieving City's walls,
Through me the way is to eternal pain,
Through me those lost are never found again.
Justice the Founder urged of my grim halls,
And Power Divine which reared the courts above
And Wisdom Infinite and Primal Love.
Save things eternal, was created nought
Before myself, eternal I and drear.
All hope surrender, ye who enter here."

Again, ll. 11, 12—

"Above a gateway's lofty arch of gloom,

L. 18,

"Oh'hanno perduto 'l ben dell' intelletto," appears as—

"Who God, the mind's best dower and prop, have lost."

Worse still is the rendering of the terzina, ll. 37-39—

"Mischiate sono a quel cattivo coro,
Degli Angeli che non furon ribelli.
Nè fur fedeli a Dio ma per se' loro."

"Mixed are they with that choir, nor bad nor good,
Of Angels, not for rebels, imps and elves,
Nor not for God, but only for themselves."

The construction here is so obscure that one almost suspects some misprint. L. 97,

"Quind' fur quete le lanose gotte," is expanded into—

"Then to the woolly cheeks, which thus had got A fitting answer, fitting quiet came."

Passing over many other similar passages that we had marked, we will only add the last line of the Canto—

"E caddi come l' uom cui sonno piglia."
"I fell like one who slumber cannot brook."

We may compare with this the still more celebrated conclusion of Canto V.,

"Mentre che l' uno spirto questo disse
L' altro piangeva sì che di pietade
Io venni meno e com' io morisse;
E caddi, come corpo morto cade."

which appears thus—

"And so was moved
The other spirit that his sad eyes missed
No word of hers that he wot not with tears.*
And pity made me faint and chilled with tears
And grief; and fell I as the dead, who nothing list."

In what possible sense can this be called "translation"? One of the worst instances of this expansion of the original, because the writer does it with his eyes open, and adds a note calling attention to it, is in Purg. iii., 137, when the beautiful line,

"Mentre che la speranza ha fior del verde"— is translated

"Long as hope's torches in the bosom burn!"

to which the note is added—"The extinguished lights of the Bishop of Cosenza (see l. 132) have suggested a metaphor beyond the letter of the text"! I am far from pretending that nothing that Dante wrote is incapable of improvement; but it is clearly no part of a translator's office to undertake it, and he must be a bold man who thinks he can improve upon the incomparable episode of Manfred. We are not informed why the author has performed a similar office for Inf. iii. 54:

"Ohe (sc. insegna) d'ogni posa mi pareva indegna."

"That pause it scorned, as doth a furious steed."

It is possible, however, sometimes to be too literal, and by a mere verbal or etymological repetition of an original word to produce a wholly different or quite inadequate idea. Thus "mortal scroll" for "scritta morta" in Inf. viii. 127 scarcely conveys any meaning at all; nor does "nursing Rome"† for "alma Roma" in Inf. ii. 20; and Can Grande della Scala is hardly recognisable as "the Great Dog of the Ladder" (vol. i., p. 9).

The notes added to each canto are sometimes interesting, especially when Mr. Wilstach cites parallel passages from Virgil, of whose works he has made a special study, and has already published a translation. But the notes need careful revision, since inaccuracies and other mistakes are not infrequent, to say nothing of occasional sheer flippancy and irrelevance. As an example of the two latter, take the note on Inf. vii. 1, where it is supposed that the description of Plutus "clucking" in alarm at the invasion of his

* Observe that the original for all the words in italics is simply piangeva.

† This epithet, the difficulty of which was felt by several of the old commentators, seems to mean something like "benignant" or "gracious" in the obsolete sense of benefit-conferring—s.g.,

"So hallowed and so gracious is the time."
Shakespeare.

This would be explained by the many passages in which Dante dwells upon the numerous blessings to the human race of which Rome has been the source (s.g., Conv. iv. 2, 4, 5; De Mon. ii. 11, 12; Purg. xvi. 108, &c.; Par. vi., and other places). I believe the only other place where Dante uses the word is in Par. xxiv. 138, where it seems to have much the same meaning. The words refer to the inspired authors of Scripture, "Poiché l'ardente Spirto vi fece almi," which Mr. Wilstach not very happily renders "When nursed your writing mood the Holy Spirit first."

dominions is suggested to Dante by "some scene in Florence wherein he figured as an unsuccessful applicant for an accommodation at a bank. He probably has had reason to dread the bank-messenger"! &c. Also see Inf. xix. 52-57, where we have a note of portentous length—appropos (?) of the strife of Guelfs and Ghibellines—on the treatment of the religious question in the constitutions of the United States, with the comments of various American judges, and the remarkable obiter dictum of the author himself that Roger Williams, one of the original Baptist settlers of Rhode Island (1636), was the Dante of his times!

To justify what was said about mistakes, take the following: In Inf. xiv. 32, the words attributed apparently as a verbatim quotation to the letter of Alexander to Aristotle are quite imaginary, and very vaguely represent anything in the original. In the next note, on l. 57, Mongibello (i.e., Etna) is comically derived from the Latin Muloiber, whereas it is known to be a tautologous compound of Mons or Monte, and Djebel, the Arabic name for "mountain." (We have an exact parallel in English in such names as Penhill, Pinhoe, Pentridge, and others.) On p. 1, Good Friday is said to have been on March 25, 1300, whereas it was certainly on April 8. When on i., p. 415 Charles of Anjou is described as "the descendant of the poet's friend and benefactor (?), Charles Martel, of Hungary," it is possible that there is merely a slip or misprint for "ancestor." He was, in fact, his grandfather. There is a curious piece of purely a priori and imaginary mythology in the note on Purg. xxxiii. 49: "The Naiades offended Themis. She punished them with loss of cattle and crops"! The fact is, as is well known, that the Naiades are wholly out of place here, Dante having been misled by the lect. fals. "Naiades," instead of "Laiades," which was found in his day in the passage of Ovid which he is imitating. It is singular to find a translator of Virgil quoting from Cicero, De Amicitia (i., p. 186). But the most astonishing blunder of this class occurs on i., p. 344: "The name 'Lethe' suggests a potent name in modern authorship"—viz., Philaethes! Before it could suggest this it must have produced its natural effect in respect of the rudiments of Greek.

Hermia and What Dreams may come. By Gertrude Franklin Atherton. (Routledge.)

To a critic, the primary interest of Mr. Rider Haggard's new book is its style. It has been the vogue to decry this author for his lack of literary refinement, and there is no doubt that few successful novelists have given so many hostages to eager and jubilant foes. But to the present writer, at any rate, it is clear that much misapprehension has existed on this point. A backward mental glance, a reminiscent survey of Mr. Haggard's writings, evokes a sentiment of interest and sympathy; for they display, one by one, amid much crudeness and commonplace, a steady growth towards a style. Tentative efforts are always interesting; and though in its highest phases style is so absolutely the blossom of a rare and perfect human plant that it may be considered as inborn, it is also, in nine out of ten instances, a thing to be consciously cultivated and trained to a high degree of beauty and grace. The greatest of novelists are not the most perfect of artists, though they have wrought the most perfect episodes, fashioned the most lifelike personages, and depicted the most memorable scenes. For whether, as in Defoe, directness of narrative, or, as in Scott, romantic imagination, or, as in Balzac, the passionate quest of verisimilitude, dominates the creative impulse, it is obvious to the critical reader that each of these three great masters and archetypes is often heedless, sometimes to the verge of recklessness, of the real, or imaginary, or fantastic, so-called "exigencies of art." Except in the high art of simple, vivid narrative, Defoe has no claim to be considered a stylist among the masters of fiction. Scott never wrote a flawless romance, for even the Bride of Lammermoor has radical shortcomings; and in all the marvellous range from Eugénie Grandet to Le Lys dans la Vallée, from Cousin Pons to Peau de Chagrin, Balzac never once omitted a varying proportion of irrelevant, and therefore inartistic, detail. Yet Defoe, Scott, and Balzac tower above far more technically perfect writers, such as Flaubert, Gautier, Daudet, Guy de Maupassant, even as giants among pigmies. To return to the matter in hand: the greatest novelists have always evolved a style, through many tentative efforts and failures; and it is therefore foolish to assert that this or that author will "never do anything" because he has spluttered and splashed instead of swimming quietly in his earliest "dips" into the sea of fiction. It would be carrying the argument to absurdity to urge that all tentative efforts should be regarded with a solicitude so tender as to be mawkish. It is a truism that a hundred failures go to one real or partial success, just as a thousand acorns may fall in vain ere one shall survive all mischances and become an oak. But when an author has written several books, and when in each there is manifest a distinct advance, or at least a strong tentative effort towards a better style, it may be taken for granted that his aesthetic sense for language is simply less developed than that of his, in this respect, more accomplished fellows. It is no reproach to a writer that he has attained, instead of having inherited, what is called "style." Now, though in Cleopatra Mr. Haggard writes often in commonplace fashion, sometimes heedlessly, and occasionally even indulges in slovenly collocations and inexpedient devices, he displays a very marked advance in literary composition. In the face of serious difficulties, some obvious and others probably beyond the view of the ordinary reader, he has attempted in this historical romance a feat that might have daunted the bravest literary adventurer. The shadow of a great genius has long seemed to wait warningly before the story of "Royal Egypt" and "peerless Antony"; and it required a brave spirit, or a very audacious one, to face the inevitable comparisons and detractions. Yet, of course, any such comparisons are absurd, for the method and manner of dramatic poetry have no more to do with the manner and method of fiction than, as it used to be the fashion to say, with Mesopotamia. Cleopatra is so able an historical romance that one is tempted to believe Mr. Haggard may have just awakened to his capacities as a novelist: that, in a word, he may have a future. In everything save in style, he has escaped failure where such past masters in the art as the German Ebers and the Austrian Hammerling have only relatively succeeded. It is beside the mark that Mr. Haggard has neither the profound yet vital learning of the writer of Uarda, nor the exquisite insight, grace, and charm of the author of Aspasia. He has something which both Ebers and Hammerling lack—swiftness of movement, forceful directness of narrative. It would be useless to dilate upon Mr. Haggard's conception of his chief personages, for, naturally, there are readers who will differ as widely upon the character of Cleopatra as Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Skelton do upon that of Mary of Scotland. Speaking for himself, the present writer thinks that Charmian is the most lifelike and impressive personage in the tale, and that Antony is the most shadowy and unsatisfactory. In point of weird and grandiose fancy, perhaps I should say imagination, the author has written nothing to surpass one or two episodes in this book.

The new production by the lady who writes under the pseudonym of "Annie Thomas" has the radical fault of most three-volume novels—it is too long. Of course, critical cavil is not justified because the story in question expands to close upon seven hundred pages. It might be of double that length, or treble, and yet be a work of due proportion. But of its six hundred and eighty-two pages, five hundred seem to me quite unnecessary. The story, such as it is, could have been easily told within the remaining number of pages, and, in all probability, would then have conveyed a much stronger impression. It is not fair to condemn a book simply because it does not interest one; therefore I will content myself with saying that readers who have enjoyed Mrs. Pender Cudlip's previous stories will undoubtedly relish her latest society tale. It is brightly written, if without reserve or any distinctive quality.

Mrs. Riddell's new book consists of three stories, of which much the longest is "Princess Sunshine," and the most immediately interesting, "A Terrible Vengeance." The third is a clever, but not very novel poison story, called "Why Dr. Cray left Southam." In the chief story, which is worthy of the popular author of George Geith, Mrs. Riddell has scope for her best qualities; yet in her endeavour to create a new type in Gregory Gifford—a type with which she is evidently only theoretically familiar—she seems to me to have failed curiously. The excellent and literary Gifford is not real; if he were so, he would be of the prig, priggish, which he is certainly not meant to be. The story is told with some power as well as grace, and is in its degree a work of art, well proportioned and carefully worked out as it is. It is marred occasionally by such banalities of commonplace, on the part of the author herself, as "Ah, me! Ah, me! how many gallant soldiers the world wots not of are at this moment fighting battles that will never be chronicled in any earthly record," &c.

Under a Strange Mask has not the spontaneity and individuality of that delightful book The Admirable Lady Biddy Fans; but here, as elsewhere, Mr. Frank Barrett manages to engage the reader's close attention. It is dubious policy, however, to rely upon such an outworn device as that of "the lunatic relative in the west wing of the old manor-house," on the one part, or, on the other, to trust too much to the heedlessness of readers, as where Lord Redlands is described as making a discovery of iron ore on his estate, from evidences which were unmistakably obvious, and could by no reasonable possibility have escaped the notice of his "forbears." Mr. Barrett's strong point is invention, but in this respect he is not seen to advantage in Under a Strange Mask.

Mr. Evelyn's Australian story is evidently the production of one who has never seen the Southern Cross. It is a boy's romance rather than a novel, and not a very successful one at that. Can the shade of the immortal G. P. R. James have inspired the author of Captain Kangaroo? I seem to recognise the once beloved and familiar strain:

"... across which, one day near Christmas of the year 184—, a horseman might have been seen wending his way. He was a young man, ... but bearing the unmistakable stamp of a gentleman" (p. 32).

The next four or five books on my list all happen to be of American origin. Captain Charles King is a highly popular military novelist—the James Grant of the States—though less verbose and more vigorous in style than the author of The Romance of War. His latest book is a romance of frontier life, and, despite its title, has nothing to do with lunatics. It is a capital story of its kind, brightly told.

Less ably written, but perhaps likely to prove more generally interesting, is the Romances of an Altar Ego, by Mr. Lloyd Bryce. It is a story of confusions manifold, resulting from the identical physiognomies of two very different individuals; and mesmerism and thought-reading play their now familiar parts in mystification.

Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton is a charming story-teller. There is not one of the fourteen tales in her new book which will not afford pleasure to "the general reader." They are concise, vivid, and excellently written; on the other hand, it may fairly be objected that her heroes and heroines are conceived too similarly. There is a vague and illusive yet none the less perceptible resemblance among all the men and among most of the damsels. Individually, each story is delightful; collectively, they prove, or seem to me to prove, that the author is wise in refraining from the dangerous venture of a novel.

The two stories by Mrs. Gertrude Franklin Atherton, the Californian novelist whose name has of late been so much before the American public, are authorised reprints. As such, a brief word must suffice for them. What Dreams may come is a romantically conceived, and rather too romantically written, psychological tale, very able in parts and occasionally truly imaginative. It is crude in style and sometimes in thought, and the dialogue in particular is often forced and unnatural. Still, it is a book of note, and is likely to interest deeply many readers. Hermia: an American Woman, on the other hand, is a work of singular promise; perhaps, even, it justifies those who look to Mrs. Atherton as the coming American novelist. It is easy to understand how it has passed through so many editions, and encountered such a clamour of abuse; for, though absolutely void of just cause of offence, it is at once unconventional and true to life. In the main, it is written with skill and verve, though it is to be hoped the author has already outgrown an occasional exasperating tendency to rival one or two of her country-folk in the introduction of fantastic and exaggerated epithets. Metaphors and similes: alas, what destructive reefs beset the frail shallop of the literary voyager! But Hermia must be read; it is a significant book.

WILLIAM SHARP.

SOME SCOTCH BOOKS.

Out-of-Door Sports in Scotland. By "Ellangowan." (W. H. Allen.) Whether to console the man who cannot this year visit Scotland, or to amuse him who fortunately finds himself in a Highland lodge, no pleasanter book can be desired than this. By means of the latest and most authentic statistics, the author tries to give a true account of the cost and probabilities of sport at present attainable by the devotees of fishing and shooting. Too many books on Scotch sport reflect the past rather than the present state of the Highlands. Appended to the chapters which treat of the stag, grouse, and salmon, are anecdotes of poaching and of gamekeepers, of the patrons and parasites of sport, which lighten the book; while a couple of essays on golf and curling succeed better than any other papers which could be pointed out in acquainting the Southron with the mysteries of these national Scotch sports. "Ellangowan" calculates that no less than fourteen and a half million acres are available in Scotland for the animals of sport. There are more than a hundred deer forests, let on an average of 1s. 6d. per acre; and it is calculated that each stag which the lessees of these shoots costs fifty guineas. When he states, however, that salmon-fishing is the most costly of all Scotch sports we should certainly differ. Rivers can be procured at reasonable rates, or, at all events, rods can be procured on rivers by those who possess any experience. The estimate of £5, too, for each salmon is as a rule too high. It is supposed that a hundred thousand pounds are spent annually in Scotland upon trout and salmon-fishing. Tweed salmon, it is calculated, costs the angler £2 each; and this may well be true. Similarly, each Loch Leven trout costs its captor five shillings. As for grouse, it is supposed that in a good season 500,000 brace a year will be shot, each of which costs the lessee of the moor a sovereign. "Ellangowan" carries his statistics further; and, assuming that each of the 2500 shootings and stalkings in Scotland is visited by only ten persons, calculates that the mere travelling expenses of these amount to £500,000 at £20 for each person. One chapter contains a good account of the Salmo ferax. Indeed, the whole round of Scotch sports is ably passed under review in this book. These chapters are somewhat discursive at times, and show a good deal of repetition. Nor is careless writing sufficiently guarded against. The author "remembers of" a thing two or three times. He uses big and often vulgar words: "reliable" for "trustworthy"; "expiscate"; "intestinal" for "intestinal," and the like. Sandy is fond of fine words, and always calls a man an "indevedual"; but to make a hill-shepherd talk of "the contingencies and vicissitudes of the lives of grouse" is unreal. Shooters of the bird will be amused at "Ellangowan's" specific against thirst on the moors—to masticate a fresh-pulled turnip! He omits to say how this vegetable can be found on a heathery expanse. Indeed, his gastronomic tastes are curious. He recommends farmyard or granary rats as an article of diet. They are "quite as palatable as rabbits when nicely cooked." His suggestion that young men should improve their shooting by practising at innocent gulls comes with bad grace from a sportsman, who, like a fisherman, is generally humane, whatever the popular view may deem him. These are, however, blots on what is both an amusing and a useful book.

An Edinburgh Eleven, by Gavin Ogilvy, ("British Weekly" Office) cannot be said to challenge comparison with the larger of Mr. Barrie's works, such as Auld Licht Idylls and A Window in Thrums. It consists of a series of twelve sketches, photographic and anecdotal, of Edinburgh professors and other notabilities, including Lord Rosebery, Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson, and Mr. Joseph Thomson, which had previously seen the light in a well-known weekly newspaper. They are clever, of course, but it was hardly worth while to publish them in volume form. Certain of them, particularly the papers on Lord Rosebery and Mr. Joseph Thomson, are suggestive of "cracking up," if not of log-rolling. The subjects of others again, such as Profs. Calderwood and Chrystal, may be good enough for Edinburgh students to tell comic stories of in their rooms, but who out of this special circle cares for them? Incomparably the best paper in this collection is that on Mr. Stevenson. It is a piece of keen, candid, but not unkindly criticism. It is well that the author of The Black Arrow should be told that his self-consciousness has become self-satisfaction, that "the critics have put a giant's robe on him, and he has not flung it off." There is hardly a sentence in this essay which is not worth tons of facetiae, such as "Prof. Calderwood sees the ladies into the cabs himself; it is the only thing I ever heard against him"; and "In appearance he (Thomson) is tall and strongly knit rather than heavily built, and if you see him more than once in the same week, you discover that he has still an interest in neckties." This is not humour; it is not wit; it is merely that atrocity known as "comic copy."

Quiet Folk, by R. Menzies Fergusson (Simpkin Marshall & Co.), is a rather thin book, in almost every respect inferior to My College Days, which, as "edited" by the same hand, we noticed favourably some time ago. Mr. Fergusson, although he occasionally writes with a pretty pensiveness which is not, however, free from the suggestion of affectation, is at his best when he is in his undergraduate vein. He seems very fond of St. Andrews, and rather too fond of quoting Mr. Andrew Lang's verses in praise of it; while his commendation of certain of the teachers in that university, and particularly of Principal Tulloch, is unstinted. Mr. Fergusson should not attempt anything in the way of criticism. When he does, he merely strings together a number of commonplaces. It is really too bad to tell us at this time of day that Homer is "a revealer of what before existed, but which lacked the spirit of life"; that Wordsworth "seems to be the prophet of the spiritual aspects of the world, as well as the prophet of the moral experiences of the soul"; and that Scott "re-united by the golden band of genius the past of the Elizabethan period with the present of our Victorian era." Some of the Scotch character-sketches that appear in Quiet Folk, such as "John the Bellman," and "Old Andrew," give the impression of reality. Mr. Fergusson's sympathies, too, are sound, and his stock of enthusiasm is practically limitless. Yet, in truth, Quiet Folk was hardly worth publishing.

The Historical Families of Dumfriesshire. By O. L. Johnstone. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.) This is a second edition of an interesting and, on the whole, well-executed book, which gives a full and painstaking account of the Johnstones, the Kirkpatrick, and the various other families that have played their part in the once stormy history of Dumfriesshire. Mr. Johnstone's heart has evidently been in his work; and the trouble he has taken in connexion with it may be gathered—to give only one illustration—from the minuteness with which he discusses the (locally) momentous question whether Newbie Castle and Gretna or Graitney passed direct from the Corries to the lord of Johnstone, which has been a leading subject of dispute, not only when the Annandale peerage question was settled, but in 1772, in a case heard before the Scottish courts, on which occasion the Earl of Hopetoun, curator-in-law of the last Marquis of Annandale, produced on his own behalf a charter settling Newbie on William Johnstone of Gretna, and his wife Margaret Crichton, in 1641. In the second edition of his book, Mr. Johnstone has included a chapter dealing with the Border war of the reigns of Robert the Bruce and Edward I.

The Story of Alastair Bhan Comyn. By the Lady Middleton. (Blackwood.) This is a sort of amphibious book. Ostensibly it is a poem, divided into sections; but the interstices are filled up with historical and other notes. Lady Middleton is wrapped up in her gruesome subject—the tragedy of a scion of the House of Comyn who is ruthlessly smoked to death by his enemy, the Earl of Moray, in spite of his love for that earl's dearest possession—and she writes in what may be described as a well-educated, rather than a ladylike style. But her prose is more truly poetic than her poetry, and contains a good deal of valuable historical information and criticism. Of the poetry here is a specimen:

"I feign attack on Raikes, and spur that foe,
'I the West, through hope of mine alliance, to oppose Raikes and Lochaber; Raikes, so rumour lauds,
Bound nobly by his pledged aid, will trust
To others, as Dunphail, his home's defending;
When by a counter movement, I can turn
And seize Dunphail, disgarrired and weak.

Sometimes Lady Middleton's verse tends to farcicality as in

"Ah! Mothering Instinct of Woman, so holy, intense, and so pure.
Will ye start into life, into loving, at the claim, for the cause, to the cure,
Of a mere withered Leaf!"

On the whole, it is to be regretted that Lady Middleton had not made a prose romance of her tragedy of Dunphail. Her wolf-faced serving-woman would, in that case, have been a great success.

Sir William Wallace, and other Poems. By A. A. Douglas. (Glasgow: Douglas.) Mr. Douglas means well, and his ideas are worthy of all commendation. But there seems no good reason why he should have poured forth on the reading public this flood of commonplace verse upon almost everything and everybody under the sun, from the great Scotch patriot to the late Lord Iddesleigh and Bill Scott the Surfaceman. The average quality of Mr. Douglas's verse may be gathered from

"I've stood in Modern Jericho, Jerusalem I've seen,
I've floated on Sweet Galilee,
To Nazareth I've been."

and

"'Tis then, sweet lass, we lonely stray
To Bothwell's ancient toon,
And tell the aft-repeated tale,
Kind lass o' Uddingston."

Janet Hamilton, and other Papers. By Joseph Wright. (Edinburgh: B. & R. Clark.) The bulk of this little book is composed of reminiscences of Janet Hamilton, the humble and blind Scotch poetess, whose character and writings were so much appreciated by the late Mr. Bright. These sketches certainly show Janet—who was, so far as all her domestic relations are concerned, most happily situated—to have been a very remarkable woman, who in some respects had more of the spirit of Burns both as a poet and as a politician than almost any of his imitators. Of few folks in her "station of life" can such action as the sending to Garibaldi of a nugget of gold presented to her by one of her admirers be recorded. Mr. Wright appends to his reminiscences of Janet Hamilton a few papers and poems of his own, dealing chiefly with the religious side of Scotch life. They are simple and unpretentious almost to a fault. The fidelity to truth of

"October, when the sun sets red,
An' dips down ower the brae
Whan kintra bodies lift their neeps,
An' bairnies pu' the alae."

prevents the descent into bathos of the poem of which it is a stanza.

The Falls of Clyde, and other Poems. By the Author of "Law Lyrics." (Paisley: Alexander Gardner.) This author is not seen to such advantage in serious verse as in his "Law Lyrics," although some of those were rather unkempt. He writes of his favourite stream with great enthusiasm and vigour, and with due regard to grammar; but somehow the typical Frenchman's "magnifique!" is suggested by such lines as "Terrific are thy Falls, sublime thy heights,

O! beauteous Clyde! Majestic are thy floods!
Celestial, pure thy storm-lit, radiant bows!"

At the same time this writer, although he treats conventional subjects after a somewhat conventional fashion, has a genuine love of Nature, and has penetrated into some of her least-known haunts. He has also a turn for writing baby verse. Occasionally he makes a true graphic hit, as in "His lips like curving cherries Made to marry."

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE hear that Mr. Browning has thirty fresh poems, short and long, ready for his new volume; but it will not be published till October.

LORD TOLLEMACHE, of Helmingham, has lent Dr. Furnivall his unique vellum MS. of the first prose englishting of the "Dices and Sayenges of the Philosophres." It dates about fifty years before Caxton made and printed his translation, which is independent of that in the Helmingham MS. The comparison of the two versions is full of interest for the history of English prose; and, as the Early English Text Society has lately been giving special attention to this subject, it will print the two texts of the Dices on parallel pages, and get some German or English editor to collect all the differences of words, syntax, and phrases in the two versions. Caxton is rather more diffuse than his foregoer; but the latter does not light up his text with a characteristic prologue, as our first printer so happily does.

MR. MARILLIER, of Peterhouse, Cambridge, is working at the life and papers of Lord Sandwich, First Lord of the Admiralty during the American War of Independence; and he speaks with enthusiasm of the value and interest of the documents and the subjects.

MR. CHARLES SAYLE—formerly of New College, Oxford, and now sub-librarian of St. John's College, Cambridge—has been for some time past engaged upon a Life of B. Outhbert Mayne, which he hopes to have ready by the first celebration of his festival in next March.

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL & SONS have in preparation a new series of cheap illustrated volumes dealing with subjects relating to the farm, called "Bell's Agricultural Series." The first volume, to be published in the course of next month, is The Farm and Dairy, written by Prof. J. P. Sheldon, formerly of the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester, and of the Downton College of Agriculture, and late special commissioner of the Canadian government. Other volumes to follow shortly are Manures and their Uses, by Dr. A. B. Griffiths, late principal of the School of Science, Lincoln; Practical Fruit Growing: a Treatise on Planting, Growing, and Storage of Hardy Fruits for Market and Private Growers, by Mr. J. Cheal; Feeding Stock, by Mr. Henry Evershed; Soils and their Management, by Mr. William Fraem; and The Diseases of Crops and their Remedies, by Dr. A. B. Griffiths. Each volume will consist of about 160 pages, crown octavo, illustrated, and will be published at half-a-crown.

MR. EDWARD STANFORD has in the press two new military works by Prince Kraft zu Hohenlohe Ingelfingen, dealing with infantry and cavalry, which will form companion volumes to the same author's Letters on Artillery, reviewed in the ACADEMY of March 23. Like that volume, they have been translated from the German by Lieut.-Col. N. L. Walford.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish early in the autumn a revised edition of Mr. Alfred Austin's poem, The Human Tragedy, which will contain likewise a prefatory essay on "The Present Position and Prospects of Poetry."

Popular Poets of the Period—a volume edited by Mr. Eyles—will be published in a few days by Messrs. Griffith, Farran & Co. The more important articles are by various writers of repute. Mr. Mackenzie Bell has written an introductory essay dealing with contemporary poetry.

Swallow Home in South Africa is the title of a new volume of travel announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

NEXT season there will be published, simultaneously in this country and in America, a History of England, on which Dr. Aubrey has been engaged for some years. It is written in a popular style and on a novel plan. With due regard to chronological arrangement, subordinate matters are grouped around central incidents; special attention is given to critical and formative periods. The chief design is to trace the growth of the national life and character, and the struggle for public rights and liberties.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. J. Halévy read a paper upon the Hebrew text of Psalm lxxviii., which begins in the Vulgate "Exurgat Deus." He contended that the order of the verses has been disturbed, and he suggested a new order, which made the whole far more intelligible. According to M. Halévy, this psalm dates from the later years of the reign of Zedekiah, when Palestine, threatened by the Babylonians under Nabuchodonosor, was looking for help to Necho, king of Egypt. Two parties then divided the school of the prophets: one, that of Jeremiah, was friendly to Babylon, and regarded the promises of Egypt with distrust; the other, led by Ananias, son of Azur, favoured an Egyptian alliance against Babylon. The writer of the psalm belonged to the latter party. As the psalm contains references to several facts recorded in the books of the Pentateuch, M. Halévy drew the inference that those books must have existed (in their present form) before the destruction of Jerusalem; and hence he argued against the critical theory which would turn into "pseudopigraphie" the most authentic books of the Bible.

SIGNORA ZAMPINI SALAZARO, who was sent to England by the Italian Government to report on the position and education of women in this country, has just returned to Italy after a two months' stay, during which she visited Oxford, Cambridge, Cheltenham, and other centres of higher education. She proposes to found an International Literary and Scientific Institute in Rome, to be started on January 1, 1890, as a centre of action for promoting the moral and intellectual progress of women in Italy. The programme of the institute is extensive, including the organisation of studies, the bringing together of natives and foreigners resident in Rome, and the providing of help to the poorer classes; but it is intended to begin in a modest way. Many friends to women's education in England are giving the scheme their support; and Signora Salazaro—who has been lecturing and writing for the elevation of women in Italy for several years, editing the well got-up La Rassegna degli Interessi-Femminili for eighteen months, and has the support of Queen Margheritta—will be glad to send a programme to anyone interested in her efforts. Her address till the end of November is Villa Zampini, Vomero, Naples.

THE Rev. J. Jackson Wray, pastor of Whitefield's Tabernacle, has issued an appeal for a Whitefield Memorial Fund, in order to replace the well-known building in Tottenham Court Road, which has been condemned as unsafe. This building was erected by Whitefield himself in 1756, largely with the help of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon; and many historic personages have worshipped there. Toplady, the writer of "Rock of Ages" lies buried there; and it proposed to associate his name with a large central hall for evangelic and temperance missions. The appeal is illustrated with some curious old cuts.

WE are informed that the Home Secretary has replied to the memorial addressed to him by literary men and others in the case of Mr. Henry Vizetelly that he does not think it consistent with his public duty to advise Her Majesty to interfere with the sentence.

Corrigenda.—In Mr. Whitley Stokes's letter on "The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick," in the ACADEMY of last week, p. 88, col. 1, l. 61, for "habetur," read habetur; and, in col. 2, l. 6, for "fourth," read sixth.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

PROF. SAYOR has written for the Newbery House Magazine a popular account of the cuneiform tablets recently discovered at Tel-el-Amarna, under the title of "Letters from Palestine before the Age of Moses." The September number of the same magazine will also contain a paper on "The Dervishes," by Prof. A. Vambéry, who has himself been a dervish in Central Asia; some autograph letters (with facsimiles) from Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Secretary Windebank, Parson John Michaelson, of Chelmsford, &c., contributed by Miss Esmé Stuart; "Shut up in his Prison," by Canon Benham, being an account of the trial and incarceration in the Bastille (which he had himself built) of Hugh Anbriot, provost of Paris in the fourteenth century; "The Public Worship Act and its Results," by Mr. Homersham Cox; and "Women and Sundays," by Miss Wordsworth, principal of Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford.

MR. OSWALD CRAWFORD will contribute to the forthcoming number of the Fortnightly a paper upon "The Myths, Legends, and Folk-lore of Northern Portugal."

THE September number of Scribner's Magazine will contain an article on "Alexandre Dumas père," by Mr. Andrew Lang, illustrated with a portrait; "Night Witchery," describing what may be seen of nature on a very dark night with other organs of sense than the eye, with a number of drawings by Mr. W. Hamilton Gibson; an illustrated description, by Lieut. W. W. Kimball, United States Inspector of Ordnance, of the various types of magazine rifles adopted by the principal European armies; and an "end-paper" by Mr. Justin McCarthy on "Three Dream Heroines"—who are "Salley in our Alley," "Fair Inez," and "Annabel Lee." Mr. R. L. Stevenson's romance, "The Master of Ballantrae," will be concluded in the October number.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE University of Edinburgh will be represented at the Oriental Congress, to be held at Stockholm and Christiania next month, by Dr. D. Laird Adams, professor of Hebrew and oriental languages; and by Dr. J. Burgess, director-general of the archaeological survey of India.

THE Cameron prize in therapeutics at Edinburgh University has been awarded to M. Pasteur, in recognition of the high importance and great value in practical therapeutics of the treatment of hydrophobia discovered by him.

DURHAM UNIVERSITY proposes to confer the honorary degree of LL.D. upon Prof. F. Y. Edgeworth, of King's College, London, who has been appointed president of the section of economic science and statistics at the forthcoming meeting of the British Association at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

THE July number of Johns Hopkins University Circulars contains the programmes for the academical year 1889-90. A new chair has been added, that of the history of philosophy, to which the Rev. Dr. E. H. Griffin, of Williams College, has been appointed. Dr. Fabian Franklin has been promoted to be associate-professor of mathematics; and a memorial lectureship of poetry, with salary of 1000 dollars (£200) a year, has been founded in memory of the late Percy Turnbull. In addition, the university has received a benefaction of 100,000 dollars (£20,000), as an "emergency fund," to make up in part the loss sustained by the suspension of dividends on railway investments. The Adam T. Bruce fellowship in biology has been awarded to a Japanese, Shozaburo Watase; and the list of other new fellows numbers twenty, of whom one comes from Nova Scotia. The "seminary" system seems to be making way, especially in the department of philology. The seminary is an association of the teachers, fellows, and scholars (together with such advanced students as shall have shown signs of their fitness), for the prosecution of original studies by means of discussion and criticism. For example, in the Greek seminary, conducted by Prof. Gilderleeve, the subject for study during the next academic year will be "Plato and the Literary Form of Greek Philosophy." There will be three meetings each week—two for the interpretation of the text, and one for cursory reading in Plato or conferences on kindred subjects. The subject of the Latin seminary will be "Roman Satire"; while the Assyrian seminary, under Prof. Haupt and Dr. Adler, will continue the preparation of an Assyrian-English Glossary.

MR. E. S. SHUCKBURGH, librarian of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, has published in a quaintly bound little volume (Elliot Stock) a facsimile of the unique A B C in the college library, which claims to be the earliest extant English reading book. The colophon gives the name of the printer as Thomas Petyt, of London, with no date; but the late Henry Bradshaw was satisfied that it must have been printed about 1538. In the preface is given a brief account of these A B C Primers; but we would gladly have had more information about the prayers, &c., given, about the source of the passages of Scripture quoted, and about the typography. The editor goes out of his way to state that this A B C omits the Commandments, as compared with a later Primer, which gives them in a shortened form; whereas, as a matter of fact, they are here given in a very shortened form.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A SIBYLLINE LEAF.

With time to manhood comes this truth:
That not to taste, enjoy, attain;
Not—as in dreams we nursed in youth—
To love and to be loved again;
But to endure, self to control;
To shape the void and fugitive;
Firm, with still upward-labouring soul—
This is to live and feel we live!

OBITUARY.

WALFORD D. SELBY.

IT is with much regret that we record the untimely death, at the early age of forty-five, at his house in Clyde Street, Redcliffe Gardens, on August 3, of a most useful public servant and good scholar.

Mr. Walford Dakin Selby, eldest son of Thomas Selby, of Whitley and Wimbush Hall, Essex, has been for many years past superintendent of the search room at the Public Record Office, where his genial manners and desire to aid all real workers lent additional value to the services he had to bestow. These services were not merely perfunctory. He was a civil servant who loved his work, and made himself acquainted with the history and meaning of a great portion of the noble body of public documents under his survey, without which knowledge it is vain to grapple with the problems constantly offered by inquirers for special facts. When that School of Charters—which ought to be at once the assistant of history, law, and literature, and the guarantee, by the diffusion of knowledge among librarians and custodians of records who attend its courses, for the protection of our precious records all over the country—shall be established in England, as may one day be hoped for, the special learning and the zeal of such an one as Mr. Selby will be greatly needed. Of the technicalities of calendars, indices, and palaeography—necessary adjuncts to his office—he was master; and his ready help in knotty points was never asked in vain. An obscure search only served to put him on his mettle. He took a large view of his duties, which rendered him at once the intelligent friend and helper of the historian, the genealogist, or the searcher into special bypaths of history or biography, whose wants he apprehended or whom his suggestions led to important discoveries.

Outside office-hours Mr. Selby's own tastes led him also to antiquarian work, making use of the opportunities he enjoyed. Recent researches into the life of Chaucer called from him in 1875 a small publication on The Robberies of Chaucer (Life Records, part 1, Chaucer Society); and he had, we believe, the intention of carrying these studies further. In 1882 and 1883 appeared Lancashire and Cheshire Records preserved in the Public Record Office, London, edited for the Record Society of those counties, two volumes, giving a calendar or account of the "classes of records, now transferred to the Public Record Office, that furnish the most important evidence for the history of the two counties"—a distinct bit of good work. In 1883, through Mr. Selby's energy, was founded the Pipe Roll Society, for the publication of a valuable class of records—the great rolls of the exchequer—and other documents, such as ancient charters prior to A.D. 1200, which has already issued ten volumes, proving a success under his continued directorship. In January 1884 Mr. Selby succeeded Dr. G. W. Marshall as editor of The Genealogist, beginning the new series of this quarterly with an eye "to the wide field of research offered by the public records," aiming to show "that there is no real difficulty for anyone to gain a fairly comprehensive view of the national archives." This is the key note of his work—to help to teach people what the national archives are, and how to use them in the various branches of history. A handy little booklet, The Jubilee Date Book, containing chronological and regnal tables, &c., published in 1887, obtained an immediate recognition among students.

The April number of The Genealogist for the present year foreshadowed the end. In his preface the editor relinquishes his post, reluctantly, on account of "medical advice that must be attended to." His death is a great loss to others besides friends. Many are the students, abroad and at home, who will miss the liberal scholarship, the kindly sympathy, and the helping hand of Walford D. Selby in the English Public Record Office.

A NEW ROUMANIAN REVIEW.

THE first number has appeared of a new Roumanian review, Arhiva Societatii Stiintifice si Literare din Jasi ("The Record of the Scientific and Literary Society of Jassy"). Its contents are as varied as its title implies. Gr. Cobalcescu criticises the work of Franz Herbig, Kreidebildungen im Quellengebiet der Dambovitia. H. Tiktin treats of phonetic spelling, especially in its application to Roumanian; and also prints some documents of the seventeenth century, which are valuable, as showing the condition of the language at that period. We must remember that the oldest MS. in Roumanian goes back no farther than 1436; and that the language did not develop itself in a literary form till the Transylvanian prince, George Rakoczy, ordered the Archbishop Simon Stephen to see that his clergy preached to the people in their native tongue. The article by A. D. Xenopol (author of a well-known history of the country), on society and morals during the rule of the Phanariote Hospodars from 1716 to 1822, gives an interesting picture of those corrupt days. He also writes on the derivation of the name of the place Curtea de Arges; indeed, most of the place-names of Roumania are beset with difficulties. J. Tanoviceanu communicates a family document of last century illustrative of "types and customs of bygone times." H. Titkin, in reviewing the work of Schwarzfeld on the Roumanian popular poetry collected by Aleksandri, dwells upon the alterations and "improvements" to which they have been subjected, but adds sarcastically that we cannot be surprised if a few ballads are tampered with at a time when Saulescu has published Roumanian documents known to be apocryphal and Laurian and Maksim have issued their Roumanian dictionary. The last-mentioned work, it may be remarked, has done much injury to the language by its chauvinism. In order to make Roumanian as Latin a tongue as possible, it has been the object of the editors to eject the words of Slavonic and Magyar origin, to say nothing of others, and to substitute newly formed ones derived from Latin in their place. But according to Cihac the Slavonic words in Roumanian amount to two-fifths of the whole vocabulary. The review, which promises to be a valuable one, and of great utility to the student of the languages of Eastern Europe, concludes with some other bibliographical notices of less importance.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE COIRE AND ST. GALL FRAGMENTS OF THE OLD-LATIN VERSION OF THE GOSPELS.

Salisbury: August 10, 1889.

As an act of justice to two foreign scholars I write to say that Dr. Corssen's contention (ACADEMY, May 11), in which he had been preceded by the Abbé P. Batiffol, that the Coire fragments commonly known as a, and the St. Gall fragments known as n, were originally part of the same MS., turns out on examination to be perfectly right. In a recent visit to the Baeisches Museum at Coire, I was allowed, through the kindness of Herr M. Truog, to inspect the fragments of St. Luke; and I found that the measurements as to height of letters, length of lines and of columns, &c., correspond exactly with those of the MS. at St. Gall. This correspondence has been hitherto disguised by the fact that Ranke's facsimile of the Coire fragments is on a slightly smaller scale than the original, as Dr. Corssen indeed suggested. The designation n may therefore be removed from the list of Old-Latin MSS. of the Gospels. It is best to keep a, which marks the relation of the text of these fragments to that of the Vercellae MS. a.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "WHOLE."

Oxford: August 10, 1889.

At the Oxford University Extension Meeting this year three lectures on the "Science of Language" have been delivered before large audiences by the distinguished professor of comparative philology, and were published a day or two after the last lecture was delivered. I find that in the first lecture (p. 17) the learned professor has something to say on the etymology of the word "whole." It must, I think, be due to an oversight that the lecturer has ventured to republish the ancient, and (I had hoped) obsolete heresy that this English word may be put with Skr. kalyāna- and Gr. kalos. Prof. Max Müller agrees with Curtius, Fick, Weigand, Scherer, Schmidt, Skeat, Douce, and many others in teaching that our word "whole," O.E. hāl, O.N. heill, O.H.G. heil, Goth. hails, Germ. hailaz*, is identical with Gr. καλός, Skr. kalyas. This etymology assumes that the common base of these words was kaljo-, and that we have in the Germanic haila- an epenthesis of the i. Now I believe it may be affirmed without fear of contradiction that there is no certain instance of a primitive Germanic epenthesis of i. Gothic instances have sometimes been brought forward—namely (af) áika, "I renounce" (for akja*) = Lat. aiō (for ag-jō*), and hráwa- = Skr. krávyam, "raw flesh"; but I do not think that Prof. Max Müller would find any Germanist who would at the present day accept this explanation of áika, hráwa-, or of the word in dispute. That Germanic haila- rests on an Indo-Germanic hailo-, and not on an original hail, is suggested by forms from three other cognate languages—for example,

Old-Bulg. celū, "whole"; Old-Prussian kailūstas; Old-Irish cél, "augurium." Of course it may be said in reply that these three forms may be derived also from a base hailjo-* by epenthesis, but I hardly think that any Indo-Germanist would be found at the present day to favour such an hypothesis.

"OLAF" AND SKYTHIAN "OLOROS."

Oxford: July 29, 1889.

Dr. Blind, in his review of Fressl's Die Skythen-Saken, identifies the Skythian name "OLOROS" with O.N. "Olaf." The point of the comparison is clearly that both names begin with ol and end with r, though even this is delusive, for the initial vowel of the Scandinavian name is long, while that of the Skythian name is short ("OLOROS," "OLOROS"); but, when we examine the Norse name, we find that the comparison is even more reckless than this would lead us to believe. The final r of the Norse name is purely and simply the sign of the nominative case; and hence it goes back to a primitive Teutonic z, which represents an earlier s. This had become r in Old Norse before the date of the oldest Runic inscription; but this is no proof that the change had taken place so early as the time of Thukydides. Thus the final r of the Norse name really answers to the final s of "OLOROS" or "OLOROS"; and Dr. Blind, therefore, asks us to equate "Olaf-" with "OLOR-" or "OROL-." This is obviously inadmissible.

But the absurdity of the comparison becomes more pronounced when we consider the history of the Norse name. This name affords one of several instances where our chroniclers have preserved older forms than occur in Norse itself. The name occurs in the English chronicles as "Anlaf," "Onlaf," and they are supported by the Irish representation as "Amlabh." There can be no doubt about the identity of "Anlaf" with "Olaf," later "Olaf," for some of the O.E. forms refer to the famous Olaf Tryggvason. The second portion of the name "laf" is easily explained as the Norse equivalent of O.E. lāf, O.H.G. leib, leif—a word embodying the same stem as our "leave," and hence meaning "what is left, relic, survivor, successor," &c. This word was in common use in personal names. Its "rule-right" representative in O.N. would be leifr; and this form does occur in the oldest forms of the name under consideration (see K. Gislason, Um Frum-parta Islenskrar Tungu i Fornöld, Kaupmannahöfn, 1846, p. 183; idem, "Mandsnavnet 'Olaf' i dets ældre Islandske Former" in Annaler for Nordisk Oldkyndighed og Historie, 1860, p. 331). The same change of Teutonic ai to O.N. ä before k occurs in täkn, "token," by the side of the regular tekn, and in por-läkr by the side of por-leikr (Gislason, l.c.; Noreen, Allnordische Grammatik, § 88, 4).

It is not so easy to explain the first member of this name, which we can restore, on the evidence of the O.E. and Irish forms, to an. Dietrich (Aussprache des Gotischen, p. 59) assuming on to be the original form, suggested that on was intended, which in its turn stood for aun (= O.E. ean), a fairly common Teutonic name-stem; but, as an was clearly the original form, this suggestion is inadmissible. The Jakob Grimm of the North, Peder Andreas Munch, has derived this name from Teutonic anon-, "grandfather, ancestor" (O.H.G. ano, O.N. äe, ai, from ano-*). He derives the O.N. Äle, modern Ole, representing an older Anulo,

* A Danish "Anulo," A.D. 812, is recorded by Einhardt (Pertz, Scriptores, i. 199). Munch (Saml. Afhand. iv. 149) points out that Saxo, being unaware that this was an older form of Äle, identified it with the Latin anulus, so that he calls Anulo "Ringo."

from the same stem (Samlede Afhandlinger, iv. 148). This name occurs in O.H.G. as "Analo, Anelo, Anilo," &c., and in O.E. as "Onela." To this we may add O.E. "Anna," "Onna," familiar as the name of an East Anglian king, several O.H.G. names in Forstemann, and the O.N. "Önundr," from Anwíndr (Anwíndr in the English Chron.)† Munch justifies his etymology by citing the Scandinavian love for their ancestors. But still the derivation does not seem to be altogether in line with the Teutonic name-system. The fact that the name does not appear to have been used by any other Teutonic tribe leaves open the door for the suggestion that "Olaf" may have been originally a nickname. It is certain that several of the O.N. names were originally nicknames, which became perpetuated in a family, and then came into general use as personal names. We have a good instance of this process in the name "Knútr" (Canute)—a name bestowed upon the first recorded Knútr (Fundne Knútr, bræla Knútr), because he was found as a child with a gold ring knotted about his forehead.‡ All the early Knúts were members of the Danish royal house. An even better instance is the name "Hörða-knútr," familiar to us as Hardycanute, which does not mean "hardy Canute," as even Langebek (Scriptores Rerum Danicarum, iii. 425 n. g.) believed, but "Canute from Hörða-land," or Hardeyssel, in Jutland § The first Olaf was the well-known Uffo or Offa, son of Wermund, who figures in the O.E. royal genealogies, and whose saga was current in England in Matthew of Paris's time, by whom it was embodied in his Vita Duorum Uffarum. Saxo Grammaticus represents Uffo as succeeding his father as king of the Danes; and he adds, "Hic a compluribus Olanus est dictus, atque ob animi moderationem Mansueti cognomine donatus." The same information is given by Svend Aagesen (Langebek, i. 45). Uffo is thus the "Olaf Litil-läte" of the Langfödgatal. But it is not clear whether Olaf in this case was a second name or a nickname. It might well be a nickname, for luf was used in compounds, as we see from the O.E. "unluf, postumus" (Corpus Gloss., No. 1622). Olaf, however, cannot very well be derived from this word. The suggestion that Olaf was originally a nickname would enable us to accept Munch's etymology, and would account for the limited diffusion of this name prior to its popularisation by the canonisation of S. Olaf.

But, whatever be the origin of the first stem of this name, there can be no doubt about the utter impossibility of equating it with Oloros, five centuries or so B.C. The chronology of the Teutonic sound-changes unfortunately does not enable us to determine accurately the form this name then bore, but we know sufficient to say that it must have resembled *Anoloipos rather than Oloros or Orolos.

THE SAPOROGUE COSSACKS AS DESCRIBED BY AN ENGLISH AMBASSADOR IN RUSSIA IN 1736.

London: August 10, 1889.

In the middle of April, 1736, a Russian army was marching on Asow for the purpose of carrying out operations against the Turks. From time to time Claudius Rondeau—the English resident at the court of St. Petersburg—forwarded to London despatches describing the successes of the troops; and in one of these* he gives an interesting account of the Saporogue Cossacks, from whom the Russians during the whole of the eighteenth century drew large supplies of admirable cavalry.

"As the Saporogue-Cossacks, who inhabit several small Islands situated in the mouth of the River of the Dnieper or Boristhenes, are very much talked of at present, that Felt-Marshall Munick often mentions them in his Relations, and will probably be usefully employed by this Court against the Turks, I hope the following description of those Cossacks will not be unacceptable.

The Saporogue Cossacks are a very strong and indefatigable people. Their Cashevoy or General has a Room to himself, of about ten foot square, but the others live in large Rooms called Kureneis, in each of which there is about six or seven hundred men, whoever pleases to go into the Kurenei, may lodge and eat with them without being asked, or thanking them for their entertainment. As the whole Nation are a very extraordinary people, more used to live in the fields than in settled habitations, there is generally four or five hundred men about every Kurenei who lay in the open air, but have the liberty to come into the Room when they please without any Ceremony. The Saporogues are a sort of knights who suffer no women among them, for if any one of them was found to keep a woman he is stoned to death. They have no written Law, but all causes are judged by six or seven persons, they choose for that purpose, but their sentence cannot be put in execution, till it be approved by the Fraternity. If any theft is committed among them, and the Roberis taken he is immediately hung up by the Ribs. In case a Murderer is discovered, they dig a pit, and lay the murdered person on the Murderer and bury them both together. They profess the Greek religion, and when they were under the protection of the Turks, the Patriarch of Constantinople furnished them with priests; but since these two years, that they are under the protection of the Czarina their Priests are sent to them by the Arch-bishop of Kioff. They have only one Church, which is served by an Abbot and a few Priests, who are not permitted to meddle with any Wordly affairs further than to intercede for delinquents and to see them do public penance in the Church in case they commit any alight fault. The Saporogues admit into their Fraternity all persons of Whatever Nation they are, in case they embrace the Greek religion and are willing to undergo seven year's probation before they are admitted knights. If any of their fraternity run away they make no inquiry after them, but look upon such as unworthy of their society. Their Riches consists in Cattle, particularly in Horses, some of them have above a hundred, and there is hardly any of those Cossacks but has ten or twenty. Tho' they have a great many thousand horses that run all together in the open fields, it's hardly ever heard that one is stolen, for such thefts are unpardonable among those people. They sow no corn; in time of war they plunder all the provisions they can from their enemies and in time of Peace they barter Horses and Fish for all sorts of necessaries. They catch vast quantity's of fish, particularly Sturgeon in the River Dnieper. In their studs they use Turkish and Oherkassian Stallions. Their Arms, that consist in Rifled Guns and Sabres, they make themselves. Nobody is admitted a knight of their society who is not very strong and well made; but any one may be admitted as Oholopps, who are their servants, and some of them have two or three. They never care to mention how many knights there is in their Fraternity, and when asked they say they cannot tell, because they increase daily, but it's assured their number exceeds twenty thousand men. It is certain the greatest part of those people are Cossacks who have deserted from the Ukraine; but the Oholopps, or servants, are mostly Poles. The Saporogues are divided into thirty Great Rooms or Kureneis, each of which has his particular Commander or Attaman, who nevertheless are all obliged to obey the Cashevoy or General. Every knight has the liberty to vote when they chose a General or Cashevoy; and in case he does not behave well they turn him out and chose another, as it is happened some years ago to the present Cashevoy, who was turned out and another elected, who is since dead, and the present was re-chosen. When a Saporogue knight dies he may leave his horses and what he has to whom he will, but generally the Church gets the most, which is given to maintain the Priest."

Such were the peculiar customs of this community, the members of which spent their entire lives in fighting. It may be that the reader of this description will remember some German customs described by Caesar, which resemble those preserved from ancient times on the islands of the Dnieper.

RECENT ASSYRIOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

A Classified List of all Simple and Compound Ideographs occurring in the [Cuneiform] Texts hitherto published. By R. E. Brünnow. In 3 vols. (Leiden: Brill.)

Opit Graphicheskii Raspolozhennago Assiriiskago Slovarya ("Attempt at an Assyrian Dictionary arranged graphically"). By S. W. Golénisheff. (St. Petersburg.)

Inscription assyrienne archaïque de Samsi-Ramman IV. By M. P. Scheil. (Paris: Welter.)

DR. BRÜNNOW'S elaborate and careful work will mark a new era in the progress of Assyrian studies. It contains an exhaustive list of all the Assyro-Babylonian characters with their manifold phonetic and ideographic values, whether used singly or in combination with others, so far, at least, as they have been published in what is now the bulky mass of Assyrian literature. The necessity of the work, and at the same time its laboriousness, will be apparent to everyone who takes up Dr. Brünnow's three volumes, with their large and closely written pages. It has become impossible even for an Assyriologist to

* Beowulf, 63, 2616, 2932, seems to be the only instance of this name in O.E. Hence it should be described as an O.E. form of the Danish name represented by the later Alu, and not, as Kluge (Eymol. Wörterb., s. v. "Ahn"), as an O.E. name. It may thus be added to the other purely Danish names, such as Healfdene, Halga, Heming, Ohtere, Ongenbeow, Wealpeo (?), embodied in this poem. The Danes Angandeo and Hemmingus occur in Einhardt, A.D. 811, and they are recorded in the northern chronicles. See on this subject Schiær, Nyere Historiske Studier, 1875, i. 65 sqq.

† This Anwíndr does not represent O.N. Eyvindr, as Ettmüller (Lexicon, p. 14) suggested.

‡ See the greater Olaf Tryggvason's Saga, c. 62; Jónsvíkinga Saga, ed. Oederschiöld, p. 1; ed. O. af Petersens, p. 1; Flateyjarbók, i. 97. The earliest dated Knútr ("Knut") occurs in 834 in Perts (Scriptores, ii. 217). Svend Aagesen, c. 2, says that the first Knútr was a son of Sigurd "Snake-in-eye," and that he was called "Knútr" from, apparently, a knot on his father's belt.

§ According to the great Saga of Olaf Tryggvason, c. 62, and Flateyjarbók, i. 98, the first Hörða-knútr was Knútr, the son of Sigurd, referred to in the preceding note, and was fostered by Gorm, son of Fundne-knútr, after whom he was called. He was, we are told, called Hörða-knútr, from Hórd in Jutland, to distinguish him from Fundne-knútr (see Steenstrup, Normannerne, ii. 101). He appears as "Haurda-knútr" (=Hörða-knútr) in the Langfödgatal. Similarly our own Hardycnut is called simply "Knútr" in Fagrskinna, p. 91. As he was brought up in Denmark, he may have received the addition to his name independently of his relationship to the earlier Hörða-knútr. The latter is, however, most probably the origin of his name. In a similar manner the first Hörðu-käre seems to have been a Käre from the Norwegian Hörðaland (now Hordaland) (see Munch, Det Norske Folkes Historie, i. 1. 576). Hörðu-käre was so-called to distinguish him from Berðlu-käre (Käre from Berðle in Nordfjord), and from another Käre distinguished as Viking-käre.

remember all the ideographic values of the cuneiform characters or the passages in which they occur. When we say that Dr. Brünnow has registered no less than 12,291 of them, and that these do not by any means exhaust all the values of the cuneiform ideographs now known to scholars, we may cease to wonder that the Assyrians themselves were obliged to make use of "syllabaries" and lexicons.

But Dr. Brünnow's work shows very plainly what the origin and development of the cuneiform system of writing must have been, and it further shows that we are but just beginning to understand both this and the so-called "syllabaries" from which a large part of our knowledge of the cuneiform ideographs is derived. Much of the crude theorising of M. Halévy and Prof. Delitzsch in regard to the Accadian or non-Semitic dialects of primitive Chaldaea has been due to an uncritical use of the "syllabaries" or a misconception of their contents and object.

Two very useful features in Dr. Brünnow's book are the appendices, in which he gives a "list of non-Semitic verb-forms," as well as of the phonetic values attached to the characters in non-Semitic Accadian only, and not in the Semitic texts. It may seem ungracious to ask him to undertake any further labour; but the very completeness of his work makes the student wish it to be made even more complete by an index of the Semitic words contained in it, the signification of each word being added wherever possible.

M. Golénisheff's book is a practical illustration of a suggestion lately made by Dr. Brünnow. In the present tentative and progressive stage of Assyrian research a dictionary of the language in the true sense of the word is out of the question, much more a dictionary in which an attempt is made to arrange the words under their supposed roots. Though Assyro-Babylonian is a Semitic language, it has undergone much phonetic change, like all languages which have been brought into close contact with others of a foreign type; and in addition, it is written in a syllabary of foreign invention, and ill-adapted to express the sounds of Semitic speech. At present, therefore, the best and most convenient way of arranging its vocabulary would seem to be that adopted by the Assyrians themselves—according to the forms of the cuneiform characters. It is this arrangement which has been employed by M. Golénisheff in his list of characters and words.

The list does not profess to do more than register the principal values of the characters, and the Assyrian words which have been explained in certain well-known Assyriological works, references to the latter being added in each case. Let us hope that the eminent Egyptologist, whose appearance in the Assyrian field is a subject of congratulation, may be induced to extend the plan of his book and undertake a work which is much needed by Assyrian scholars. This is a complete list of all the Assyrian words which have been translated or explained up to the present time, with references to the passages in which the interpretations are found. The only collection of the kind now existing is De Chossat's Répertoire Assyrien (1879); and this, though still useful, is every year naturally becoming more and more out of date.

Father Scheil may be congratulated on his translation of the inscription of Samas-Rimmon IV., whose reign lasted from 824 to 811 B.C. The translation is accompanied by an introduction, and a useful commentary and vocabulary. Samas-Rimmon was the son of one of the most energetic and successful of the kings of the older Assyrian dynasty, and followed his father on the throne after the suppression of a revolt which had been headed by his brother. The brother bore the name of Assur-dân-pal, which Greek writers seem to have confused with that of Assur-bani-pal; and, as the date of his overthrow and death corresponds with that assigned by Ktesias to the fall of the Assyrian kingdom, it is possible that the Sardanapallos of the latter may really have been the rebel king. The rebellion lasted at least six years, its centre being at Nineveh, so that it is by no means improbable that the Sardanapallos who burned himself to death in his Ninevite palace was the defeated brother of Samas-Rimmon. The Greek legend in that case would have been derived from the unsuccessful party, while the monumental account is the record of the victorious brother.

Father Scheil has shown himself a worthy pupil of his illustrious masters, Dr. Oppert and M. Amiaud, whose recent death is deplored by science. I hope we shall soon receive another work on Assyrian from his pen.

SOME BOOKS ON CHEMISTRY.

Exercises in the Preparation of Organic Compounds. By Prof. E. Fischer. Translated by A. Kling. (Wm. Hodge & Co.) This is a useful manual of directions for preparing a number of important organic compounds. It includes fifty-eight lessons, each dealing with one or more substances, and all capable of being carried out in any ordinary laboratory at moderate expense and without danger. Many references to original memoirs are given, while the practical instructions are clear and sufficient. The order in which the subjects are taken up does not strike us as particularly systematic. We are sorry to see that the pump invented by Dr. H. Sprengel is invariably spoken of as the "Bunsen-pump." Although some of the lessons in the volume before us are more advanced and deal with more complex compounds, we think that, on the whole, the Organic Experimental Chemistry of Dr. Emerson Reynolds is to be preferred as a laboratory book of practice. The latter work is admirably arranged, and lays very proper stress upon the examination of such synthetic and analytic operations as throw light on the structure of organic compounds. Dr. Reynolds's book is far more interesting to the earnest student than is Dr. Fischer's, and its educational value is of a higher order. Dr. Fischer's volume is, in fact, little more than a collection of excellent recipes.

An Elementary Text-Book of Chemistry. By W. G. Mixer, of Yale University. Second Edition. (Macmillan.) The elements, as discussed in this manual, are arranged in accordance with the Periodic Law. The treatment of the materials is sound and sensible, and the book, as a whole, may be commended as clearly written and accurate. It is true that we miss the statement of some facts which we deem to be not unimportant—such as the striking difference of deportment, towards many elements, between really dry oxygen and that gas as commonly prepared. A word might have been said concerning the action of the nitrifying organism. And we are simply told that the action of manganese dioxide in aiding the evolution of oxygen from potassium chlorate is "not understood." But, on the other hand, we are glad to find that pains have been taken to present correct views on several points where recent research has advanced our knowledge of chemical philosophy.

A Table of Specific Gravity for Solids and Liquids. Constants of Nature—Part I. By F. W. Clarke. (Macmillan.) This is a new and augmented edition of a work published in 1874 by the Smithsonian Institution. The author has, however, excluded from the present issue the boiling and melting points given in his previous volume, on the ground that Prof. Carnelley's Tables supply these data. Mr. Clarke here gives us in a convenient form the specific gravities of 5227 distinct substances. He claims a reasonable degree of completeness only so far as regards artificial substances of definite constitution. He includes the elements, and artificial compounds both inorganic and organic; but he excludes a large number of minerals. Each page (there are 366) is divided into three columns respectively headed "Name," "Specific Gravity," "Authority." To the first column are added such particulars of each substance as its physical state or mode of preparation; in the second column the temperatures, when recorded, at which the determinations were made are given; in the third column we find the name of the observer and a reference to the publication in which his results appeared. An index of no less than forty pages completes the volume. Mr. Clarke's work is a most useful one; but we cannot help wishing that he had stated, wherever possible, whether the figure assigned to a substance as its specific gravity was referred to water at the temperature of the experiment, or to water at 15.6° C., or at 4°.

The Chemistry of Photography. By R. Meldola. (Macmillan.) This volume belongs to the "Nature Series." It contains, in a revised form, a course of lectures delivered by Prof. Meldola at the Finsbury Technical College. The lecturer did not intend to give instruction in photographic manipulation; he dealt almost exclusively with the chemical principles underlying the art. The book is well-planned, and the descriptions of the chemical reactions and of the physical changes which occur in the various processes are clear and exact. The progress of discovery and improvement in the photographic art is fully narrated, each successive invention being described in a way which cannot fail to interest the student; for the rationale of the steps in the several processes is thoroughly elucidated, so far as our present knowledge permits.

A Treatise on the Principles of Chemistry. By M. M. Pattison Muir. Second Edition. (Cambridge: University Press.) After the lapse of less than five years, Mr. Muir has brought out an improved edition of his important work on Chemical Philosophy. We noticed the original work in the ACADEMY, and need not here repeat our commendatory words. In the volume before us the chapters dealing with Chemical Statics have been revised, and, in part, rearranged; while those which relate to Chemical Kinetics have been in great measure re-cast and re-written. Although the book has not been increased in bulk, the improvements which the author has effected in the present edition concern not merely the arrangement of his abundant material, but its philosophical treatment. A full account of the bearing of the most recent researches on the elucidation of many chemical phenomena forms a characteristic feature of Mr. Muir's standard treatise.

Inorganic Chemistry. By Ira Remsen. (Macmillan.) We cannot think that such merits as this book possesses are sufficient to justify the appearance of another large manual of inorganic chemistry. The brief preface is wholly to our mind, and we are glad to see that in the body of the work due stress is laid upon the relationships of chemical substances and chemical phenomena to each other. Manipulatory details are, we think wisely, relegated to an appendix, in order not to interfere with the arguments of the text. But there is reason to complain of Prof. Remson's inaccuracy and incompleteness of statement with regard to small matters, and even with regard to matters not small. He does not seem to be acquainted with the chemical differences in deportment of diamond, graphite, and amorphous carbon (p. 366) to certain chemical agents. He is unaware of the behaviour of metals and non-metals when heated in really dry oxygen (p. 31). He repeats, from a smaller work of his own, the curious statement that "an opaque layer generally covers the diamond as found" (p. 359). He states (p. 536) that the normal calcium phosphate is found in large quantity in nature as phosphorite, although, so far as can be gathered from the published analyses, it always occurs as a fluo-chloro- or carbonato-phosphate, or as a mixture of these bodies. Why is Pattinson's well-known desilverising process attributed to one Pattison (p. 598)? We object to the statement that bronze consists of copper, zinc, and tin (p. 587). Artists will, we believe, demur (and rightly) to the assertion (p. 577) that artificial ultramarine is more beautiful than natural. Were it worth while we could multiply tenfold our citations of similar defects and mistakes in the volume under review.

OBITUARY.

MILES JOSEPH BERKELEY, F.R.S.

THE Rev. M. J. Berkeley, who died at Sibbertoft, near Market Harborough, on July 30, has long been universally recognised as the greatest authority on fungi in this country.

He was born near Oundle in 1803, and educated at Rugby and Christ's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1825. After holding a curacy at Margate, he was appointed to a living at King's Cliffe, and subsequently at Market Harborough. His first great work was the "Fungi" in Sir J. E. Smith's English Flora, and he subsequently amply fulfilled the promise of this performance by his numerous memoirs on fungi both native and foreign. His Outlines of British Fungology was for long the standard treatise on the subject. Best known, perhaps, is his Introduction to Cryptogamic Botany, which for its time was a wholly admirable handbook. Berkeley by no means confined his work to fungi; early in his career he published his Gleanings of British Algae, and more recently a Handbook of British Mosses, neither of which, however, added much to his fame. They bear no comparison for excellence with his work at fungi or at vegetable pathology, on which he published a series of masterly papers in the Gardeners' Chronicle.

Berkeley's really great achievement, which lifts him high above his fellows, consists in the admirable union in his work of high systematic treatment with a true appreciation of the value of morphology. This faculty alone enabled him to perform with brilliant success the great labour of reducing the numbers of "forma species" by tracing the obscure life histories of many microscopic fungi.

Inseparably linked with Berkeley's name is that of the late Christopher Edmund Broome, of Bath. Under their joint names there have appeared in the publications of the Linnean Society and in the Annals and Magazine of Natural History, as well as elsewhere, a long series of memoirs containing the results of a vast amount of careful and exact research. The Herbarium of the Rev. M. J. Berkeley has been at Kew for several years, and that of Mr. Broome (in many respects covering the same ground) is at the British Museum, to which he bequeathed it at his death. This bequest was accompanied by the scientific correspondence of Mr. Broome, including an extensive series of letters from Berkeley (from 1841 onwards) and a nearly complete digest of the systematic work of Berkeley as well as of their conjoint work.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MR. W. H. HUDLESTON, the senior secretary of the Geological Society, recently delivered an interesting address as president of the Devonshire Association for the Advancement of Science, in which he discusses the age, origin, and structure of the Dartmoor granite. He fails to find any evidence that will enable geologists to fix the date of this granite more definitely than by referring it to the close of the carboniferous period.

A NEW work on The Microscope in the Brewery and Malthouse, by Messrs. C. G. Matthews and F. E. Lott, will be published early next month by Messrs. Bemrose & Sons.

ACCORDING to a recent official report from Burma the jade producing country is partly enclosed by the Chindwin and Uru rivers, and lies between the 25th and 26th parallels of latitude. Jade is also found in the Myadaung district, and the most celebrated of all jade deposits is reported to be a large cliff overhanging the Chindwin, or a branch of that river, distant eight or nine days' journey from the confluence of the Uru and Chindwin. Of this cliff, called by the Chinese traders "Nant-dung," or "difficult of access," nothing is really known, as no traders have gone there for at least twenty years. Within the jade tract described above small quantities of stone have been found at many places, and abandoned quarries are numerous. The largest quarries now worked are situated in the country of the Merip Kachins. The largest mine is about 50 yards long, 40 broad, and 20 deep. The season for jade operations begins in November and lasts till May. The most productive quarries are generally flooded, and the labour of quarrying is much increased thereby. In February and March, when the floor of the pit can be kept dry for a few hours by baling, immense fires are lighted at the base of the stone. A careful watch is then kept in a tremendous heat to detect the first signs of splitting. When this occurs the Kachins attack the stone with pickaxes and hammers, or detach portions by hauling on levers inserted in the cracks. The heat is almost insupportable, the labour severe, and the mortality among the workers is high. The Kachins claim the exclusive right of working the quarries, and there is not much disposition on the part of others to interfere. Traders content themselves with buying the stone from the Kachins. All payments are made in rupees, and Burman or Burmese brokers are employed to settle the price. The jade is then taken by Shan and Kachin coolies to Namia Kyankseik, one long day's journey from Tomo. Thence it is carried by dugouts down a small stream, which flows into the Tudaw river, about three miles below Sakaw, and down the Tudaw river itself to Mogaung. The Sawbwa of the jade-producing tract, Kansi, levies 5s. on every load of jade that leaves his country, the local chief at Namia Kyankseik takes another 2s., and the farmer of the duties obtains an ad valorem duty of 33 1-3 per cent. The Kachins and Chinese-Shan coolies who work in the mines pay to the Sawbwa, Kansi, 10 per cent. of the price they get from the jade merchants. The farming of the jade duty of 33 1-3 per cent. ad valorem, for the year ending June 30, 1888, sold for £5000.

M. TAUPIN, who was recently despatched by the governor-general of French Indo-China to the Laos States, has presented a report of the results, which he sums up as follows:

"I have studied the language and system of writing of the Laos—that is, of the only population in the world possessing a graphic-alphabetical system. Of this there has been up to the present no positive knowledge. It was only known that the Laotian language and writing were somewhat similar to those of Siam. The language is spoken by about four millions of people. I have collected interesting information relating to the natural history of these regions, and much commercial information. . . . I have made numerous meteorological observations, and taken a large number of anthropometrical measurements according to the Broca system."

M. EMILE CARTAILHAC, one of the editors of the well-known review, Matériaux pour l'Histoire Primitive de l'Homme, has published in the series styled "Bibliothèque Scientifique Internationale"—which is apparently not identical with our own "International Scientific Series"—an excellent little volume, entitled La France Préhistorique, d'après les Sepultures et les Monuments. (Paris: Felix Alcan.) As France comprises the sites of the most important modern discoveries regarding palaeolithic man, the interest of this treatise is more than local. Its object is popular, rather than scientific; and it aims at giving a summary both of the facts at present ascertained, and of the views held about them. A noteworthy feature is the stress laid upon determining the precise circumstances of each find, so as to fix a comparative date for it. It is also noticeable that the author is unable to follow M. de Quatrefages and his fellow-editor, M. de Mortillet, in accepting the evidence for the existence of man in tertiary times. One of the most interesting and novel chapters is the sixth, which describes the finding of human skeletons, evidently intentionally buried in caves, forming a kind of cemetery. The volume is illustrated with 162 engravings, some from drawings by M. Cartailhac, and others from photographs. A second volume will deal with the bronze and iron ages in France.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE first volume of South Indian Inscriptions, edited by Dr. Hultsch, of the Madras Archaeological Survey, is now nearly ready for publication. It will deal with (1) Sanskrit inscriptions of the Pallava and Eastern Chalukya dynasties, and (2) Tamil and Grantha inscriptions—both of which open an almost unexplored field of epigraphical and historical research.

THE current number of Trübner's Record contains several notable obituary notices. Prof. Cecil Bendall, of the British Museum, gives some account of the late Anandaram Borooah (Vaduyā), of the Bengal Civil Service, a native of Gauhati in Assam, whose Practical Sanskrit Dictionary (3 vols., 1877) was noticed in the ACADEMY at the time of its publication. The notice of Prof. W. Wright, of Cambridge, gives a list of his works, and adds that provision is being made for the publication of several of his projected Syriac and Arabic texts. Finally, there is a notice of Rao Sahib Vishwanath Narayan Mandlik, one of the leaders of the native bar at Bombay, and editor of the Institutes of Manu in Sanskrit. We may also mention reviews of Dr. Burgess's Epigraphia Indica, by Prof. Jolly, of Würzburg; and of Prof. Sachau's Alberuni, with special reference to the Arabic original, by Prof. A. Müller, of Königsberg.

PROF. C. DE HARLEZ, of Louvain, has just published at Brussels (155 pp., quarto), under the title Le Yih-King: Texte primitif rétabli, traduit et commenté, an entirely new version of this enigmatic treatise, which, in the eyes of the Chinese, is the foundation of all wisdom and the basis of all doctrine. M. de Harlez's novel system of interpretation converts what has hitherto appeared an absurd medley of magic or divinatory formulae into a collection of philosophical and lexicological sentences of a highly intelligent character. The secret of his system is (1) to find in the headings of the sixty-four chapters which form the Yih King not sounds without sense, or proper names, or magic figures, but Chinese words with their proper signification, forming the object of each chapter. (2) To neglect the divinatory observations, which are posterior accretions to the original text. We may add that the same scholar has also lately published the first translation of the Kia-It, or Chinese Book of Domestic Rites, by Chow-hi (born 1129). This interesting little book (Paris: Leroux) forms the sixtieth volume of the tastefully printed "Bibliothèque Orientale Elzévirienne" issued by the well-known French firm of Oriental publishers.

A RECENT number of the Berliner Philologische Wochenschrift contains a very favourable notice of King and Cookson's "The Principles of Sound and Inflection as illustrated in the Greek and Latin Languages."

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY.—(Anniversary Meeting, Saturday, August 12.)

JOHN BIRKETT, Esq., in the chair.—The reports of the council and committee of auditors for the year were read. The accounts submitted show an increase in every branch of revenue over the last and for several previous years. The number of fellows elected (109) is above the average; and the receipts from the various exhibitions amount to £4023, making, with subscriptions, a total of £7378, or an excess over last year of above £2000. In addition to the usual exhibitions and evening fête, a special fête, to celebrate the society's fiftieth year, was organised, taking the form of a floral carriage parade and rose fête, which, notwithstanding the novelty of the idea, proved a complete success, being honoured by the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales and family, and 8000 of the fellows and friends. In the scientific work of the society the same improvement is seen: 744 students have received free admissions, and 42,000 specimens of plants and flowers have been cut for study and examinations by the various colleges, hospitals, and medical schools in London. The collections of medicinal, economic, and interesting plants have been largely increased, while the society's published quarterly record affords a convenient means of bringing before the public information upon subjects connected with economic botany and the commercial pursuits allied to it. By the retirement of Prof. Bentley from the post of lecturer, the scheme of lectures has been altered. Instead of a connected series, various lectures by well-known professors have been given in the museum, embracing the chief departments of economic and biological botany. These having been well received, the council hope to continue them next year.—The Duke of Teck and Mr. H. L. Antrobus were re-elected president and treasurer.

FINE ART.

Hawara, Biahmu, and Arsinoe. With Thirty Plates. By W. M. Flinders Petrie. (Field & Tuer.)

THE attraction of Mr. Petrie's exhibition of Graeco-Egyptian portrait-mummies, papyri, ancient textile fabrics, and miscellaneous

Egyptian antiquities, shown last summer at the Egyptian Hall in Piccadilly, was so exceptional that a special interest attaches to the volume in which he tells the story of his campaign. It is not enough to have merely seen that wonderful gallery of portrait-heads which, twelve months since, brought so vividly before our eyes the men and women who lived and died from twenty-two to nineteen centuries ago, in a forgotten provincial town of the Fayûm; it is not enough to have looked upon the faded rose-wreaths and garlands of immortelles which adorned their mummies in the tomb—to have examined their mirrors, their combs, their perfume vases, and all the pathetic personal relics with which the piety of friends and relatives provided for the needs of the beloved dead in the underworld. We wanted to know under exactly what circumstances these things were found, and what clue, if any, has been discovered to the community and the school of art thus startlingly evoked from the darkness and solitude of the grave. Nor was it only in funerary portraits and funerary relics that the exhibition was so rich. It contained all that time and the spoiler have spared of the famous Fayûm colossi and the yet more famous Labyrinth; it contained a mass of papyri, more or less fragmentary, ranging over a considerable part of the Ptolemaic, and the whole of the Roman, period; and, above all, it contained the great Homer papyrus—a fifth-century document of singular beauty and unique importance, abounding in diacritical marks, and enriched with marginal notes giving variants from the readings of Aristarchus and other scholia.

It may as well be said at once that Mr. Petrie's new volume fulfils more than the promise of his exhibition. It not only gives us a lively account of the work and the workers, and a minute description of the "finds," but it includes some admirably sober and convincing pages on the plan of the Labyrinth and the true character and extent of the semi-fabulous Lake Moeris—both subjects upon which a more than ordinary amount of fantastic speculation has been lavished. Notably, Mr. Petrie demolishes in one sentence the lately propagated theory which supposes the Fayûm basin and the Wady Rayan depression to have formed one connected sheet of water, constituting the Lake Moeris of the ancients:

"The secondary basin of the Wadi Rayan to the south," he says, "never had any connexion with the Fayûm basin in historic times, the ground rising over 100 feet above Nile level between the two depressions."

As on two previous occasions, Mr. Petrie, instead of relying exclusively upon his own resources, has called in the aid of various of his friends; thus, in addition to his own carefully detailed statements and sound archaeological views, enriching his book with the critical dicta of specialists. With regard to the value of these extraneous chapters, it is only necessary to say that Mr. Cecil Smith, of the British Museum, contributes a sketch of the history of ancient Greek and Roman encaustic painting and a descriptive catalogue of the Hawara portraits; that Mr. F. Llewellyn Griffith, also of the British Museum, translates the hieroglyphic inscriptions on the great sarcophagus of Ankhrui and other coffins; that Mr. Percy Newberry, apropos of the flower-wreaths and vegetable product, gives a chapter on ancient botany; and that Prof. Sayce undertakes the Hawara Homer and the miscellaneous papyri. The result is a most valuable and delightful book, in which each subject is first treated from the archaeological point of view by Mr. Petrie, and then separately discussed from the point of view of the classical and scientific specialist.

With the exception of three photographic plates, the whole of the illustrations—including hieroglyphic and Greek inscriptions, facsimiles of papyri, sketches of domestic objects, patterns, coins, cartonnage heads, pottery, tools, flint implements, maps, and plans—are from Mr. Petrie's own hand, and drawn with his accustomed fidelity. Especially noticeable for minute and delicate execution are plates i. and ii, reproducing the mythological paintings on the sarcophagus of Ankhrui. The photograph from the Homer papyrus (showing a marginal annotation) might have been more brilliant; and, unfortunately, the same may be said of the eighteen autotypes of funerary portraits. This matters comparatively little in the case of the papyrus, since, owing to the patriotic liberality of Mr. Jesse Haworth, the original document can be seen now and always in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; but as regards the beautiful panel portraits,* which have been dispersed since we saw them all together in the Egyptian Hall, the want of sharpness is a real loss. They form, nevertheless, a most interesting series, and would serve to sell a far less attractive book.

No previous discovery of ancient paintings has thrown so valuable a light upon the history and technique of the ancient school as these Fayûm portraits. Mr. Petrie shows them to be derived by a clearly traced process of evolution from the portrait-heads first modelled in stucco upon Egyptian mummy-cases by Egyptian or Graeco-Egyptian artists, and then painted. From coloured portraiture in high relief to coloured portraiture on flexible canvas, where a certain amount of relief was obtained by the prominence of the bandaged face beneath, was one step; and from the flexible canvas to the panel upon which the semblance of relief was given by light and shadow and foreshortening was another and a far more important step. It marked the transition from the Eastern to the Western school of painting, and it occurred at the precise time when Western influence was brought to bear upon Egypt by the visit of Hadrian in A.D. 130. The new style called for a new method; and, although some of Mr. Petrie's specimens were painted in tempera, like a large class of cartonnages, the majority were executed with a medium of melted bees-wax. But for these technical details, and for a highly interesting account of the later phases of mummy-decoration and burial, I must refer readers to Mr. Petrie's third chapter. Most of the persons who were buried with panel portraits appear to have been of Greek, or Greek and Egyptian, parentage; others, as may be seen by certain of the autotypes in pl. x., were undoubtedly Romans. Yet more interesting than the question of their nationality is the question whether their portraits were painted during life or after death.

* Some of these, however, are still accessible in public collections, several having been presented to the British Museum and the National Gallery by Mr. Jesse Haworth and Mr. Martyn Kennard. The former gentleman has also given three or four fine specimens to various museums in Manchester.

"When we see that the portraits of children are always proportionate in age to the sizes of their mummies," says Mr. Petrie, "it is impossible to suppose that their portraits were usually painted long before death. On the other hand, the extremely lifelike, individual, speaking expression of the faces has led many to suppose that they could only have been executed from the living person. Altogether it seems most probable that the painters knew all the principal families, frequently painting portraits and other subjects for them to hang in their houses, like the framed portrait in pl. xii., which had been hung on a wall; and that when a portrait was needed for a mummy, a sketch was made from the body by the painter, and afterwards worked up with a lifelike expression from a previous portrait, or from memory. The placid repose and impassive dignity of so many of the faces is thus the more readily accounted for. The large proportion of young persons, most being under thirty, does not indicate that the portraits were painted in youth ready for a later decease, for on the gilt busts the ages given are not advanced—20, 21, and 32, while Démôs was but 24. The truth seems to be that, though a person might be anxious to recall the fresh beauty of a son, or daughter, or bride whose death was mourned, there was not an equal inducement to perpetuate the features of an aged relative; and where a stout old lady has been attempted, the result is not pleasing" (chap. iii., p. 20).

Next in interest to those chapters which relate to the portraits is Prof. Sayce's chapter on the papyri, which want of space compels me, with regret, to touch upon far too briefly. Of his remarks on the Homer papyrus, I am not competent to form an opinion; though the elaborate and scholarly fashion in which he has compared the various readings and pointed out the special value of the text is evident to the least classical of readers. Some of the Ptolemaic papyri, though fragmentary, are very curious and interesting. They consist chiefly of lists of taxpayers, of private accounts, and of copies of deeds and other law documents. Some are as late as the reigns of Tiberius, Vespasian, and Antoninus; and, although the majority are written in cursive Greek, some are in capitals.

"The most important of the fragments," writes Prof. Sayce, "are two which come from a lost history of Sicily, perhaps that of Timaios. The text is written in very small, but finely formed, capitals, and the beginnings of the first thirty-four lines of the second column are fairly well preserved. . . . The text seems to contain a description of the fortifications of Syracuse" (chap. v., p. 28).

Besides the legal papyri, which Prof. Sayce supposes to represent the destroyed contents of a scribe's office, Mr. Petrie discovered another mass of documents which consists of household accounts and records of private expenditure. From these we learn the price of provisions in the Fayûm some fourteen hundred years ago, one document giving the daily cost of living for what is evidently a family, for eighteen successive days. Here is the sixth day's entry:

"Sixth day: birds, 4 drachmae; meat, 1 dr. 1 obol; salt, 3 ob.; a sheep's head, 1 ob.; seasoning, 3 ob.; fuel, 2 ob.; bread, 1 ob.; eggs, 1½ ob.; lentils, 3 ob.; oil, 3 ob.; a pet-dog, 3 ob.; the man with it, 3 ob.; an ass, 1 obol."

That a pet dog should cost no more than the oil or lentils for the day's consumption, and that the man who brought it to the house should be paid as much for his trouble as the price of the dog, is very curious. The charge for the ass can, of course, have been only for hire.

"Most of the papyri," says Prof. Sayce, "are in a mutilated and fragmentary state; some of them, indeed, are mere scraps; and the multiplicity of cursive hands which they contain makes the decipherment of them difficult. But with the help of similar papyri now in the museums of Paris and Berlin, the work, however laborious, will be hereafter accomplished; the lacunae the fragments present will be filled up; and the symbols which still baffle the decipherer will be all explained. We shall then come to possess an intimate knowledge of the internal administration and financial condition of the Fayûm during the Ptolemaic and Roman ages, and shall be able to form a comparatively detailed map of the villages it embraced, and the streets which intersected its capital" (chap. v., p. 36).

No more decisive testimony to the value of Mr. Petrie's papyri (which are several hundreds in number) could possibly be brought forward; neither could it proceed from a higher authority.

A LOST PICTURE BY DENIS VAN ALSLOOT.

Brussels: August 9, 1889.

In the ACADEMY of August 3 attention has been called to Adrien de But's testimony to a Kempis, given in the August number of the Précis historiques of Brussels.

Another article in the same magazine may interest English readers. It is a description of the Ommeganeke (a sort of popular procession) at Brussels in 1619, as represented in the pictures of Denis van Alsloot. In the original those pictures were six in number, now dispersed among various galleries of Europe. Nos. 1 and 6 are at Madrid in the Royal Museum, and there numbered No. 1783 and 1787; Nos. 5 and 2 are at South Kensington—Nos. 449 and 168 of the acquisitions of the year 1885. This last of Denis van Alsloot's paintings—viz., No. 2—came to South Kensington from Stafford Castle. But Nos. 3 and 4 of the original work are lost, perhaps lying in some private collection. Publicity in the ACADEMY may direct enquiry in the right quarter, and, therefore, I have taken the liberty of sending this little note.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

WE hear that the Assyrian and "Hittite" galleries in the new museum at Berlin were opened to the public last month.

At a meeting of the Sheffield Town Council on Wednesday, a resolution was passed that application should be made to the trustees of St. George's Guild that the contents of St. George's Museum at Walkley should be lent to the corporation, for a period of not less than twenty years, to be placed in Meersbrook Hall, the corporation to furnish the building for the purpose, to adapt part of it for students, and to undertake the maintenance of the museum; allowing the master of the guild and his nominee and two trustees thereof to be associated with them in its management and control. It is understood that Mr. Ruskin approves of the scheme.

THE Photographic Convention of the United Kingdom will celebrate the jubilee year of photography by a meeting next week in London. The programme includes an exhibition of pictures, lantern entertainments, papers on the science and art of photography, &c. The proceedings will be opened by a conversazione on Monday, August 19, at 6.30 p.m., in St. James's Hall, Piccadilly.

THE Palestine Exploration Fund proposes to publish, uniformly with "The Survey of Western Palestine," a series of architectural drawings by M. Lecomte, illustrating M. Clermont-Ganneau's archaeological mission to Palestine on behalf of the Fund more than ten years ago. The plates will be accompanied with a descriptive letterpress, written by M. Clermont-Ganneau.

A VALUABLE collection of several hundred Roman coins, arranged in chronological order, has been lent to the Guildhall library by Mr. W. Rome. Firstly, there are coins representative of the archaic period from 700 to 480 B.C. The coins of the transitional period, from 480 to 400, come next; and then succeed the specimens that illustrate the age from 400 to 336, at which Roman art reached its highest point. Coins showing the several periods of decline are placed next in order; and, lastly, there are several interesting medallions.

PROF. ANGELO GUBERNATIS, of Florence—whose industry is insatiable—has just issued the first part of a Dictionary of Living Italian Artists, comprising painters, sculptors, and architects. The work will consist of ten parts, of eighty pages each, and will be completed by August of next year. The publishers are MM. Luigi and Gonnelli, of Florence.

A STORY comes from Japan of the recovery of a picture painted over a thousand years ago (in A.D. 859,) by Kanaoka, the father of Japanese pictorial art. It represents a figure about 2 ft. high, every detail being finished with the elaborate care lavished by the old Japanese masters on their choicest works. According to a description in the Japan Mail, the only parts of the body exposed were the face, arms, and feet, but the lines and colouring of these portions plainly showed the hand of a great expert. "The flesh was firm, the contours were delicate, and the colouring, though centuries had passed since the time of its application, remained mellow if not fresh. But it was in the treatment of the drapery that the artist had put forth his greatest strength. The folds hung with indescribable softness and fidelity to nature, and the splendid brocades of the priestly vestments were depicted so inimitably that one felt inclined to caress the soft rich stuff." The picture in the course of ages passed into the hands of the famous artist Kano Motonobu, and on his death in 1559 it was among the treasures he left behind with a certificate from him that it was the work of the great Kanaoka. What happened to it after Motonobu's death is not known, but quite recently it was found in a pawnshop in Tokio. It was purchased by a dealer, and was offered for sale abroad; but efforts which were made to prevent this remarkable work from going out of the country were successful; and it was purchased by a wealthy Japanese merchant, who intends presenting it to the National Museum. It has been said by experts that the genuine works of Kanaoka now extant may be counted on the fingers of one hand, and that the whereabouts of each is well known.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Carapanos, a member of the Greek parliament, gave an account of excavations conducted at a site in Corfu, bought by him for the purpose, by M. Lechat, a member of the French school at Athens. The most notable discovery was a collection of nearly a thousand terra-cotta statuettes of Artemis, with a bow in her hand, and a hound by her side, which were evidently offerings to an image of the goddess. M. Homolle also submitted a number of plans representing the results of his excavations in Delos during several years past. They comprise a suggested restoration of the great temple and temenos of Apollo, and incidentally record the history of the Ionic order of architecture in Greece from the earliest times.

The French chamber has sanctioned a vote of 180,000 francs (£720) for the acquisition by the Louvre of a selection of Merovingian coins, 1131 in number, chosen from the cabinet of the late M. de Ponton d'Amécourt.

MUSIC.

MUSIC BOOKS.

Dido and Aeneas. By Henry Purcell. (Novello.) It is more than fifteen years since the Purcell Society was founded for the purpose of doing justice to the memory of England's greatest musical genius. The "Yorkshire Feast Song" was issued in 1878, and "Timon of Athens" in 1882. Now, after the long lapse of seven years, appears the third volume containing Purcell's music-drama "Dido and Aeneas." This work is edited by Mr. William Cummings; and it would certainly be difficult to name anyone better qualified for the task. It is not quite certain whether the composer wrote this work in his seventeenth or in his twenty-second year (1675 or 1680). Sir J. Hawkins is the sole authority for the earlier date. In the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society, now preserved in the Royal College of Music, there is a libretto of the opera, which Mr. Cummings believes to be an original one; and therein it is stated that the work was performed at Mr. Josias Priest's boarding-school at Chelsea; and an advertisement in the London Gazette of November 25, 1680, gives notice of the removal of Mr. Priest's school from Leicester Fields to Chelsea. The statement in the libretto does not, however, conclusively prove that Hawkins's date is wrong, for it does not say "was first performed." The Musical Antiquarian Society first published the music of "Dido and Aeneas" in 1841; but thirty years later, Dr. Rimbault, by comparing music and libretto, discovered that some numbers were missing. A few years ago Mr. Cummings was fortunate enough to find a MS. score, written probably in Purcell's time, containing these missing numbers. The present edition is, therefore—so far as one can tell—complete. The music is printed in score as Purcell wrote it, with the addition of a pianoforte accompaniment. Purcell's orchestration consists merely of strings and harpsichord, the part for the latter being merely indicated—according to the manner of the time—by a "Basso," which in a few places only is figured. In his works written for the stage Purcell used hautboys, trumpets, bassoons, and drums; but for a school performance he was probably compelled to limit himself to strings. It is considered most probable that at this performance the composer himself presided at the harpsichord; and, in that case, we may feel sure that the accompaniment was "replete with fancy and beauty." Purcell, like all geniuses, was far in advance of his age and his contemporaries. The first thing to notice in "Dido and Aeneas" is the novelty of its form. It was, according to Mr. Cummings, the first opera written in England without spoken dialogue; and Grabu—a French musician favoured by Charles II.—was the only contemporary to follow this model in his "Albion and Albanus," produced in 1687. It is a matter for regret that Purcell had to work on a libretto little calculated to fire his genius. It will suffice to give the author's name. He was Nahum Tate, and he is chiefly known for the metrical version of the Psalms which he produced in concert with Nicholas Brady. The choruses in "Dido and Aeneas" are full of charm and vigour. In the second act, there is one, "In our deep-vaulted cell," in which short phrases are repeated "in the manner of an echo." The effect was quite new at the time; and the "echo" chorus—evidently behind the scenes—must have delighted the boarding-school audience. The final chorus of the last act—"With drooping wings, ye Cupids come"—is one of Purcell's finest. And it comes after the wonderfully pathetic death-song of the unhappy queen. "When I am laid in earth" is from first note to last an inspiration. This Purcell volume, most carefully prepared and clearly printed, contains a facsimile of the libretto mentioned above.

The Last Night at Bethany. By O. Lee Williams. (Novello.) This is a short Church Cantata written at the request of the stewards for the Gloucester Festival to be held next month. Now that so much attention is being paid to the "service of song" in churches, musicians cannot do better than try their hand at compositions of this kind. In "Bethany" we have the pathetic tale of Mary anointing the feet of Jesus. Mr. J. Bennett, who has prepared the book, gives the plain gospel narrative, which is treated by the composer as recitative—though not recitative of the dry kind. For the solos, quartet, and choruses, the librettist has provided verse both smooth and elegant. Mr. Williams has not forgotten that we live in a chromatic age; and his music, while bearing many a trace of old modes, forms, and harmonies, is in the main modern. From a reading of his work the solos appear to be the least attractive numbers, but one must not judge of them without the orchestra. In the choral numbers much skill is shown in the part-writing, and besides there is variety in the rhythm and independent interest in the accompaniments. In the first chorus, "Sweet Lord and Saviour come," there are some pleasing harmonies, and throughout there is an absence of formality. In the chorale (No. 3) the soprano voices are not at first employed, and then the short phrase for soprano and contralto alone makes the closing tutti impressive. The chorus which follows the tenor solo, "O God, most merciful," contains some good writing, and the orchestra evidently has therein an important part to play. Only in a few places is the full body of voices employed; and this, with the ever-changing rhythm, affords excellent contrast. The archaic cadence near the end has a quaint effect. The double chorus, "The Poor! O Man of Sorrows," if not altogether original will, no doubt, tell well in performance. An orchestral interlude entitled "Night, our Lord sleeps" looks attractive. There is simplicity and yet charm about the music. In it we have an arpeggio passage for harp, introducing an unaccompanied "quartet of angels" for female voices. The movement concludes with a brief coda. The "quartet" consists only of a few bars, and is to be sung from a distance—in transept or choir. In the finale the composer seems to have put forth his full strength. We have a flowing andante theme, "Calm ye, O winds around Bethany blowing," taken up first by soprano, then by contralto, and afterwards by full chorus.

Then, in a long and expressive choral recit, the Saviour's agony is described, followed by joyful strains—the "Lord's triumph over death and hell." A skilful "Hallelujah" stretto leads to a repetition of the phrase of triumph, amid which the trombones thunder out the first line of the old Easter hymn, bringing the Cantata to an impressive close.

Elysium. For Soprano Solo, Chorus and Orchestra. By Rosalind Frances Ellicott. (Novello.) The talented daughter of the Bishop of Gloucester contributes to the Gloucester Festival programme a setting of Mrs. Hemans's touching little poem. It is not possible to judge properly of the music without the orchestral effects; but it is quite possible from a perusal of the vocal score to see that it is full of grace and skill, and that the composer has not sought, at the expense of clearness, to be original. It may be that we are reminded here of Mendelssohn, there of Schumann; but this is far better than any attempt to show independence. The moment when an artist can walk alone comes of itself. The fair land of Elysium is pleasantly depicted in the opening chorus. Much here evidently depends on the orchestration. A short recitative brings us to a second chorus, in which mention is first of all made of the warriors who dwell in Elysium, and the music is naturally march-like in character. The concluding chorus is pleasing, and the composer effectively introduces the opening theme of the work when reference is made to Elysium. Indeed, from this point to the close this theme is naturally dwelt on, being suggested by the last line of the poem, "Fade away thou shore of Asphodel," which is repeated several times by the voices.

Music for the People. By Robert A. Marr. (Edinburgh and Glasgow: Menzies.) This book gives a retrospective view of music in connexion with the Glasgow International Exhibition of 1888, and is based on sketches and notices written by the author for the official daily programme. For purposes of reference it will no doubt be of service to a certain class of persons. But the public generally will read with interest the introductory narrative, dealing with the rise of choral societies in Scotland, which occupies about a third of the book. The Musical Society of Edinburgh was instituted as early as 1728. The early attention paid to Handel's music in Scotland deserves notice. Handel, indeed, gave to the above-mentioned society the privilege of having full copies made for them of all his MS. oratorios. The first orchestral society at Glasgow was established at the beginning of the nineteenth century, but choral performances were not given until much later.

Second Sonata, in G minor. By Erskine Allon. (Op. 12.) (London Music Publishing Company.) Fugitive pieces are the fashion of the day. To write a successful Sonata is no easy task, and we do not think that Mr. Allon appears to best advantage in a work of this kind. There is some clever writing in the Allegro. The rhythm, however, becomes wearisome. The Tempo di Menuetto has grace and charm, but the composer would do well to adopt a more comfortable style of pianoforte writing. The theme of the slow movement is attractive; but the Finale is, on the whole, disappointing.

Six Anthems. By S. Dunn. (London Music Publishing Company.) The composer gives us a little help, for after the word "Anthems," he writes "easy and melodious." Neither statement do we dispute, only it must be acknowledged that the latter is somewhat vague. There are different kinds of melody, and here it is popular rather than dignified.

LITERATURE.

The Queen of Naples and Lord Nelson. By John Cordy Jeaffreson. In 2 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

MR. CORDY JEAFFRESON is well known as an explorer in the bye-ways of letters. His Real Lord Byron abounds in paradox, but throws fresh light on the life of the poet; his Lady Hamilton and Lord Nelson is an elaborate review of the relations between a historical siren and the most illustrious of England's seamen. His principal object in the present volume is to retrace the career of Maria Caroline, the famous Queen of Naples of the first years of the century, which, he insists, has been misdescribed by calumny, and, incidentally, to show the association with it of the two chief personages of his last work; and thus he partly traverses old ground, while partly opening new, in the course of his narrative. His volumes abound in details of interest, contain a good deal that is comparatively unknown, and, written as they are with sense and discernment, are not without real historical value.

Mr. Jeaffreson has done well to set forth the bright side of the reign of the Queen, the period before the Revolution in France, when she played gracefully, and with some success, the part of a beneficent despot; and he has justly remarked that nine-tenths of the slanders directed against Maria Caroline, as in the analogous case of Marie Antoinette, rest on no evidence, or are utterly false. He also relieves the dark picture of the later part of the queen's career of several painful and repulsive features. He proves that she did not directly share in some of the crimes committed in her name; and he shows that she was not the female Nero of Jacobin and even of courtly defamers. He has not, however, really modified what we believe is the just verdict of history on this remarkable woman. Maria Caroline could be a good ruler, when her feelings and wishes were not crossed; but she had the absolute instincts of the House of Hapsburg, and in her contest with the Revolution in Europe she was implacable, and without remorse or scruple. She was no Messalina—nay, she may have been pure; but, like her illfated sister of France, she gave a ready opening to malicious tongues, and her indiscretions were many and certain. If, too, she was not the crowned fury which even Napoleon declared she was, her faults as a sovereign were great and palpable; and the opinion against her of the kings and statesmen who settled Europe in 1814-15 was so decided that, had she survived, she would not have been placed again on the throne of Naples.

Mr. Jeaffreson is not correct or judicious in praising Maria Theresa for the training she gave to her numerous and remarkable children. The empress was so immersed in affairs of state that their education was much neglected. They grew up in the dangerous air of the imperial court of the eighteenth century, uncontrolled, untaught, and surrounded by flattery. Maria Caroline had the strongest nature of all. She was a Marie Antoinette, superior in beauty, but cast in a sterner and harder mould; and she had more ability than the dreamer Joseph, or the well-meaning but somewhat feeble Leopold. Born in 1752, she was still a child when, in 1768, she married Ferdinand, the Bourbon ruler of the two Sicilies—a mere “royal boor,” without parts or knowledge, who knew nothing of the arts of government, and who spent his life between the pleasures of the chase and playing practical jokes with his lazzaroni subjects. The queen had ambition and great powers of mind. She soon gained a complete ascendancy over a dull and a worse than commonplace lord; and, after thrusting aside the aged Tanucci, she became, and continued to be, for years, the real sovereign of the two Sicilies. It was the period when absolutism, throughout the continent, was allying itself with what it conceived to be the liberal and progressive spirit of the age; and the queen, able and eager for power, may be said to have been the real power of the state, and one of the chiefs of the movement. It is not to be denied that she achieved much good. She made her army and fleet a reality; she emancipated the kingdom from the yoke of Spain; she greatly improved the institutions of the state; she promoted all kinds of useful reforms; she removed many abuses from the laws, and laid a heavy hand on noble wrongdoers; and she filled her court with philosophic spirits, the preachers of the new faith in politics. Yet, like all the “liberal” despots of the time, she held to the creed of the divine right of rulers. Her paramount object in these various changes was to strengthen and aggrandise the monarchy. If she thought that good was to be done for the people, she never supposed that it was to be done by them; and she entrenched herself within the lines of absolutism, while she conceived that she was a great popular chief. And, in truth, she had done great things for the nation. The error was common to all her crowned caste. Their reforms were not only to sweep away what was worthless and effete in the state, but to awaken the people to the sense of its power, and to let the spirit of revolution loose; and in her case, as in that of others, it was to weaken the classes that surrounded the throne, and fill them with discontent and alarm, and yet not to conciliate the real nation, for ages misgoverned in every way, and stirred by the passions of the age of Rousseau.

The revolution came, and Maria Caroline was not slow to perceive its tendencies. Breaking out in the midst of the sentimental dreams of crowned heads and philosophic nobles, it fiercely assailed the old order of Europe; and the queen toiled hard to array a league of kings against a league of Jacobinism enthroned in Paris. She did her best to arouse her reluctant brothers to crush the monster at its birth in France; and she suddenly changed into a suspicious despotism the kind of paternal government that she had set up at Naples. It was the murder, however, of Marie Antoinette, and the atrocities of the Reign of Terror, that finally determined the course of her conduct. She stood out, on the stage of Europe, the most passionate, revengeful, and not the least able, of the enemies of France, and of the blood-stained Republic. For nearly ten years she sustained the contest. She stopped at nothing to attain her ends. She unquestionably committed many dark deeds. She proved herself capable of fraud and perfidy. But the provocation should be taken into account; and those who opposed her were at least equally guilty. There is much truth in Napoleon's remark that she ruled “in those days like an angry woman”; but if she stooped to forgery to raise supplies, if she repeatedly broke faith with the envoys of France, if she marched an army to Rome without regard to treaties, if she set justice at naught by widespread proscriptions, she was a special mark of Jacobin hatred, and she repaid her enemies in their own coin. It should be added that the ribald slanders urged against her fair fame are, in the main, untrue; and Mr. Jeaffreson has clearly proved that she was at Palermo when the worst acts, perhaps, of her government were done without her sanction. After her expulsion from Naples in 1806, she still endeavoured to prolong the fight; and, though we do not echo Napoleon's phrase that she was “ready to swim in blood to regain her crown,” she certainly showed that she had no scruple in conspiring against his usurping brother. Her nature grew harder and worse with age. She tried in Sicily to play the unbridled despot; she quarrelled with the States and with the English minister; and her last years were darkened by evil displays of impotent passion and malicious plotting. The refusal of the powers at Vienna in 1814 to restore her to her forfeited throne is, we have said, evidence of great weight against her. The well-meaning despot of 1780-90 had, in fact, been transformed in her struggle with fate into a cruel intriguer, thirsting for revenge.

We must pass lightly over the remaining parts of Mr. Jeaffreson's interesting book. They do not contain much new matter. Emma Hamilton, he has shown, never fell so low as has been alleged by malevolent gossip; and the queen is not to be severely blamed for receiving her at court as the wife of a minister, considering especially the morals of Naples. The influence of Lady Hamilton over Maria Caroline, it is almost certain, was never so great as it is alleged to have been by that clever schemer; and all the stories about their partnership in vice are unfounded and revolting calumnies. It was the queen who performed the important services to English interests in 1796-98, claimed by Nelson to have been done by his mistress. She informed our minister of the alliance about to be made between Spain and France; and she opened the Sicilian ports to the English fleet, in order to obtain the supplies it needed before it set sail to conquer at the Nile. As regards the parentage of the well-known “Horatia,” Mr. Jeaffreson has very fully proved that she was not a child of the queen and of Nelson; and he has added something to the conclusive testimony he brought forward in a preceding work, that, according to common report and tradition, she was a daughter of Nelson and Lady Hamilton. Scandals like these, however, might be let pass, especially as they must vex people still alive.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

The History of a Slave. By H. H. Johnstone. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

THE "happy thought" of allowing the native to tell his own tale in his own way, if not originally suggested, was, at all events, first worked out in a satisfactory manner by Mr. Churchward in his Blackbirding in the South Pacific. Mr. Churchward's hero, John King Bruce, who draws such a vivid sketch of the horrors of the Coolie traffic in the South Sea Islands, finds a worthy rival in Mr. Johnstone's hero, Abu-l-Guwah, who paints a no less vivid picture of the horrors of the slave-trade in the Dark Continent. Both writers have that personal knowledge of their respective environments, and especially that familiarity with the social conditions, which are indispensable elements of success in this branch of half-imaginative, half-realistic, literature. Hence both works stand on nearly the same level of excellence in their general treatment of the subject; and both are about equally successful in conveying to the reader, under a somewhat fanciful form, a correct idea of the actual relations in their respective spheres of action. Where Mr. Johnstone yields the palm to his predecessor is, perhaps, in the dramatic truth of his personation. At least, it can scarcely be said of Abu-l-Guwah that either his language or his observations are always quite consistent with the character of an average Sudanese negro; as when he exclaims, "What curious people you Europeans are! You ask so many questions, and you want to know so much about things that do not concern you."

But it should be stated in extenuation that Abu-l-Guwah is something more than an average negro; for at the time he meets his European interlocutor at Tripoli he has a terrible tale to reveal of his experiences during the many years of his enforced wanderings from his native land near the western seaboard to the Mediterranean shores. The first thing he clearly remembers was playing as a child with the skull of one of a neighbouring hostile tribe, who had been captured and eaten by the young men of his village. One of the last events he has to relate is the death of his wife on the verge of the thirsty desert, attracted to her destruction by a mirage which she takes to be "the great sea of Bornu." Here in her distraught mind she fancies she sees her mother and the house she used to live in; but, after running a little way, she throws up her hands and "falls down in a heap." Then his companions, all runaway slaves like himself, perishing of hunger and thirst amid the trackless sands, "run up and throw themselves on her and cut her throat and greedily suck her blood." Presently they fall in with a caravan of Fezzan traders bound for Murzuk; and so escape a lingering death in the Sahara at the cost of their freedom, the narrator entering the household of a powerful Sherif, in whose service he ultimately finds his way to Tripoli.

His tale of woes and adventures filling up the intervening years is skilfully told in such a way as to embody "a realistic sketch of life in the Western Sudan," the impression being heightened by uniform fidelity to the local colouring, and by the tact with which many incidents actually witnessed by the author have been interwoven in the general narrative. Especially characteristic of existence on the borderland between Islâm and heathendom is the story of our hero's capture by a band of ruthless slavehunters, who raid his native village, spreading havoc throughout the district, and wasting life out of all proportion to the number of wretched victims actually carried away into bondage for ever. We know from Nachtigal's account of the state of things prevailing in the region stretching south from Lake Tsad that the evils of African life are intensified in many parts of this border zone, where the aggressive Mohammedans are brutalised by daily scenes of plunder and murder, and where the pagan populations are reduced to the last stage of degradation compatible with the existence of human society. Remembering the scenes described by Nachtigal among the arboreal inhabitants of Kimre, we may well believe that there is no exaggeration in Abu-l-Guwah's graphic account of the destruction of his people by the slave-hunting Fulah and Haussa subjects of the Sultan of Gashka, who led him away into captivity.

"They captured most of the runaway party who had been concerned in the death of their brothers, and brought them into the open place where we were lying chained. They tied the men to stakes and tree trunks, and lopped their limbs off one by one, and then beheaded them; they ripped up the women; and lifting up the children by the feet, they swung them round and dashed out their brains on the stone seats in the open square, where our elders used to sit under the shade of the big trees. While these things were being done a small body of the Ful-be were busy burning the town and cutting down the plantations of bananas, and setting fire to the dry bush outside the town, so that the whole place might be laid bare and afford no hiding-place to such of our people as might have escaped. All through that day, some in the sun and some in the shade, we lay chained together in the open square of our town; and so we lay all through the night, while the Ful-be made big bonfires and roasted our sheep and goats."

Then follows a picture which should be taken to heart by those who speak so complacently of the mildness of domestic slavery throughout Mohammedan lands in North Africa. Every "happy" slave in a Moslem household represents, at a moderate estimate, at least ten lives and an incalculable amount of misery and atrocities.

"Early the next morning they passed in review all of us whom they had captured, which, I suppose, amounted to one-half of our town-people—perhaps some five hundred. All such as were aged or deformed or weakly were separated from the others, and put on one side. Their chains were taken off, and they were told jestingly by the Ful-be that they might go where they pleased; but when the poor simpletons began to slink off towards the bush, the Ful-be, with shouts of laughter, began firing at them with their guns and riding them down on horseback. Some of the Ful-be horsemen would stop for a moment and tie a rope round the ankle of one of these fugitives who had fallen down, and fasten the other end of the rope to his stirrup, and then ride round and round the square at full gallop, till the man he had dragged with him was simply a shapeless mass of blood and bones. . . . All we slaves whom they had selected to take away with them were marched in twos and threes to the river, where we were made to wash and drink. Here several who were mad with grief jumped into the river, though they were chained together, and tried to swim down the stream; but they all sank to the bottom and were seen no more."

Nor does Abu-l-Guwah find things quite so pleasant in the households of his Moslem masters as might be supposed from certain roseate descriptions of domestic slavery in Sudan and Mauritania. In one place he gets into trouble over a somewhat romantic love affair, is tied to a stake, flogged till he faints, and left the whole night tied by his wrists to the stake until released towards dawn by his innamorata. Elsewhere he is lashed with "a great whip made of hippopotamus hide"; whereupon lowering his head he charges at his master "like a bull, butting him full in the stomach," and avoids a very mauvais quart d'heure by making off and enlisting in the army of a neighbouring potentate. And so, getting tired of this "happy slave life," after sundry and diverse blood-curdling adventures, he plunges, with others, into the desert and at last reaches the Fezzan frontier under the circumstances above described.

The horrors of some of the scenes in this part of the work almost exceed the limits of good taste; and the detailed account, for instance, of the Sultan of Zinder's atrocities, with the doings of his executioner at the "Tree of Death," might, perhaps, have been treated somewhat more summarily without much loss to the lesson these things are intended to teach. Otherwise there is little fault to find with the book on the score of accuracy, though the student of Arabic may be puzzled to know why the hero's name, Abu'lquwwat, as correctly inscribed under his portrait facing the title-page, should be translated Abu-l-Guwah. The note at p. 140, to the effect that Air or Airi is the name of the people of Azben, seems also somewhat misleading. Air is, in fact, the Berber, Azben the negro, name of this region, whose present rulers call themselves Kel-Owi, that is, People of Owi, the place whence they migrated to their upland homes in the Central Sahara.

There is neither a table of contents nor an index to the book, which, however, is richly illustrated with numerous original drawings and sketches by the author.

Studies of the Legend of the Holy Grail, with especial Reference to the Hypothesis of its Celtic Origin. By Alfred Nutt. (David Nutt.)

A CAREFUL search into the origin of the most famous and beautiful of the legends of the Middle Ages—a legend which has not yet ceased to inspire poet and painter, and which must be accounted the most worthy spiritual legacy the twelfth century has left us—cannot fail to be welcome. Mr. Nutt, no novice in the field of folklore, has here grappled with a task such as tries a man; and he has not only succeeded in clearly presenting his own conclusions, but in minutely and judiciously surveying most of the work that has preceded his own on the subject of the Grail.

After describing the texts on which the various existing presentments of the legend rest, and distinguishing the root-forms of the earlier versions and the opinions held about them, the author turns to the Celtic sources, and among them succeeds in identifying the several folk-tales which were blent by the writers of the Plantagenet court with Oriental Christian or Judaic legends into the new and wonderful romance which we all know from Mallory's noble abridgment. In a following chapter the ethical and spiritual ideas that have informed the successive phases of the Grail legend are touched upon in a few pages, which are among the most striking in the whole volume. There are appendices added on Wolfram and on the S. Brandan story, and two useful indices, conclude the whole book—a good-sized, well-printed volume of about three hundred pages.

The only way to get a conclusive estimate of Mr. Nutt's progress in the investigation he has taken up is to read his book; but one may usefully summarise his conclusions here. Among the formative elements of our Grail story that are of Celtic origin, one may distinguish the stories that have crystallised about Percival, who is, of course, Peredur and the Amadan Mor or Great Fool of Campbell's West Highland tales. Such are the Feud-Quest, where a man by the use of talismans avenges his kinsman; the Expulsion and Return tale; and the Bespelled Castle tale, where a hero goes to an enchanted hold and by his questions breaks the spell under which the inmates are held—a spell connected with food from a magic vessel. Now, one of the characters in these tales is the Celtic war god, Bran, with his enchanted spear and cauldron. He is associated with Avalon, and he is the link by which the oriental legends of the Gospel of Nicodemus, early popular in Great Britain and centering round Joseph of Arimathea the saint of Glastonbury, were brought into connexion with the cycles of Peredur and his brother Gwalchmai (Gawain). This was done in the twelfth century; and the result was the spiritualisation of the whole story and the bestowal upon the Grail of that deep religious and ethical meaning, which reaches its fullest expression when Galahad supersedes Percival as the Grail-hero, and when the quest is made the turning-point of the whole Arthurian cycle. "The history of the Grail is thus the history of the gradual transformation of old Celtic folk-tales into a poem charged with Christian symbolism and mysticism." The twelfth century looked for a fit vehicle to express the new ideas, the new faith, the new feelings which were stirring it so profoundly; and this it found in the adaptation of Welsh myths. These tales were, by their essentially romantic character, in full consonance with the spirit of the age; and their artistic beauty, their weird supernatural colouring, their interesting presentment of women, even their extravagant devotion, possessed special attractions for the society of that time.

There are numerous points which one would be glad to notice or discuss in the course of the investigation so briefly sketched here. As to Wolfram's mysterious authority Kyot, we do not see how any critic can doubt that the existence of a North French* writer, Guyot le Provençal, would be the most natural, the most likely, and the most satisfactory way of accounting for the peculiarities of his version.

There is room for a revision of the Grail onomasticon: Addanc should be Addauc; mancipicelle is simply an old scribal error for la haulte pucelle, the damsel orgulous of other versions; moroneus is Morouseus, the ancestor of the Merwings; Longis is Longinus; Partinal is Parcival miswritten; Wolfram must have read Gingrenon, not Guigrenon, to account for his Kingrun.

Prof. Rhys has already succeeded in identifying a great number of the Arthurian names with their Welsh originals, and will give his results in a forthcoming volume on Arthur. And by paying heed to the prevailing confusions between l and s, b, g; h and n, b; u and w; c and t; en and m; and duly ascertaining coincidence of circumstance, they may all finally be identified, wherever the Welsh equation is preserved in the Mabinogion, or the pedigrees or triads.† It is even possible by minute observance of the corruptions that names assume to get at the age and peculiarities of the MSS. used by the adaptors or copyists, and now lost.

To touch on a few scattered topics. It will be noticed that the Grand S. Graal is elaborate in its geography, and that in connexion with a journey to Norway it mentions a Waleskog which looks like Wala-skog, forest of wood of Welshmen or Frenchmen; and if it could be so, is a curious indication of the writer's own knowledge of foreign lands. In the account of Heinrich's poem (p. 27), the analyser mistakes the mention of the "toblier," i.e., "tablier," chess- or draft-board, a characteristic Celtic touch. The counsels of p. 150 are to be compared with the counsels given to Sigfrid by his uncle Gripe and his Lady Sigdrifa, and represent an early species of didactic poetry widely spread over the Teutonic world. The well-known testimony of Helyes of Borron is not incredible, and has, to my mind, been rather unjustly discredited. It can surely be reconciled with what one knows from internal evidence of the origin of the Grail stories. The prologue to the Conte du Graal is archaic and worthy of special study. Students of the Arthurian cycle should not omit to read Mr. Nutt's subsequent paper on Buddha's alms-dish in the Archæological Review. It should form an appendix to the present volume in any fresh edition.

This book is a distinct step forward upon a very difficult path—it is suggestive, it clears the way for fresh workers, and gets rid of a good deal of useless and baseless guessing once for all. It is not the least service that Mr. Nutt has rendered to British mythography, and we hope that it will not be the last. The extreme beauty of the various parts of the Arthurian cycle must always attract students,

* There is no need to suppose Guyot to have written in Provençal. His name would show that he had at some time been in South Gaul, but was, when the name was given to him, living in North Gaul out of the Languedoc.

† To be added to the name-list are Galagort, castle GG 44, Garahiet, magician; Hebron B 7; Hortoblande D 15, and Ortoberlande—i.e., Broce-liande; Orgellos de landes D 3; Pinogres, MA 7; Vrien Q 28, father of Owain; Ysbidinogyl, castle M 24. On p. 118 for 1304 read 1204.

as it has always attracted poets; and when that great spiritual history of the Middle Ages, which many of us have dreamt of, comes to be written, the real permanent value of these noble legends will be made plain to, and acknowledged by, many who do not yet understand that the history of man's thought in the past is every whit as important as the chronicle of the deeds that are done in obedience to the thought. There is certainly no achievement of the Celts of Britain more glorious than to have wrought out the precious materials from which those twelfth- and thirteenth-century Welshmen and Frenchmen built up this

"last glory of the Holy grail Flashed from the altar-stone in Carbonek."

Profit-Sharing between Employer and Employee. A Study in the Evolution of the Wages System. By N. P. Gilman. (Macmillan.)

IN recent years we have witnessed an extraordinary growth of economic literature in America. It is distinguished not so much by works likely to be of permanent value (though Walker, Atkinson, and Wells are fairly entitled to be placed in the first rank of economists) as by the number of careful and minute studies of particular subjects. Industrial troubles have produced the literature, and have given it far more of a practical than of a speculative character. The present work of Mr. Gilman, which has been published both in England and in America, is an excellent example of such monographs. It is an exhaustive treatise on profit-sharing as a means of securing industrial peace. The theoretical advocacy of the system occupies a comparatively small portion of the book, which consists mainly of a statement and critical review of a great number of cases in which profit-sharing has been actually tried, and has succeeded or failed. Though he has the firmest belief in the system, Mr. Gilman writes with praiseworthy moderation, and generalises with the caution of a man who has the evidence before him. We have had so many schemes for the instantaneous cure of human misery that it gives a sense of profound relief to find an enthusiast who claims little more for his plan than that it will help to improve the position of the labourer.

Mr. Gilman gives a detailed account of what one may call the leading cases of profit-sharing—the Maison Leclaire, the Co-operative Paper Works at Angoulême founded by M. Laroche-Joubert; the Maison Chaix (the W. H. Smith of France); the Familistère at Guise; the Paris and Orleans Railway; the Bon Marché; Von Thünen's farm at Tellow; and the Briggs Collieries. A large number of other cases are briefly summarised. Even with regard to cases where profit-sharing has been systematically tried the list is far from complete; while to enumerate all the business houses in which clerks and workmen receive a share in profits would be a manifest impossibility. Still an array of facts is given, quite sufficient to enable us to judge for ourselves of the value of the system. The Briggs case is very properly discussed with much particularity, for there is no doubt that the failure of profit-sharing at the Whitwood mines is to blame for much of the distrust with which, at least in England, similar experiments have been regarded. The facts, however, prove little or nothing against profit-sharing, and only show that its success must depend on the hearty co-operation of both employers and employed. The men were eventually driven to choose between their trade union and the new system, and it is no wonder that they judged the former to be their surest protection. If, as contended by the majority of the shareholders in that case, the right to share in profits involves the duty to abandon trades unionism, then it appears to us that every good friend of the working men should advise them to hold themselves in the position of independence. Mr. Gilman advises employers to adopt a policy of entire neutrality towards trades unions, and to trust to time and education for the triumph of the one system over the other. "In time," he says of trades unions, "they might come to lag superfluous on the industrial stage, since the new system would secure the workmen far greater benefits than they could offer." We can see no ground for any such expectation, or for the belief which it implies in antagonism between the two systems. Trades unions, let us rather hope, have a great future before them; and in their strength, which as it increases will bring increase of wisdom, should be sought our chief security for industrial peace. Between them and profit-sharing there should be no conflict. For, after all, the latter system (as, indeed, Mr. Gilman's many examples show) is but a particular mode of paying wages. It has many great advantages, material and moral, both to employers and employed; but it leaves workmen still in the position of wage-earners, and so leaving them removes none of the reasons for their effective combination. The system has its dangers as well as its attractions. It invites workmen who now work hard enough to work still harder; and, if uncontrolled by effective organisation on their side, it might prove a curse to them, and not a blessing.

Following the example of Miss Calkins in her excellent pamphlet of last year on Sharing the Profits, Mr. Gilman has added a bibliography of the subject, which, though by no means complete, will be found very useful by those who have inclination and leisure for a minute investigation of the merits of the system. It is worth noting that, with the exception of Mr. Sedley Taylor's essays, which appeared in 1884, in neither of these lists appears a single English book specifically devoted to the subject. In magazines and elsewhere, of course, it has been repeatedly discussed in a fragmentary manner. Among the additions which might be made to Mr. Gilman's list are the Report of the Industrial Remuneration Conference (1885), the Blue-Book on the System of Co-operation in Foreign Countries (1886, C. 4783), Godin's Le Gouvernement, and Pare's Co-operative Agriculture. The last contains a history of the Ralahine Experiment, which, as being a case of product-sharing rather than of profit-sharing, Mr. Gilman regards as outside the scope of his inquiry.

G. P. MACDONELL.

Harlequinade: a Book of Verses. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. (Chatto & Windus.)

"Young people must be at some harlequinade," says Mr. George Meredith; and these verses are the record of Mr. Huntly McCarthy's, though indeed his two former volumes have almost equal claim to the title. As in the Serapion volume, he is still singing which ought to be reassuring to Mr. McCarthy, because there is nothing more certain than that while "parting is such sweet sorrow" youth is still a "tassel-gentle" not beyond lure.

"Farewell to youth, farewell to that which makes Youth seem so fair,"

Hafiz in London is still for me Mr. McCarthy's pleasantest thing. If he was not the rose he had lived very near it. In this new volume the fragrance is the same, if a little fainter—a fragrance which would seem to come of a blend of Omar and Villon with this modern Hafiz, and suggesting heliotrope. The themes are as frankly pagan as ever—daintiest of light loves, sweetest of dead flowers, a song, a tune, a colour, a corner of bric-a-brac, bits of romping student villonerie, and the not, of course, forgotten "hymnals of wine and flagons." Yes, it is harlequinade!

Such poetry is the brightest side of pessimism, as James Thomson's is its darkest. It is the poetry of young natures too sensitive to miss the tragedy and pathos of life, but happily too open to its sensuous charm to sit for long in tears. So it happens, perhaps, that it never strikes a very deep note, though so often with its fingers on the saddest strings; for while it is drying one eye the other has caught the ripple of a gown, and the tear is rainbowed with a new delight. The mirth may be hectic, but it is better than the new anatomies of melancholy so much in fashion.

To best give a taste of Mr. McCarthy's quality is somewhat difficult, as his verses are so equal in charm; but there is nothing more typical than these rollicking two first verses of "Estudiantina":

"Spoon in his cap and guitar on his shoulder,
Wandering, whimsical student of Spain,
Laughs at the ways of a world growing older,
Goes as the winds go and veers like the vane.
Not for the kingdom of Spain would I moulder,
Cooped in a town, till my pulses grow colder;
We must be free of the hill and the plain.

Sweetheart, your health in a flagon of sherry,
Give me a kiss and a wish for the road!
We, we are off with a derry-down-derry,
Wholly forgetting the wild oats we sowed.
Vale! dear damsel, as brown as a berry,
Though you forget me, I'm none the less merry:
Love is a debt that can always be owed."

In connexion with this it is a regret that I can only draw attention to "A Beggar's Burden" with its quaint Dog-Latin double refrain:

"Ridens et bibulans, amans et osculans!
Horrens et claudicans, damnans et lacrimans!"

It has the genuine flavour of such things, and should have been known to Charles Reade. For bric-a-brac, this "Fan" is about as dainty as one could desire:

"So long as I live in the world, dear God,
May my heart rejoice for the sake
Of the fisher who leans with his bamboo rod
On the shining face of the lake!"

May my eye delight as I note his nod,
While he numbers his silver take,
And my ear rejoice when his songs awake
An answering note in the hawthorn brake,
Where the girl of his heart, Sweet-Pea-in-the-Pod,
Daintily girdled and daintily shod,
Waits for her lover's return to break
Her fast on a gilded cake!"

But the most charming thing in the volume, because the most impudently true, is "A Gift."

"Fair girl, you were gracious, and gave me a flower:

I swore, in poetical fashion,
To keep it in exquisite pledge of an hour
Of kisses and midnight and passion!

"Yet, lo, I fling back at your feet, as you see,
Your gift! and the moral of this is,
That your flower and your friendship are nothing to me,
And I care not a curse for your kisses!"

Suckling would like to have known the poet of the last line, one thinks—"the devil take her." But I fear they were too conversant with rapiers in his day for him to have said in praise of one that it

"Severs a single floating hair, Splits a skull as you slice a pear."

For am I not right in supposing that a rapier is used almost entirely for thrusting, and certainly not for splitting? A reference to Cowden Clarke recalls a score of lines in which the point, but never the edge, is spoken of.

There are many sonnets in this book, the majority impressions de théâtre—a shrine at which Mr. McCarthy is a notorious worshipper; but he writes them too much as if they were rondeaus. There should be something of the richness of old port about a sonnet. It should be stately in movement and deep in tone, and Mr. McCarthy's muse has more the qualities of champagne. It is the difference between the violin and the lute; and Mr. McCarthy is a lutist. Therefore, his rondeaus and triolets are better than his sonnets. His ballades are hardly so good, I think; too many of them being of that interrogative type which made Mr. Gleeson White's collection so suggestive of an "enquire within" with the answers left out. Mr. McCarthy has most success in his refrains: "No one was half so fair as you!" is as charming as could be for a ballade of the actresses of old time, and "Time has toasted the Cheshire Cheese" a quaint burden for a lament of lost taverns.

But, as I have said, his rondeaus and triolets are best. It is pleasant to meet again several first known in the anthology above referred to, especially "In the days of my youth." I do not remember whether the rondel, "I love you dearly," is a reprint or not; but it is so pretty that, anyhow, I cannot do amiss in quoting it.

"I love you dearly, O my sweet!
Although you pass me lightly by,
Although you weave my life awry,
And tread my heart beneath your feet.
I tremble at your touch; I sigh
To see you passing down the street;
I love you dearly, O my sweet!
Although you pass me lightly by.
You say in scorn that love's a cheat,
Passion a blunder, youth a lie—
I know not: only, when we meet,
I long to kiss your hand, and cry,
'I love you dearly, O my sweet!
Although you pass me lightly by.'"

Mr. McCarthy holds out the threat several times in his volume that it is likely to be his last. He is going to "Settle down and pay his bills,

And, like a decent Philistine, Ignore the name of Columbine."

From dark hints one may fear that he is to make yet another sacrifice of artistic talent on the altar of Irish politics. It is to be hoped not. Let one of the family suffice the goddess. There are plenty and to spare to chant the "Shan Van Vocht," and Mr. McCarthy has too good a voice for such bawling. Let him still remain our Hafiz in London.

MR. FARJEON'S new novel is one of the best he has ever written; indeed, but for its inordinate length, it might have been described without any qualification as a perfect story of the class to which it belongs. The majority of the incidents in it—more particularly the attempts of poor Lina Durham to escape from the clutches of her detestable Aunt Parker and her not less odious tormentor and admirer Bathgate, and her experiences with the harmlessly mad Maxwell and the terribly sane Wolf—are told with quite as much power as Mr. Farjeon has ever shown, and with an ease which he does not always exhibit. Nor has Mr. Farjeon ever given us a better humorous sketch than Sandy Whiskers, who acts as intermediary between Lina Durham and her good genius, Nurse Elliot, and also does his best to thwart the designs of Aunt Parker. Yet in A Young Girl's Life there is a certain amount of literary strain and extravagance. Mr. Bathgate, the villain of the story, is too pronounced in everything—in his dictatorial insolence of language, in his fierce amorosness, in the cruelty with which he tramples upon his unfortunate partner when he has him at his mercy. Aunt Parker, also, is too much of a mere virago. A woman who is capable of treating a sane young girl as a lunatic would hardly betray her character, if not her secret, to the extent that Aunt Parker is represented as doing. Singularly enough the love-making, which is generally a very strong element in Mr. Farjeon's works, is somewhat weak in A Young Girl's Life. The comic courtship of the eccentric Alonzo is, on the whole, to be preferred to the serious wooing of Ned Lorimer. Ned's father, the weak-minded, though well-intentioned, partner and tool of Bathgate, recalls—though ever so slightly—the father of Agnes Wickfield. A Young Girl's Life is, it is perhaps unnecessary to say, a thoroughly wholesome story.

Clare Strong is, to all intents and purposes, the autobiography of a man of the world in the cosmopolitan sense. Clare Strong does America, does the continent, does everything. He is good enough to take an interest in politics and in certain social questions. After marrying the wrong woman, who, being the personification of "Profane Love," deserts him, he marries the right woman, who is the personification of "Sacred Love," and whom he might have married, so far as can be seen, at a very much earlier date in his life. Finally, he died, as the "editor" of his history assures us, in a remarkably and happily sudden manner in "his beloved Paris." Clare Strong is better rather than worse than most stories of the somewhat uninteresting class to which it belongs, for Mr. Fitzgerald not only writes of a man of the world, but writes like one. The American portion of his book is the liveliest.

Judge Lynch is a rather commonplace story of Californian life, written with great spirit and with due regard to melodramatic effects. Jack Scott is condemned to death, and all but executed, not once, but a hundred times, on the ground of having shot Dick Morly, whereas the real murderer is a superstitious and half-lunatic schoolmaster, Haman Jeffries. Mr. Jessop is a disciple of Mr. Bret Harte, and very much above the average of his imitators. But that is practically the most that can be said of him and his book, except perhaps that it contains a fair amount of Irish-Californian humour. The resolute but bewildered Sheriff Starkweather, who finds himself compelled to arrest the man whom his daughter loves, is, next to Jeffries, the best character in the story; although both Lucy Starkweather and Mrs. Morly, the widow of the murdered man, are good sketches, on which Mr. Jessop has obviously bestowed a great deal of pains. He gives, however, too much of the character of caricature to the "eloquent" journalist, "Foxy" Field. It is quite conceivable that he should, on opportunity offering itself, declare "Citizens of San Paolo, the red hand of murder has been unsheathed in our midst"; but, being an American, he would not have said, "With the enterprise characteristic of a true newspaper man, I was at the scene of carnage before the shooting began." He would have expressed the same sentiments in language less unworthy of Jefferson Brick.

It may fairly be said of A Dash of Bitter that, while it belongs to the category of temperance novels, it is very much above the level of such fiction, in virtue both of the vigour of its style, and of the knowledge of the seamy side of well-to-do middle-class life which is displayed by its author. There is, undoubtedly, a good deal of the familiar teetotal fanaticism in this book. Who, for example, has not heard of "the vicar, a noted three-bottle man, who found any amount of passages in the Holy Scriptures, which, he said, told directly against the new madness, and forced them upon the notice of his congregation with all the ability and eloquence which his university training had developed"?

As an offset to this, however, there is the not less familiar anti-teetotal fanaticism, given utterance to by the hardest drinker in the story, who is ready "to stake my professional reputation that I'll find more alcohol in a bottle of ginger ale than in what is generally sold as lemonade and bitter." There is, however, a great deal more than either of these bigotries in A Dash of Bitter. The character of Charles Bolton, the well-meaning but weak son of a total abstinence doctor, who, through forsaking the creed and practice of his father's house, loses his situation, and is brought to the verge of ruin, is well drawn. Still better, in its way, is the portrait of Fletcher, Bolton's brilliant but, of course, drunken friend, who, at the close of the book, is found gambling in the now overdone Monaco. The exposure of the dexterous English "captain" by the still smarter and more resolute American is very cleverly detailed; and the death of Fletcher, though it recalls that of Lord Frederick Verisopht, is a powerful scene. There is, also, unquestionably, a good deal of sub-Dickensian humour in Mr. Hilton's Bohemian sketches.

The author of The Gargrave Mystery is to be congratulated on having scored one decided success. He keeps his secret till the very last. The most experienced reader of fiction of the Boisgobey and Gaboriau order, although he may have a suspicion that the too decorous Alfred Gargrave is the murderer of Ruth Dale, will not contemplate the possibility that he is not Alfred, but a scoundrel impersonating him. For the rest, The Gargrave Mystery is a story of a very commonplace type, which is, in parts, roughly if not even hurriedly written. The amateur detectives—Parson Baby and Captain Skottowe—who conduct the hunt for the missing Ruth Dale and her lover, George Bourne, who disappears shortly after her, are originals of a too ostentatiously "rough diamond" character; and, as for the besotted and conceited detective Gorry, it is difficult to understand such a creature even attempting to discover crime. Criminal investigation regarded as one of the high arts is but in its infancy in this country; but Scotland Yard is not quite of the stuff of which Gorry is made. It is rather a pity that The Gargrave Mystery had not been brightened by some genuine sentiment; for the light comedy dashed by mild Bohemianism, which is provided by Dick Gargrave, is hardly sufficient by itself for the purposes of relief.

The preposterous length of How they kept the Faith renders it almost unreadable. Had its author told her story of the Chevaliers—the very interesting and morally noble Huguenot family, whose members "keep the faith" in Languedoc until such of them as have not suffered martyrdom escape to England—in about a hundred pages, it would have been thoroughly enjoyable. Miss (or Mrs.) Raymond is steeped in Huguenot history and is filled with the Huguenot spirit; and she here reproduces the intrigues and alarms, the terrors and consolations, of one of the most interesting periods in French history. At least three of her characters also—the loving but somewhat vacillating Eglantine, her dogged and high-spirited husband Henri, and her guardian angel and foster-brother Rene—are almost ideal portraits of the historical kind.

As a writer of realistic but yet wholesome fiction, Mr. Runciman has both a power and a field of his own. But in A Dream of the North Sea he has been obviously hampered by his "purpose," which, as he makes no attempt at disguising, is to illustrate and eulogise the work of the Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, with which the name of Mr. Mather is so honourably associated. He has produced, not perhaps better, but better-sustained work than anything that he gives in this volume. Some of his new storm-pictures are, however, quite as Turner-esque as any that Mr. Runciman has ever painted. They suggest, indeed, the question whether there is not at least a slight element of exaggeration in his account of the risks run by those who carry on beneficent work, both of the missionary and of the medical kind in the North Sea. Three of his characters—Mr. Cassall, Marion Dearsley, and the fearless scientific enthusiast Lewis Ferrier—are exceptionally well-drawn.

Capt. Malan's account of the adventures of little Connie and Eric Egerton in the South Pacific is an agreeable Christmas book published a few months in advance. It has even less plot-interest than such works usually have. Silas Owen, a retired officer of the Royal Navy living in Burwood, a suburb of Sydney, with his nephew and niece, having been ordered a sea voyage, carries them off with him in the Sparkling Wave to Fiji, and a hundred other places in the South Seas. They are shipwrecked, and have various adventures with natives, both of the land and of the water, while, of course, they pick up a good deal of geography and natural history. Capt. Malan's story, in short, runs on well known lines. But it is pleasantly written, as well as instructive. Eric and Connie are from first to last children in their prattle, their ideas, their unconscious but sufficient courage, and show no signs of taking on pedantry or priggishness.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

CURRENT THEOLOGY.

"IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT" SERIES.—Church Reform. Edited by Albert Grey and the Hon. and Rev. Canon Fremantle. (Sonnenschein.) Mr. Albert Grey's preface, and Canon Fremantle's introduction, explain the object of this little volume. It presents in seven essays the aims and ideals of those who desire that the Anglican Church, in place of being disestablished or left as it is, should be reformed. A useful paper of "Preliminary Statistics," and three appendices tabulating and comparing the various schemes of reform already before the public, make the book complete as a handbook on its subject. The subjects and authors of the essays are as follows: "The Resources of the Church of England," by Mr. G. Harwood; "The Comparative Failure of the Church System," by Rev. C. W. Stubbs; "The Remedy—not Disestablishment," by Rev. G. S. Reaney; "Lessons from the History of Church Reform," by Canon Fremantle; "The Practical Programme of Reform," by Mr. P. L. Gell; "A National Church and Social Reform," by Rev. S. A. Barnett; "The Bearing of National Church Reform on Religion," by Rev. J. L. Davies. It is obviously impossible to criticise adequately in a short space the work of so many experienced and thoughtful writers. Canon Fremantle, in his introduction, puts forward six proposals to which the scheme of reform advocated in the volume requires assent. Of these, Nos. 3 and 6—that a more equitable arrangement be made of stipends and parishes, and that the sale of livings be abolished—are approved by many who would not agree to the others, and the necessity for them is shown most convincingly in §§ iii. (b) and iv. of Mr. Stubbs's paper. No. 5—that the Act of Uniformity be modified—and No. 2—that exchange of pulpits between Church and Dissent be made legal—are more or less involved in Nos. 1 and 4, which are the important and distinctive proposals of the essayists. No. 1 is the proposal of Mr. Albert Grey's Church Boards Bill—that the people of each parish should, without distinction of religious denomination, share with clergymen in the administration of the church and parish. No. 4 demands the abolition of subscription by clergymen. Readers of Mr. Stubbs's essay will be left with a strong conviction of the necessity of some sort of reform, and Mr. Barnett and Mr. L. Davies sketch for us a Church fulfilling functions which at present the English Church does not fill, but which Christians can scarcely consent that the visible Church should be without; and yet we cannot think that there is any present prospect of "Church Reform" coming about. If we are to accept Mr. Stubbs's principle, "that it is better to leave things as they are than to legislate when there is no decisive drift of opinion in the nation," it is to be feared that some time must elapse before it will be possible "to treat the Church of England as identical with the English nation." Mr. Grey, indeed, almost admits this. He hopes to convert "a large number of Liberationists into zealous and ardent Church Reformers," but does not expect much support from any party in the Church. It is an unfortunate fact that in these latter days the state or nation has become to many Christians synonymous with "the world" of their Gospels, and till this belief is rooted out the proposals of the "Church Reformers" will seem impious to them. But while we hold that there is no chance of either the English Church or the English nation accepting the proposals of these essays at present, yet the ideal of a national Church advanced in them is the only one which can claim to have any meaning; and the religion of the future, if there is to be any at all, must be organised as this volume suggests. The information collected in the book will be found exceedingly useful by all interested in Church politics, whatever their views may be.

The Faith of the Gospel. By A. J. Mason. (Bivingtons.) The same cause which makes so much religious poetry weak and ineffectual produces similar results in the case of religious philosophy. Freedom of the imagination in the one case, and freedom of the intellect in the other, are necessary to the attainment of striking excellence. The author must write with authority and even with originality, which is specially hard when he has at the same time to be orthodox. Mr. Mason, in his exhaustive and able volume, does not altogether succeed in making the dry bones live. We cannot admit that the reasonable philosophy which he labours to extract from the Christian records is really the essence of Biblical teaching. We are left with the feeling that his theology is occupied very largely with what is left obscure in the Old and New Testament, and we are doubtful whether after all it is wise to attempt to dispel the obscurity. A discussion, for instance, of the union of the human and Divine natures in Christ very rarely edifies, and the New Testament says little to satisfy curiosity on the point. Such subjects, moreover, as the "Condition of the Faithful departed," and the nature and functions of angels, cannot be treated systematically. It is, in fact, a want of intellectual sincerity to assume that they are treated systematically, or even consistently, in Scripture. But Mr. Mason's book is able; it is the best handbook of theology we are acquainted with. It is clear and simple in style, and assumes no special knowledge on the part of its readers. It is, of course, Anglican in its views, and many Churchmen even will be quite unable to accept its teaching on the Eucharist, or to admit that the grace of Christian virginity is higher than the grace of marriage; but it is everywhere candid and earnest, and inspired by the spirit of the sentence in the preface which "withdraws beforehand . . . any word which sounds impatient or bitter or inflammatory or supercilious or in any way uncharitable." Those Christians who differ most widely from the author will find much in his book that will help them, and everywhere the careful and scholarly arrangement of the subject will be useful to students.

Christian Economics. By Wilfrid Richmond. (Bivingtons.) "The purpose of this book is to enforce the principle that economic conduct is a matter of duty, and, therefore, part of the province of conscience and morals." This is Mr. Richmond's account of the object of his sixteen sermons. They are of very unusual merit. The importance of their subject has been fully recognised of late years, but it is very rare to find preachers or moralists whose knowledge of political economy is sufficiently thorough to make their criticism worth attention. Mr. Richmond has carefully and patiently qualified himself to speak. He acknowledges that he owes much to Mr. Ruskin; but he comes to different conclusions, and writes without the animus against commerce and political economy which makes many impatient of Mr. Ruskin's guidance. Taking such subjects as competition, labour, property, wealth, and co-operation, he endeavours to discover what Christianity teaches with regard to them. The result is a volume of great originality. It does not claim to be exhaustive or rigidly systematic; but it states and establishes certain leading principles, and is full of pregnant and valuable suggestions. It differs from the school of thought headed by Mr. Ruskin in seeing some soul of goodness in competition, and in displaying some respect for modern political economy; but it is at one with Mr. Ruskin in the belief that economics cannot be divorced from morals or governed by other than ethical principles. Although Mr. Richmond's style is quiet and reflective, it is condensed and occasionally earnestly eloquent; but the originality and freshness of the thought prevent the reader from noticing graces of expression. The sermons will bear reading many times.

A NEW volume of the "Epochs of Church History" series is The Arian Controversy, by H. M. Gwatkin. (Longmans.) The author explains in a brief preliminary note that it is largely, though not entirely, an abridgment of a former work of his, Studies of Arianism, differing from it chiefly by the omission of the Gothic portion of the narrative, as properly belonging to another volume of the series, which may be taken as an indirect promise on Mr. Gwatkin's part to write that volume. As designed for a wider class of readers than his larger book, the abridgment includes the omission of a good deal of the technicalities of the Arian controversy, its broad outlines being carefully drawn; but the minute turns of phrase which mark it even more than any other of the polemical disputes in the ancient Oriental Church are disregarded, though of course those which were the actual watchwords of the contending schools are duly recorded. Mr. Gwatkin has put his finger unerringly on the chief intellectual defect of Arianism—its unsound logic, and has noted also its untenable position as a kind of mid-term between the higher paganism of its time and Christianity. The genesis of the book places it high among the volumes of the series to which it belongs; for it is a much more feasible literary task for a competent writer to abridge a work of his own by the process of reducing the general scale, than to produce an entirely new book which shall present all the salient points in a very small compass without the risk of injudicious omission on the one hand, or of obscurity on the other, by reason of over-compression. In one detail, the smaller book improves on its predecessor, in that the lists of works for the student to consult are classified according as they are occupied with various aspects of the general subject, whereas the reader is left to do that for himself in the Studies of Arianism.

Bible Characters. By Charles Reade. (Chatto & Windus.) The freshness, vigour, and directness which attract us in Charles Reade's novels have not failed him in these papers and notes on Biblical subjects, which are only too short and fragmentary. Inasmuch as vigour and freshness are unusual virtues among theological writers, we are very grateful when we find them in papers on Nehemiah and Jonah. Mr. Reade is confessedly a novice at the work of Biblical criticism, and, moreover, a somewhat intolerant and dogmatic novice; but so crisp, terse, and vivid a sketch as his original and interesting account of Jonah is rarely met with. Clergymen and other professional students of the Bible will receive a most valuable lesson if they will read with an understanding spirit these attempts by a distinguished student of human character to enter into the minds and motives of some of the heroes of Old Testament history. We only regret the shortness and incompleteness of the contents of the book.

Gospel Sermons. By Dr. McCosh. (Nisbet.) Readers of Dr. McCosh's philosophical works will not need to be told, as they are in the preface to this work, that the teaching of philosophy does not exhaust all the author's intellectual and spiritual energies. Nor will they require any information from us as to the precise method and cast of theology to be found in his pulpit addresses. It will suffice to state that his sermons are in matter and manner precisely what we should have expected from him. They are clear, able expositions of sacred subjects from a narrow and ultra-dogmatic standpoint.

The Gospel according to St. Paul. By Oswald Dykes. (Nisbet.) Why Dr. Dykes should give the comprehensive title "The Gospel of St. Paul" to an exposition of the first eight chapters of the Epistle to the Romans it would not be easy to say. That these chapters contain a consecutive and homogeneous argument few expositors would deny. But it is an argument advanced for a special purpose, and is a trifle overcharged with Rabbinism and Jewish scholasticism. "The Gospel of St. Paul" would be best arrived at by bringing together his chief doctrines and expositions from all his epistles, with especial stress on those which best illustrate the grand principles of his thought, or which approximate most closely to the teachings of the Gospels—his doctrines, e.g., of the letter and the spirit, and his exposition of Christian love. Dr. Dykes manifests considerable insight into St. Paul's standpoint in the earlier half of the Epistle to the Romans, and his book will be acceptable to his admirers. About half the volume, we may add, has already seen light in the pages of the Homiletic Magazine.

Christianity made Science; or, a Life's Thoughts on Religion and Marvels. By T.

Prescott. (Williams & Norgate.) The life whose "thoughts" are here chronicled has so recently ceased that we desire to speak with becoming reverence of the estimable author. At the same time truth compels us to say that we regard the leading thought and aim of the book as founded on a misconception. In the commonly accepted senses of the words Christianity is one thing and science another; and to speak of these terms, or rather of the things for which they stand, as if they were or could be made, convertible, involves a misapprehension which seems to us mischievous. It may be admitted that what Mr. Prescott terms "the intellectual element" has its place as an indispensable factor in the final formation of a religious creed; but it is quite possible to admit this without assuming the necessity that Christianity can or should be transmuted into science. No greater injury can be done to Christianity in the true meaning of the term than this assumption that it is capable of or benefited by intellectual demonstration. Mr. Prescott must have forgotten, if he ever learnt, the profoundest lesson of Butler's famous Analogy, as well as the signification of the well-known maxim "We walk by faith not by sight."

True Philosophy. By S. F. A. Caulfield. (Hatchards.) Though labelled "Philosophy" this is to all intents and purpose a theological book. It is the kind of reply which Mr. Caulfield thinks might be made to the late Laurence Oliphant's Scientific Religion. Whether that work admitted of any reply may well be doubted. What is indubitable is that it does not admit of the reply which Mr. Caulfield has here prepared for it. The book is conceived in the narrowest spirit of evangelical dogmatism, and is, therefore, just as unsatisfactory as the wild speculations it is intended to counteract.

The Tree of Life; or, the Development of the Doctrine of Life Eternal in the Scriptures of the Old Covenant. By John Sharpe. (Cambridge: Deighton & Bell.) We have given the whole title of this work for the reason that its metaphorical title "The Tree of Life" sets forth very incompletely its design. Mr. Sharpe is a Hebraist, and much of the work consists in translations of particular passages into English. But, as a rule, his translations cannot be commended either for their accuracy or for their style and rhythm. This, to take a single example, is Mr. Sharpe's rendering of a well-known passage:

"For he knoweth our frame;
It is remembered that we are dust.
Fragrant man, like the grass are his days;
As a flower of the field so he flourisheth.
For a wind hath passed over it and it is not,
And its place can recognise it no more."

With regard to the general subject of the book, while it presents the reader with a few thoughts worth considering, its chief use is that it supplies a catena of Old Testament passages which the author thinks involve a belief in a future world, and may therefore be used as a set-off against Archbishop Whately's essay, and the passages he accumulates, showing that the Jews could not, on the whole, have believed in the existence of such a world.

The Life of St. Jerome. By Mrs. Charles Martin. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.) A popular life of St. Jerome, which need be merely a careful reproduction of M. Amédée Thierry's work, would doubtless find readers in England; but Mrs. Martin has not succeeded in giving us this. Her tone of indiscriminate praise is specially unfortunate in the case of such a man as Jerome, whose faults are inseparable from his temperament and typical of his time. The account of the quarrel with Rufinus is a piece of special pleading for Jerome; and the language used regarding Origen makes the whole dispute about his writings incomprehensible. He was a "remarkable heresiarch, who more than two centuries before had sown the disastrous and prolific seeds of heresy and confusion, destined to work terrible havoc in the Church." This of a man who had so much in common with Jerome, from a declared worshipper of the latter, raises the suspicion that Mrs. Martin's knowledge of Origen is slight. The student of history will not find that this biography supersedes the careful sketch of Mr. Cutts in "The Fathers for English Readers," although it is longer and more pretentious.

The Religion of Freemasonry. By H. T. Whymper. (George Redway.) That Freemasonry has claimed a religious basis and signification has always been an accepted truth among the most benighted of those who are outside the charmed circle of initiation into its mysteries; but the meaning and extent of its religious claims has generally been veiled in an appropriately dim haze of vagueness and obscurity. In this work, however, Brother Whymper has courageously attempted to lift the veil. How far his attempt has met with success we must leave to the decision of members of the craft. The gist of the book seems to be the discussion of the relation of Christian to Mohammedan, Hindu, and other lodges in respect of the sacred book pertaining to each creed; but it contains a large amount of information, some of a very quaint not to say grotesque character, on the growth and usages of Freemasonry, which renders the volume interesting to the general reader as well as to masons themselves.

The Redemption of Man. By D. W. Simon. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.) The author describes this work as "Discussions bearing on the Atonement," and he himself adds that "it does not in any sense pretend to be a complete treatise on the doctrine of the atonement." Notwithstanding this incompleteness, the work runs to 440 pages octavo; and it is conceivable, that had the author exercised the virtue of conciseness, he might have contrived to say something on the subject that the general reader would have cared to read. But the book is diffuse in style, and aridly scholastic in treatment, though containing here and there some pregnant thoughts. It cannot be said in any way to throw more light on a subject which, however important, has received quite as much illumination as it is capable of receiving. The interesting part of the subject is the historical, and for this the English student will have recourse to Baur's well-known but little read Lehre von der Versöhnung.

"CLARK'S FOREIGN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY." New Series. Vol. 33.—Old and New Testament Theology. Translated from the German of Heinrich Ewald by Rev. Thomas Goadby. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.) Notices of Die Lehre der Bibel von Gott will be found in vol. ii., 535, and vol. iv., 369, of the ACADEMY. A translation by Mr. Goadby of the first volume of this work has been already issued in the "Foreign Theological Library" under the title of Revelation: its Nature and Record. The volume before us is a translation of the second and third volumes, and, if not brilliant, will be found sufficient by the student. We are not sure that the translator has been wise in "selecting," and occasionally condensing, his original. However ably such a task is performed, it is apt to be unsatisfactory; and, in the case of a book which will be read mainly by students and scholars, is quite unnecessary. The translation will probably be most useful to those who know the original.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. F. T. PALGRAVE has completed the Treasury of English Sacred Lyrical Poetry, with the formation of which he was entrusted by the delegates of the Clarendon Press. The selection is ranged under three books: the first dating from about 1500 to 1680 (but mainly finding its materials in the seventeenth century); the second, from 1680 to about 1820; the last, thence to our own time. Short biographical notices of the writers (except a few, such as Spenser, Milton, Cowper, or those still living) have been added, with explanatory and glossarial notes. The volume will be published early in September.

DR. A. NANSEN, while he was in this country, made arrangements with Messrs. Longmans for the publication of a narrative of his expedition across Greenland, illustrated with maps and engravings. The book will not be ready for issue until next spring.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH, FARRAN & Co. announce for early publication in the coming season The Diaries of Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore, in two volumes, with numerous illustrations. It will give a record of their life and work, from 1812 to 1883, with the addresses and speeches of Sir Moses; his correspondence with ministers, ambassadors, and representative bodies; full accounts, in his own words, of all his missions in the cause of humanity; firmans and edicts of eastern monarchs; his opinions on financial, political, and religious subjects; anecdotes relating to men and events of his time. The work has been edited by the late Dr. E. Loewe, the oriental scholar, who accompanied Sir Moses Montefiore on his mission to Damascus and Constantinople in 1840.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW have in preparation a new series of short biographies, "The Prime Ministers of Queen Victoria," under the general editorship of Mr. Stuart J. Reid, author of The Life and Times of Sidney Smith. Among those who have promised to contribute are Mr. J. A. Froude, the Marquis of Lorne, Mr. Henry Dunckley, and Mr. G. W. E. Russell.

MR. DOUGLAS B. W. SLADEN, who has recently been on a visit to the United States and the Dominion, has there collected materials for a companion volume to his Australian Poets. It will be entitled Younger American Poets, and will include selections from the work of W. D. Howells, Joaquin Miller, Paul Heyse, Sidney Lanier, Helen Hunt, &c., as well as examples of Canadian poetry.

MR. GOLLANZ, of Christ's College, Cambridge, who is turning into modern English, for the Early English Text Society, the Anglo-Saxon poems in the Exeter Book which he is editing, finds that the words run naturally into blank verse. He neither expected nor intended this; but his version shaped itself of itself into iambic measures in nine lines out of ten.

A VOLUME of Stories from Carleton, with introduction by Mr. W. B. Yeats, will be published in the "Camelot" series for September, in substitution for More's Utopia, which had been promised.

A NEW novel, entitled An Odd Man's Story, by Mrs. J. Gordon Archer, will be published shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH, FARRAN & Co. will publish immediately a volume of poems, entitled Reveries, Rhymes, and Rondeaux, by Mr. William Cartwright Newsam.

MESSRS. TILLOTSON & SON, of Bolton, who claim to have established in 1871 the first system of "newspaper literature" in this country, announce works of fiction by the following novelists during 1890: Thomas Hardy, William Black, Justin McCarthy, W.

Clark Russell, David Christie Murray, G. R. Sims, George Manville Fenn, G. A. Henty, Mrs. Oliphant, Adeline Sergeant, Dora Russell, L. T. Meade, &c. They have also made arrangements for a number of short stories and miscellaneous papers for the Christmas season.

THE commission formed by the Royal Academy of History of Madrid to celebrate the fourth centenary of the discovery of America—of which the Duke of Veragua, a lineal descendant of Christopher Columbus, is vice-president—has decided to offer two prizes (of £1200 and £600) for a literary competition. The work, which should not exceed two volumes of 500 pages each, may be written in Spanish, Portuguese, English, German, French, or Italian.

"The vastness of the subject necessitates that the paper should be a highly finished work of art, not so much from the richness of diction, but rather from the general arrangement and neatness of style; for its nobility and beauty should spring from the simplicity of the phraseology, and from a just appreciation and careful judgment."

WE quote the following from the last annual report of the Mercantile Library of New York, which is, we believe, the largest public library in that city. During the year 7315 new volumes were purchased, raising the total to 223,544. The number of volumes put in circulation was 158,683. Of Mrs. Ward's Robert Elamere 140 copies were bought; of Mrs. Deland's John Ward, 62; of Bryce's American Commonwealth, 35; of Motley's Correspondence, 26; and of Max O'Rell's Jonathan and his Continent, 36. To give a notion of the promptness with which the librarian meets a possible demand for a new book, the following figures will suffice. On April 13, four publishing houses in New York and one in Boston each advertised a new book. The books were by five different authors. An order was given for 115 copies of them. They were received, catalogued, stamped, made ready for circulation; and, before the library closed on the day they were published, all but two of them were in the hands of subscribers.

A RECENT number of the Literarisches Centralblatt contains a very favourable notice of Mr. E. C. Thomas's scholarly edition of the Philobiblon of Richard de Bury, which was reviewed in the ACADEMY of April 27.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE next number of the Contemporary Review will contain an article on "Our Position in Egypt," discussing very fully the progress made in finance, public works, improved condition of the fellahen, &c. Although anonymous, it is understood to be written by one of the best authorities on the subject. In the same number, Mr. Athelstan Riley follows up his short memorandum in the Foreign Office Papers by a full discussion of "Turkish Misrule in Armenia."

A VERY fully illustrated paper on "The Life and Work of Millet," by Mr. D. O. Thomson, will be begun in the forthcoming number of the Magazine of Art. An article entitled "The Kernoozers Club," by Mr. M. H. Spielmann, illustrated by Mr. Harry Furniss, will deal with the chief armour-club in the world, forming one of the "Glimpses of Artist Life" series.

A NEW feature in the September number of the Artist will be the first of a series of "Letters to Living Artists." The letters will be by different writers, personally acquainted with the painters and sculptors addressed; and the first of the series will be to Sir Frederick Leighton, by "W."

THE Scots' Magazine for September will print a full report of the speeches delivered at the opening of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery by the Lord Justice General, Lord Lothian, and the munificent donor, Mr. John Ritchie Findlay. It will also contain the address on "Education" delivered lately at the prize-giving of the High School, Glasgow, by Mr. Henry Craik.

THE Lyceum for September will contain the following articles: "The Workman's Grievance" (II.), "Governments and Philanthropists," "Giordano Bruno and United Italy," "Mr. Pater as an Essayist," "Darwinism Pure and Simple," "St. Vincent of Paul and his latest Biographer," &c.

Cassell's Magazine for September will contain a paper by a barrister, entitled "Next-of-Kin," intended to remove a popular misconception as to the amount of the funds in the hands of the Court of Chancery.

IN the Quiver for September will be published a paper on "Cruelty to Children," by Dr. Buxton, the late secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A TROUBADOUR'S LAST SONG (A.D. 1300).

[Tedisio, son to the great Genoese admiral, Lampa Doria, went forth into the Atlantic on a voyage of discovery in 1292, and never returned.]

Lampa's eldest son was slain at his father's side in a sea fight. On seeing him fall fear came on the whole ship's company; but Lampa loftily rebuked them, and ordered his son's body to be thrown into the deep, telling them, for their comfort, that the land could never have afforded his boy a nobler tomb.—Benvenuto da Imola.

A troubadour of Genoa, being asked why he no longer sings, thus answered:—

Gone is Tedisio. Silent is my lyre.
And, till his barque return, shall silence keep.
Till home he come for Genoa's brows to reap
Fresh laurels and my Muse again inspire.

Tedisio, son to that heroic sire
Who not in clay would have his children sleep;
But his slain first-born cast into the deep,
On which our race their proudest wreaths acquire.

Fit sepulchre for Genoa's cavaliers,
Art thou by one more Doria tenanted
By my Tedisio? Silent then shall be
This loyal harp for ever, and my tears
Shall mourn my minstrelsy and friendship dead
And buried with him in thy vaults, O sea!

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE illustration of Le Livre for August is a somewhat severe, but very graceful, binding for the editor's Son Alt-esse la Femme by M. Ruban. It appears to represent a series of oblong toolings, one within the other, enclosing a plain panel; the tooled portions being relieved by four oval medallions of female heads. The letter-press includes a paper on "L'Estampe Française Moderne" by M. Uzanne (recommending a new society), a notice of some uncollected pieces of Musset by M. Glinel, a bibliographical note on Macchiavelli by M. de Rochessauvre, and a further instalment of M. Druon's chronicles of literary infanticide—all good matter and well in place.

MSS. LEFT BY THE LATE PROF.
DUNCAN H. WEIR.

THE following list of the MSS. left by the late Duncan H. Weir, D.D., Professor of Oriental Languages in the University of Glasgow, and now deposited in the University Library, has been communicated to us in the hope that it may prove useful to theological students.

Portions of the material, we believe, have already been utilised by Prof. Cheyne in his work on Isaiah, and by Prof. Driver in his forthcoming Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel.

1. Extended exposition of Gen. i.-vi. 7. Dissertations at the beginnings and close of sections, and careful verbal examination verse by verse. (Dated 1871-2, 1873-4.)

2. Uniform in size and style with preceding, and evidently intended to follow it. Notes and dissertations on Gen. vi. 9 xii. Also, notes on Gen. xxxvi. and a few on ch. xlix. Also, summary from Tuch's Kommentar über die Genesis, second edition, introduction on the subject of Saga and Myth.

This volume seems to be more fragmentary than the preceding, leaves being left blank here and there for future notes. There is an elaborate table of "God's appearances to the Patriarchs," giving in the original the phrases by which the appearances are described. (No date)

3. Briefer notes on Genesis, various portions, viz.:

- (a.) xxi. xxi. xxi.
- (b.) xxi. xxi. xxi.
- (c.) xxi. xxi. xxi.

- (d.) i.-iv. 15, vi. 9-ix.
- (e.) xli. xli. xli.

Not all equally full. (Dated from 1862-1874-5.)

4. Gen. to Num. xxi. Brief notes in the form of correction or emendation of renderings of the Authorised Version. The first page has the heading of "Revision of Old Testament"; and the notes were, no doubt, prepared in connexion with Dr. Weir's work on the Old Testament Revision Committee. His emendations are generally supported by references to parallel passages in the Hebrew Bible, the versions or commentaries. The notes seem uninterrupted within the limits indicated.

5. Num. xxi. 1 Sam. xv., uniform with preceding.

6. 1 Sam. xvi. - , uniform with preceding. It does not extend beyond 2 Sam. iv. 13.

These three volumes would be valuable as showing Dr. Weir's latest view of the passages in question.

7. A commentary uniform in style and size with 1 and 2. Deut. i.-xix. Very full.

8. Deut. xx. - . Uniform with preceding. The commentary extends to chap. xix. Thereafter follow: (a) "Paul Kleinert, Das Deuteronomium"; (b) "Questions as to the origin and authorship of Old Testament Scriptures, particularly the historical books."

9. Isaiah i.-end. Short grammatical notes, full of labour; references to almost every word, or indications how often the word occurs. At the end—

- (a.) Special examination of ch. vii. 7-16.
- (b.) Ch. i., An enquiry into its date.
- (c.) Chap. ii.-iv., Special examination of date, &c.
- (d.) xlii. xli. xli., examination of authenticity.
- (e, f.) On the "Chaldees" and "Philistines."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE OLD NORTHUMBRIAN GLOSSES IN MS. PALATINE 68.

Oxford: August 11, 1889.

To the Northumbrian glosses already published (ACADEMY, May 18 and June 29) I have still another to add, which Mr. Lindsay inadvertently omitted from the copy of the glosses which he gave me, but included in the copy he made for Dr. Whitley Stokes, from whom I have just received it. This new gloss herutbeg (see below) has been miswritten by the Irish scribe for herutbegae (= W.S. heorotberge), and is evidently intended to denote the fruit of the mulberry tree. This O.E. heorotberge, which occurs several times in the Glosses—Wright-

Wülcker 33^{1a} (= Corpus Gl. 1333) and 443^a, where it translates mora; 203^a heortberge = celsa agreste, sicomoros, and 409^{1a} = fragos—survives as the hartberry of our modern dialects.

It is noteworthy that in herut-, as well as in sifu, the vowel of the root-syllable still remains unaffected by the following u, which points to the conclusion that the glosses in the ninth-century Vatican MS. are copied from an older one of the eighth century, probably of the earlier part of that century. In support of this conclusion we may refer to forms like Herutford, Cerotaes ei, &c., in the Moore MS. of Beda's Historia (about 737), or to the metudae, hefaen-riceae, and heben of Caedmon's hymn, which is contained in the same MS., and compare them with the Heorutford (Beda, Hist. iv., alenohus, and 5) and Cerotes ei (Beda, Hist. iv. 6) of the Cotton MS. Tiberius O. II., which belongs to a somewhat later period of the eighth century (cf. Sweet, Oldest Texts). This shows that the so-called u-(o-) umlaut took place in Northumbria during the eighth century, and the absence of it in the herut- and sifu of the Palatine glosses may be urged in proof of their early origin. In the other dialects this u-(o-) umlaut made its appearance about the same time as in the north. In the Epinal Glossary (beginning of the eighth century) an original e or i, for instance, has, with one single exception, been preserved unaltered when followed by a back vowel; while in the somewhat younger Corpus Glossary e and i have, under the same circumstances, been changed, with very few exceptions, to eo and io (cf. Dieter, Sprache und Mundart der ältesten englischen Denkmäler).

For convenience of reference, I here reprint all the Northumbrian glosses of the Palatine MS.

(1.) Fol. 12 b (Ps. 74, 14):

"Dedisti eum escam etc. i. eo quod timore eius pices ad terram aethiopiae veniunt. Timet enim et manducat unum quodque animal in mari alterum. Et dicunt quod vii minoribus saturantur maiores, ut vii fuscas selas fylly, sifu selas hromas fylly, sifu hromas hualas fylly."

(2.) Fol. 15 a (Ps. 78, 45):

"Et ranam i. fross. Et dedit erugini i. brondegur. Et labores eorum locustae. Et occidit in grandine i. grandio cum igne. Et murus eorum i. pro omni feraci arbore possit i. aliquando fructus eius albus, aliquando rufus, aliquando niger i. herutbeg."

(3.) Fol. 20 b (Ps. 90, 13):

"Conuertere, domine i. ad nos rogantes. Usquequo i. nudu hiru coasalt."

The suggestion which Prof. Cook makes in explanation of the first component of the gloss brondegur (ACADEMY, August 10) is so very obvious that it has probably occurred to many readers of the ACADEMY besides himself. It certainly had occurred to me before I sent the glosses for publication. But, after careful consideration, I did not adopt it, as there is no satisfactory evidence of the use of brond (brand) in England in the sense of "mildew, blight," earlier than the seventeenth century (Dr. Murray's earliest quotation is 1639), for I do not share Prof. Cook's opinion that the reading brond, oom, in Wright-Wülcker, is "undoubtedly better" than Sweet's brondoom; in fact, I am inclined to think that the latter is the correct form. I take brondoom to mean "rust produced by burning"—in the case of iron the "rust produced by burning" is the so-called "hammer scales" or "smithy scales" (Fe₃ O₄) to which the glossator would naturally apply the term oom, as well as to the common red rust due to moisture (Fe₂ O₃ + water)—in which case the first component brond would simply have its ordinary meaning of "burning," not that of "mildew." In support of my view I may refer to the somewhat similar gloss sinder-om in Wright-Wülcker 402¹¹ (ferrugine=græ- ghawe isene obbe sinderome), where not only the sinder, but also the graghawe isen points rather to smithy scales than to ordinary red rust.

That the first component of brondegur may be the O.E. brond (brand) used, as in Modern English and German, in the special sense of "mildew," is not impossible; but, in the absence of any trustworthy evidence that it was so used in England until eight or nine centuries later—in the absence, too, of any satisfactory explanation of the second component—the matter must still be regarded as "not proven."

OLD IRISH AND THE SPOKEN LANGUAGE.

Rathmines, Dublin: August 16, 1889.

I have been anxiously watching the correspondence in the ACADEMY, expecting to see some notice taken therein of the remarkable expression used by Mr. Whitley Stokes in the issue of December 1, viz., "The corrupt dialects called modern Irish."

These words, coming from a scholar of such reputation, would naturally convey to the minds of those intending to study the Irish language that modern Irish is worthless for philological purposes, whereas the present spoken language is really the only efficient key to the understanding of passages innumerable in the Irish of the older periods. This can easily be proved by showing how scholars well acquainted with old and middle Irish, but ignorant of the modern spoken language, fall into egregious mistakes, from which a fair knowledge of modern Irish would have saved them. Of these scholars perhaps one of the most pertinent examples is that of Mr. Stokes himself. I shall accordingly proceed to give a few instances in support of my statement.

In the Revue Celtique for May 1886, Mr. Stokes gives a short poem from the Book of Leinster, with a translation, vocabulary, and notes. The poem is so simple that any fair modern Irish scholar would have not the least difficulty in understanding it—always supposing that Irish scholarship includes a knowledge of the spoken language—though the poem contains a few antiquated, if not obsolete, words. Even an illiterate Irish speaker would understand it if read to him. And yet in translating this poem Mr. Stokes has fallen into several mistakes, from which a knowledge of the despised modern Irish would have saved him, such mistakes as no Irish speaker would commit.

For instance, at line 33 of the poem,

"A slat claidib is gell cet,"

Mr. Stokes translates, "There is a sword, the pledge of hundreds," the correct translation being—"There is a sword equal to a hundred." The word, gell, the modern geall, does indeed sometimes signify a "pledge"; but it has many other meanings, one of them being "equal to," as in this phrase. In modern Irish, when signifying a "pledge," "equal to," "like to," it is followed by the preposition le, formerly also re, as Is geall re bheith marbh duit an riocht i n-a bh-fuile (Keating's History, p. 384, Halliday's edition), "For you promise fair for death in your present state"—literally "For it is equal to being dead for thee, the condition in which thou art." Again: "Cibé labhras ar an dara modh is geall le h-easbaidh athaisg do bheith air é"—literally "Whosoever talks after this second manner, it is equal to the want of speech to be upon him." In the spoken language at present they have in Waterford a proverb: "Is geall le sgeul maith gan aon droch sgeul"—"It is equal to a good tidings to be without bad tidings"; and in Clare, another proverb; "Atharrach oibre is geall le sgeith é"—a change of work is equal to a rest.

Line 47:

"Bendachais cach dá chell."

This, according to Mr. Stokes, means "Each blessed the other." Now the real meaning is, "Each saluted the other." It is true that bheannuigh means either "bless," or "salute"; but when the former is the meaning the object is direct, and in the accusative, as, "Do bheannuigh sé é"—"He blessed him" (Gen. xiv. 19); whereas when the word has the latter signification the object is indirect, and in the dative, with the preposition do, as "Do bheannuigh sé dhóibh"—"He saluted them" (1 Sam. xxx. 21, Bedell's translation). An Irish speaker would say—Do bheannuigh mé dhó's ní bheannochadh sé dhám—"I saluted him and he would not return the salute."

Lines 151, 152:

"Buailid coathlam ar nech, fennaíd, casraid, can fuirech."

This is rendered—Deftly smites our horses, flays, destroys, without delaying. W.S. "Smiting" (i.e., killing) and "flaying" are correct; but casraid here does not mean "destroys," which can be at once perceived, even from the context. Cosgairt is here, "chopping," "cutting up for the spits," and in this sense the word is still employed in every Irish-speaking locality in the four provinces. Thus, At á an bhó d'á cosgairt would mean, "The cow is being cut up" (i.e., to salt the meat). The following common story will illustrate this. It is said that the Sean riabhach, an old greyish cow, laughed in a sportive way at March when that boisterous month was nearly at an end. March being offended at the jeering borrowed in revenge three days from April. The story then proceeds—"An cheud lá bhí sí dá basgadh; an dara lá, ar tógbháil, agus an treas lá dá cosgairt." The first day she had to be dragged out (of some marshy place in which she stuck); the second day she had to be raised (being unable to get up on her feet); and the third day she was being cut up (butchered or flayed). Cosgairt has the meaning of "flayed" in one passage of Keating, treating of death. I cannot now lay my hand on the passage; but there can be no doubt as to the meaning, inasmuch as it refers to an unjust judge whose skin was hung over his seat on the bench, as a warning to any of his successors who should be tempted to follow his example.

Line 168:

"Arai beith can biad oentrath."

This is rendered by Mr. Stokes—"Because of being foodless for one watch." Tráth is not a "watch," but the "time" of a meal. Eadar-thráth is a common word for dinner-time. Thus also, "Greim ná bolgaim ní shlogainn tri trátha": "A bit nor a sup three times. I used not to swallow" (Midnight Court). Again: "Do thrasgfinn leat naoi d-thráth" (A. Rafferty).

Line 177:

"Múchter an tene ba thís."

This is rendered—"That fire that lay below was quenched." The meaning is rightly given by the Hibernicism still in use—"The fire that was down was quenched," equivalent to—"The fire that was burning (had been lighted) was quenched." So also, cuir teine síos, "put down" a fire, i.e., make a fire. "Eirigh ad shuidhe, a chailín, cuir síos prátaoi a's feoil," "Stand up, girl, put down potatoes and meat," i.e., put potatoes, &c., on the fire (Old Song).

In this little poem there occur a few more mistranslations equally manifest to any modern Irish scholar, and several things that are open to doubt; but I think enough has been cited for my purpose, which is not to find fault, but to show clearly that a man cannot be a first-class Celtic scholar without being acquainted with modern Irish. I do not know a single writer at the present day, among those who have acquired the reputation of being in the first rank of Celtic scholarship, who, in treating of ancient Irish literature, has not committed errors that he would have avoided had he known the modern Irish language.

Furthermore, this appears to be admitted by these scholars themselves. It is only a couple of weeks since the Rev. Dr. McCarthy stated before the Royal Irish Academy that it was vain for any one to set up as a dictator in Irish. And not many weeks previously Mr. Whitley Stokes said that a table of errata should be appended to every publication in Irish, following out his own practice; for he had appended such a table to the most elaborate of his works. Though he had been somewhere about nine years engaged in the preparation of the "Festiology" he had some hundreds of words in its corrigena et addenda. To these again he added a considerable number of other corrections in the Revue Celtique. And I may remark that these tables should be a model for all critics, there not being in them a single bitter allusion or statement.

If you are willing to insert any more on the same subject, I shall in another short paper be able to point out where all our Celtic scholars who write for the press, excepting only Mr. Standish H. O'Grady, have often erred egregiously, and this, not in difficult passages, but in things that would be quite easy to any person knowing modern Irish fairly. I shall also show to demonstration, if permitted, that an acquaintance with the language at present spoken, at least in the west and south of Ireland, is essentially necessary for a good Irish scholar. I am afraid this point is too much lost sight of by students of Celtic, and by philologists in general. The Irish scholars who constitute the working members of the Council of the Gaelic Union all speak Irish. In the interests of Celtic philology, I trust that you will give the wide circulation of the ACADEMY to the above remarks.

THRAKIAN "OLOR" AND NORSE "OLAFR."

Eastbourne: August 19, 1889.

Away from books, I have read at the seaside W. H. Stevenson's letter on "Olaf and Skythian Oloros" in the ACADEMY of August 17.

First of all, I may mention that it is not as a specially Skythian, but as a Thrakian, name that I have compared Olor with Olaf. The meaning of the final r in the Norse word, and the history of that name, as well as the various attempts at solving its etymology, I think I am tolerably well acquainted with. It is on account of the intricacies connected with the latter subject that I do not wish to load your columns with a discussion that does not properly belong to the question at issue; or I might as well go into the similarly difficult etymology of the German name "Armin."

When objection is taken to the equation of Olor with Olaf on account of "the initial vowel of the Scandinavian name being long, while that of the Skythian [Thrakian] name is short," I am afraid I might say more than the columns of the ACADEMY would bear about the differences of accentuation and vocalisation in the various dialects of the same language—differences which at once show that objection to be utterly "inadmissible." I have devoted some attention to German dialects during a lifetime. To give but one or two instances concerning long and short vowels, that which in High German is Adolf, becomes, in south-western Franconian speech, Äddölf; both syllables being pronounced with extreme rapidity. Jakob, in the same dialect, becomes Jäkköb. The Franks, by the way, I hold to be an intermediate link between the Phrygo-Thrakians and the Norsemen. In support of some of Mr. Fressl's statements, I have adduced linguistic proofs of this in the fuller articles which have appeared in the Magazin für die Literatur des In- und Auslandes.

Germans in general now say Gläs, Gräs. Some of our northern populations, however, say, Gläss, Gräss; yet in the genitive case they lengthen the vowel: des Gläses, des Gräses. I have heard men of culture stick to the correctness of this change. Vollkommen, in the pronunciation of some of our south-eastern populations, becomes vollkömen. Käm, with them, becomes kämm; Strässe, Strässe: Schwänthaler, Schwänthaller, and so forth. This may be heard even from the lips of the best educated, in whom the influence of the native dialect is, however, strongly ingrained.

In face of such facts (and in judging of language I do not go by mere book-lore) I have no difficulty in believing that Olaf or Olor may very well have got a short initial vowel among some of the numerous tribes of the Thracian race, which, according to Herodotos, was only inferior in numbers to the vast Indian population, and which doubtless had dialects as different as those existing in Upper and Lower Germany.

Perhaps the above remarks might already be enough to show that there is no "absurdity" in the comparison made between the two names. For my part, wishing to discuss questions of learning with proper amenity, I will take no notice of that expression, but rather turn to another point of fact. The Greeks and the Romans, it is well known, had not a very delicate ear for the niceties of foreign languages. Hence we have always to take into account some insufficiency in their rendering of the sounds of a "barbarous" tongue. The often somewhat throaty or slurred pronunciation and the peculiar broken vocalisation of some populations of Teutonic kinship may often have puzzled a Hellene. Nor is it always easy to fix the sounds of a language by a mere alphabet. Those who will look at another recent treatise of Mr. Fressl (Die Musik des bairischen Landvolkes) will see what stratagems have to be resorted to in order to render the characteristics of Bavarian speech. Is not the same the case in a large measure with English dialects?

In Bavarian folk-speech a great deal of the Gothic element still lingers—so much so that certain letter-changes which have occurred in all other High German dialects have not yet taken place in Bavarian. From this we can at once see the fallacy of the assertion that, five centuries or so before our era, the Olaf name must have resembled Analcip(os) rather than Olor(os). I contend that there are traces of a High Thracian and a Low Thracian speech, if I may say so, in the linguistic remains of that race. Among the Thrakians—whom we also know as Threkiens and Threikians—the Phryges, or Phrygians, were also contemporaneously called Bryge, Brigs, Bryks, or Bregs. Similarly, the Makedonians said Aprodite, Bilippos, Balakros, instead of Aphrodite, Philippos, Phalakros. To speak of a cast-iron law of letter-change is, therefore, again "inadmissible."

The Germanic kinship of the Thrakians is held by some of the foremost inquirers to be well established. Looking to other evidence which may be drawn from their language, I for my part regard the "Olor" name—insufficiently recorded though it may have been—as a most likely counterpart of the well-known Norse one. Let us not forget that it was from the neighbourhood of the Black Sea, where Thrakians of the numerous Asic name dwelt, that the tribal saga of the Scandinavians makes the Asic people migrate to the North, where this conquering clan established the Asa worship.

An English-Persian Dictionary. Compiled from Original Sources. By A. N. Wollaston. (W. H. Allen.)

IN 1882 Mr. Wollaston published an abridged English-Persian dictionary in octavo containing some 15,000 headings in 462 pages. He now gives us a much fuller dictionary in quarto embracing, perhaps, upwards of 40,000 articles in 1491 pages. At the same time in very many cases the original articles have been largely expanded, so that the proportion of the new work to the old is far greater than that of eight to three. The matter of the smaller dictionary, so far as we have been able to compare, seems to have been incorporated into the greater, from which it may be assumed that Mr. Wollaston's experience of the value of his original work has been favourable. The test of time, indeed, seems almost the only one applicable to a work of this nature; for the critic can satisfy himself completely only as to a limited portion of it, and here "a handful cannot be taken as a specimen of an ass-load," for chance may have guided him to an exceptionally favourable or unfavourable sample.

The dictionary is stated to have been "compiled from original sources." A fairly clear idea of these sources can be gathered from the preface to the smaller work. They may, on the whole, be considered satisfactory, though as regards the scientific terms, the exact sources might with advantage have been specified. No Persian scholar who has been without the assistance of a Persian acquainted with botany, for instance, can be unaware, if he has investigated the subject at all, how extremely difficult it is to give with scientific accuracy the equivalents of botanical names. In many cases scarcely any two dictionaries agree. Handjéri previously to Wollaston is, perhaps, the most accurate. Let us compare authorities in a few of the Umbelliferae. For "anise," Wollaston gives anisün, räsiyānah-i rūmī, bādyān; Handjéri gives anisün, räziyānah-i rūmī; Nicolas: anisün, räsiyānah, bādyān; Bergé: räsiyānah; the Alfäzu 'l-Adviyah explains anisün by (Persian) bādyān-i rūmī. For "fennell," Wollaston gives: räsiyānah, bādyān, bikh-i kühi; Handjéri: räziyānah, bād tukhm; Nicolas: shivid, shivil; Bergé: shibit, shivit; the Alfäzu 'l-Adviyah explains räsiyānah by (Persian) bādyān. As equivalents of "dill," Wollaston has: shibit, shibid; Handjéri: shivit, shivit; Nicolas omits; Bergé: shibit; the Alfäzu 'l-Adviyah describes shibit—(Persian) shivit—as like fennell and of strong odour (? dill). For "cumin" Wollaston gives: kamün, zirā, jirā; Handjéri: kammün, zirah; Nicolas: kammün, zirah; Bergé omits; the Alfäzu 'l-Adviyah explains kammün by (Persian) zirah-i kirmāni, zirah-i siyāh. For "caraway" Wollaston has: zirah-i kirmāni, zirah-i siyāh; Handjéri: karārā, zirah-i rūmī; Nicolas omits; Bergé omits; the Alfäz under Karviyā gives (Persian) zirah-i rūmī, zirah-i shāmi. Thus Wollaston and Handjéri generally agree. The Alfäzu 'l-Adviyah differs in a few particulars from both, but seems to establish bādyān as the equivalent of "fennell," bādyān-i rūmī as that of "anise," and zirah-i rūmī, or zirah-i shāmi, as that of "caraway."

Before the appearance of the dictionary under review, the principal resource of Persian scholars was Handjéri's Dictionnaire Français-Arabe-Persan et Turc. The main object of that valuable work, however, being the furtherance of Turkish studies, all the examples given are in that language. Palmer's work and Wollaston's earlier dictionary, good generally so far as they go, are small. Berge's work is a mere vocabulary, and Nicolas's, though larger, is not yet completed. The old work of Wilkins is almost valueless, so that as a matter of fact Wollaston's is the first one calculated to satisfy fully the student's requirements. As he intimates, the sins of omission are few; and, so far as may be judged from a careful examination of various passages, the sins of commission do not seem so serious as to detract materially from the value of the work.

Mr. Wollaston in general, so far as we have gathered, omits but little in his renderings of the different headings, the equivalents offered being co-extensive with the various meanings of the word except in the case of certain terms synonymous in some of their sense. The attentive reader of the "Akhtar," however, may be a little surprised not to see his familiar istimsāj namādan as the equivalent of "to sound" in the sense of "to try to gather a person's inclinations." The expression kāsi kardan meaning "to mix" (e.g., water with wine—cf. the French "couper") occurs so often in conversation that the omission of that equivalent is also somewhat strange.

Such omissions, however, do not strike us as being more numerous than must inevitably find their way into a work of such magnitude; and it would be a more grateful task to enlarge upon the very many excellences of it, if the space at our command permitted. All Persian scholars owe the author a heavy debt of gratitude for his undertaking and bringing to so successful a termination so onerous and in many respects ungrateful a task. In the case of a language like Persian, in which so little has been done save by native lexicographers, the work of finding precise equivalents is enormous; and it must necessarily be to a considerable extent tentative, until repeated attempts and very extensive experience, assisted often, as regards phrases and sentences, by happy inspirations, place it upon the required level. In this place we might recommend to the Persian scholar possessed of the necessary ability, experience, and leisure a thorough and exhaustive study of the Persian adjective and preposition. With reference to the latter we should have been glad to see in the work under review the preposition which is required after each intransitive verb pointed out in connexion with that verb. This, of course, would have aided to the compass of a work already very large unless smaller type had been used. The type actually used, though contributing to the handsomeness of the volume—a stately quarto—is unnecessarily large. With smaller type, the work might have been contained in two or three octavo volumes, which would have been much handier for use.

CHARLES EDWARD WILSON.

TWO BOOKS ON PHYSIOGRAPHY.

A Text-book of Physiography or Physical Geography. By Edward Hull. (C. W. Deacon & Co.) By using the terms "Physiography" and "Physical Geography" as synonyms on the title-page of this work, the author seems hardly to realise the distinction that exists between these two departments of knowledge. Physiography is properly a study of nature as a whole, and is, therefore, a much wider subject than physical geography. Notwithstanding this slight confusion of terms, Prof. Hull has produced a very useful little book. The first part is astronomical, and deals with the earth as a member of the solar system. Then follow sections on terrestrial physics, and on the physical features of the earth; and it is especially in this part that Prof. Hull's wide experience in geological work stands him in good stead, and impresses the book with an individuality. Finally, the distribution of life on the globe is discussed, the section on the distribution of plants having been contributed by Mr. F. W. Burbidge, of the botanic gardens in Dublin. The work is illustrated by a number of excellent little maps, clearly printed in colours, which are likely to prove of much service to the student who is without a physical atlas at his elbow. At the same time, it might have been well to omit the ideal section through the earth's crust, which forms the second plate, and has little to recommend it. In fact, diagrams embodying mere conjecture are apt to produce in the mind of the young student false impressions, which are extremely difficult to eradicate.

A Sketch of the First Principles of Physiography. By John Douglas. (Chapman & Hall.) The author of this work has evidently a clear idea of what is embraced by the science of physiography. In his prologue, he chats pleasantly with his reader concerning the activities of nature which may be seen in play on the sea-shore; but he soon lays this light style aside, and plunges seriously into the subject of gravity. His statements are generally clear; but errors have slipped in, apparently due to carelessness in proof-reading. Thus, the formula for determining specific gravity (p. 7) is so printed as to be quite misleading to the student. Nevertheless, the book contains much that is well worth reading, and it is evident that some of the latest and best authorities have been consulted in its preparation. The plan of the book is, on the whole, good; and the systematic statement of results in a tabular form is a feature which may prove useful to the student preparing for examination. It is a pity that where so much of the text may be spoken of favourably, the illustrations should be of an extremely crude character. The frontispiece, it is true, is formed by a geological map of Southern Britain, well printed in colours; but even this is not altogether satisfactory, inasmuch as a spread of blue colour represents what is vaguely described as "limestone," without a word of reference as to its age.

SLAVICA.

THE last number of the review Prace Filologiczne (Philological Studies) has just appeared at Warsaw. It contains important articles, both for the study of the Polish language in particular and Slavonic philology in general. Especially valuable are the fragments of old Polish here printed, such as the Formule Colloquiorum, dating from the end of the fifteenth century, described by J. Przyborski. They consist of Latin phrases explained in Polish; and also the life of St. Eufrazia of the year 1524, which is printed by A. Krynski, with a glossary of the obsolete words. To these must be added the Breslau glosses, belonging to the second half of the fifteenth century, and an account of three manuscripts of the sixteenth, now in the university library of Erlangen. Two of them belonged to Jadwiga (or Hedwig), who married Joachim, Margrave of Brandenburg, in 1535, and died in 1573, the last Catholic princess who ruled at Berlin. The third belonged to Sophia, who married, in 1556, Henry of Brunswick, and died in 1575. Both these ladies were daughters of Sigismund I., of Poland. The first two of these manuscripts are books of prayers; the third contains postils on the gospels. Some other fragments of manuscripts have been found in the same library. The interesting article on these books is by A. Brückner. In a "Contribution to the Study of the Kaszubish Dialect," J. Sembrzycki compares some forms in the old German-Polish Dictionary of Mongrowisz (Danzig, 1823), with the Kaszubish Dictionary of Poblocki (Culm, 1887). J. S. Ziemia also furnishes an article on the provincial words used in the district of Bedzin, in the government of Piotrkow, in Russian Poland.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MR. DAVID SYME, of Melbourne, who is known in this country and in Germany as a political and economic author of originality, is now engaged on a scientific work entitled The Modifications of Organisms. Though an evolutionist, Mr. Syme will subject certain of Darwin's views to adverse criticism; and the book is addressed not only to biologists, but also to all those who seek to keep abreast of the latest developments of scientific speculation.

THE Cape Government has recently issued an able Report on South African Coal, by Mr. W. Galloway, of Cardiff, who was officially deputed to examine and report upon the coals of the Colony, especially those of the Indwe Basin and the Stormberg Mountains. The average thickness of the Indwe coal is set down at 3 ft. 8 in., and the field is estimated to yield about 302,000,000 tons. The coal is greatly inferior to Welsh steam coal, since it has a much lower calorific value, and yields more ash; but its use may nevertheless be extended with advantage over the railway system of the Colony. It is estimated that the Stormberg basin will yield at least 19,000,000 tons of coal, but this fuel is not equal in quality to the Indwe coal. Geologists will note with interest that Mr. Galloway believes most coal to have been formed from drifted vegetable matter, and not to have grown in its present position—a view which harmonises with the opinion at present popular among the geologists of France, but is not generally entertained in this country.

Names and Synonyms of British Plants. By G. Egerton-Warburton. (Bell.) If not a hard task, it is certainly a very dry one to set about the collation and co-ordination of the nomenclature of British plants, and thanks are due to Mr. Egerton-Warburton for undertaking it. He has collated the names found in the London Catalogue, English Botany, Babington's Manual, Bentham's Flora, and Hooker's Students' Flora, and has added "an appendix giving other names and their synonyms, and a list of authorities for plant-names." But we fear that he has undertaken it rather too soon. The nomenclature of the last edition of the London Catalogue, which work all botanists are likely to follow, is by no means final. The principles on which it is arranged, and on which one name is given the preference over another, are not fully carried out; nor has the older botanical literature yet been sufficiently examined for us to be sure what names were given earliest, and are therefore entitled to preference. Three was a great deal of readjustment in the last edition of the London Catalogue, and there will probably be much more in the next. In the present little book, Walker's Flora of Oxfordshire might as well be added to the list of authorities, since it illustrates the use of Arenaria rubra and some other old-fashioned names. Among misprints we notice Connim (for Conium), Mathiola (for Matthiola), Salix hippophaefolia, Sanguisorbia; and such oversights may, in a work of this kind, be fruitful parents of error. Chocrophyllum temulum is, of course, mentioned; but the by-name, C. temulentum (Smith), is overlooked. Knappia agrostidea is nowhere mentioned as a synonym for Mibora Verna, nor Orchis fusca for O. purpurea. Finally, it might be well to notice in a book on botanical nomenclature why the specific epithet is sometimes allowed by usage a capital letter (Mentha Piperita) and sometimes defies grammar (Ranunculus acris). There are reasons, but beginners do not know them.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

M. HART, dragoman to the French Embassy at Constantinople, has been sent by the government to Asia Minor, to study the monuments of the Seljuicides, and to collect MSS. relating to the history of that dynasty.

RECENT numbers of the Babylonian and Oriental Record (David Nutt) contain two articles by Dr. L. C. Casartelli, in which he contests the views put forth by Dastur Darab concerning incestuous marriages in ancient Persia.

DR. GUSTAV OPPERT has published in the Madras Journal of Literature and Science the second part of an elaborate treatise upon the original inhabitants of India. In this he deals with the non-Dravidian races, to whom he gives the name of Gaudian.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Bréal contested the theory, now generally accepted by philologists, that the ending -ons of the first person plural of French verbs (nous chantons, nous courons) was borrowed by analogy from the ancient form nous sons (for nous sommes), which itself comes from the Latin sumus. M. Bréal brought forward four objections to this theory: (1) When a conjugation influences another by way of analogy, it is usually the more regular that exercises such influence; (2) why should only the first person plural of the verb être be borrowed, and not other persons as well? (3) the other Romance languages show no corresponding phenomena; (4) if any auxiliary verb were to exercise such an influence upon the conjugation of other verbs, we should expect it to be avoir and not être. M. Bréal, therefore, preferred to see in the ending -ons a changed form of the ending -amus of the first conjugation in Latin. The deadening of a into o before a nasal vowel is not unexampled; and the ending of the first conjugation would readily be transferred to all the others. M. Gaston Paris could by no means share M. Bréal's view. The change of a into o is altogether inadmissible. Since ramus has given raisin, and famem has given faim, cantamus could give nothing else but chantains. The explanation drawn from the analogy of sumus is only an hypothesis, liable to be replaced by a better; but, above all things, one must reject an explanation which is decisively condemned by phonetic laws.

Etudes de Grammaire Comparée: De la Psychologie du Langage. By Raoul de la Grasserie. (Paris: Maisonneuve.) We have already more than once had the pleasure of bringing M. de la Grasserie's contributions to the science of language before the notice of readers of the ACADEMY. The wideness of his linguistic survey, his freshness of thought, and the attention he has bestowed on the psychological study of language, render him a valuable and suggestive worker in a neglected field of philological research. The tendency of modern scientific philology has been towards a too exclusive study of the Indo-European languages upon their phonetic or physiological side. M. de la Grasserie's new work requires close and careful reading, but it is full of instruction, and ought to be in the hands of every comparative philologist. What he has to say about analogy may be specially recommended to the student. As he points out, analogy is not the exclusive property of psychology. It is "the force of attraction between two sounds, or two forms, as well as between two ideas," and consequently there is a phonetic analogy and a morphological analogy as well as a psychological analogy. M. de la Grasserie defines the psychology of language as the study of ideas from the point of view of their expressibility in speech, and he distinguishes it as either statical or dynamical. It will be seen that at the outset the reader is called upon to exercise his powers of thought, and to follow with care the subtle but necessary distinctions and definitions of the author. It is for want of such care and logical subtlety that the psychological study of language still lags so far behind its physiological study.

FINE ART.

A History of French Painting. By C. H. Stranahan. (Sampson Low.)

It is an enterprise of a difficulty calculated to dismay the boldest which Mrs. C. H. Stranahan has attempted in this "History of French Painting from its Earliest to its Latest Practice"; and considering the vast extent of the ground covered, and the novelty of the attempt, her success must be pronounced more than creditable. We are not aware that any work of magnitude in the English language has yet covered the same field in its entirety, though separate chapters of French art-history have of late years been dealt with in detail—notably by Lady Dilke in her Renaissance in France, her Claude Lorrain, and her Art in the Modern State recently reviewed in the ACADEMY.

A distinctive character is given to the present work by the fact that more than one-half of its contents are devoted to the attempt to elucidate the infinite ramifications of contemporary art in France. Though there exists the amplest material for such an effort in the admirable criticisms of the modern salonniers and chroniqueurs of Paris, and in the unsurpassed artistic publications of the last twenty years—and the author has manifestly (in many cases avowedly) drawn very freely upon these for her classifications and her opinions—yet the evident necessity for avoiding parti pris and steering clear, in dealing with susceptible living mortals, of the extreme views proper to the passionate partisan has given a timid, a confused, and tentative character to the latter portion of the history. In its earlier portion we find occasional inaccuracies, together with strange omissions in a few cases to notice commanding personalities of French art, or, what is worse, mere perfunctory mention of these in two or three passing words of small print or foot-notes; while over-much space, where so little can be spared, is often allotted to painters of secondary position and no special influence.

Mrs. Stranahan errs in stating that a "Salvator Mundi," by Jehan Fouquet, is in the National Gallery of England; while she might have pointed out that the British Museum now possesses one leaf of the famous "Livre d'Heures d'Etienne Chevalier," which almost in its entirety is owned by M. Brentano, of Frankfurt. The only other missing leaf has lately been acquired, if we mistake not, for the Bibliothèque Nationale. She further fails to mention among the few known works of the great Tours chef-d'école the two characteristic and undoubted portraits in the Louvre.

In the chapter on "Painting in the Sixteenth Century" some strange statements are made as to the Clouet group, about whom the author has evidently not consulted the most competent authorities. So far from Clouet III. (called like his father Jeannet) having left "many pictures," few painters of great repute have left a smaller number. He no doubt painted many; but of those which remain little more than the "Charles IX." and the "Elisabeth d'Autriche" of the Louvre, the larger "Charles IX." of the Vienna Gallery; and the exquisite "Dauphin François" of the Antwerp Gallery, can be claimed with certainty as his. The fine "Eléonore d'Autriche" of Hampton Court, if a Clouet, is a Clouet II.; the great picture at Castle Howard of Catherine de Médicis, with her children, has elements which forbid us to ascribe it to Jeannet; and even the well-known "Henry II." of the Louvre is too harsh and black in the flesh-tones for him. Beyond doubt authentic are, on the other hand, two or three important crayon portraits in the Bibliothèque Nationale. We have been unable to trace in this part of the work any mention of Corneille de Lyon, a famous contemporary of the Clouets, whose celebrity still survives in a well-known passage of Brantôme's Dames Illustres, though no picture can now with any degree of certainty be ascribed to him. The seventeenth century—for which authorities are endless, and the materials for study close at hand—is, considering the space allotted to it, very completely described; the particulars as to Vouet, Lebrun, Lesueur, Mignard, Jean Jouvenet, and others being both concise and accurate. The author has wisely placed in this period the friendly rivals Hyacinthe Rigaud, and Largillière, who, although they lived far into the eighteenth century, were to all intents and purposes, in their dignified and urbane conventionality of manner, true children of the Grand Siècle. Here, again, it is curious that no mention is to be found of Santerre, a man of mark, and even, in his day, at the junction between the two centuries, a considerable celebrity; nor of the better if more unequal painter Grimou, chiefly known by his charming portraits of so-called pilgrims and his richly coloured studies of fancifully costumed women, calling up reminiscences both of Vandyck and of Rembrandt. The latter was, no doubt, of Swiss origin, but he was, to all intents and purposes, a Frenchman, and became for a time member of the Academy.

If the writer has only been partially successful in her attempt to characterise the art of Watteau, the essential beauty of which, in a sense, escapes analysis, she has failed in good company. We must, however, point out that she is evidently imperfectly acquainted with the works of that master in and about London, since she gives the number of these at nine only. The contributions of Sir Richard Wallace, Mr. A. de Rothschild, and Lord Northbrook alone to the last Winter Exhibition at Burlington House considerably exceeded this total, to which must be added the pictures at Buckingham Palace, the Dulwich Gallery, and the Sloane Museum, as well as the "Gilles," recently acquired by Sir E. Guinness. On the other hand, the art of Boucher, of Carle Vanloo, and of the passionate Fragonard, is happily characterised; as is also the solid and subtle technique and the unaffected pathos of Chardin, a painter whose standpoint in the study of human life and whose execution were so modern—in the best sense of the word—that his spontaneous development in the very middle of the eighteenth century must remain a lasting source of wonder. If want of space may be alleged by Mrs. Stranahan as some sort of excuse for allotting three lines of small print to Jean-Marc Nattier, as many to Tocqué, and four lines to the whole Drouais family, it is absolutely unpardonable that she should have vouchsafed just one line and a half to the greatest French portrait-painter of the eighteenth century, Maurice-Quentin de La Tour, for no other reason—if we may surmise—than that his medium was pastel and not oils. The artist who has immortalised with so penetrating a charm the better side of the much-maligned century—its good sense underlying superficial brilliancy, and its imperturbable serenity—who proved more than a match for king, Pompadour, and court, was surely deserving of better treatment. Peronneau, who was for a time his successful rival, is altogether ignored.

On the other hand, the causes which led to the rise of David, and the crushing out of the already moribund graces of the age of Louis XVI., are fairly and clearly stated. There is nothing particularly new to be said about the famous pseudo-classicist—a commanding figure, whatever be the estimate which we may form of his art; but his position as the central sun of a system, round which revolved such planets as Girodet, Guérin, Gérard, and in the beginning even those more erratic stars, Gros and Géricault, must always lend to his personality a certain unique interest. Few things in the history of art are more curious than Gros's splendid if half-unconscious rebellion, with the famous "Pestiférés de Jaffa" and the "Champ de Bataille d'Eylau," from the so-called classical doctrine and practice of the master he revered, and his penitent return to the fold in later years, too late to stem the torrent which he himself had set free. We cannot altogether agree with the estimate formed by Mrs. Stranahan of the style of a far truer and more genial artist than David—Pierre Prud'hon. Whatever may have been the course of his studies in Rome, his works cannot fairly be described as "antique subjects rendered in a Raphaellesque style." His false conception of antique art was derived, to a great extent, from his close friend Canova; but his style of painting, his chiaroscuro, and the mysterious grace with which he knew how to invest female beauty were inspired by the great Milanese School of Leonardo da Vinci, and to a certain extent by the more mannered elegance of Correggio. Full justice is done to the three generations of Vernets—Joseph, Carle, and Horace; and the pages describing the brilliant social successes of the two latter in Rome, when Horace became director of the Academy in 1828, are among the pleasantest in the book. The genial nature of Carle is shown by his pretty speech, full of filial and parental love, at the end of his life: "I am like the great Dauphin—the son of a king, and the father of a king, but never a king myself."

[In the great romantic development, which was the contrecoup in France of classical a priori principles and intolerance, art was for once ahead of literature—a reversal of the usual process. For did not the "Radeau de la Méduse" of Géricault appear in 1819, and the "Massacre de Scio" of Delacroix in 1824, whereas the "Cour de Henri III." of Dumas dates from 1829, and the "Hernani" of Victor Hugo from 1830. To discuss one branch of the movement without the other is to obtain but an imperfect idea of it. The central figure of Delacroix—a great if incomplete, artist whose vogue has for the moment a little declined with his fickle countrymen—is here made to stand out with the clearness of outline which befits it, and a sympathetic description is given of his artistic aims and practice. Undue prominence is, on the other hand, given to Déveris, a romanticist whose art has more affinity with the precise calculated manner of Delaroche than with the passionate fervour of Delacroix. Though we do not greatly care for the arbitrary classification of Decamps as an "orientalist," he is, on the whole, rightly characterised as a romanticist of realistic tendencies, and as the painter-poet of sunlight and atmosphere. The dangerous splendours of the full sunlight he almost alone among Frenchmen of his generation dared to face; and until the impressionists led the way, few even of the naturalistic nature-worshippers ventured to cope with this supreme difficulty of art.

So much that is exquisite has of late years been written about the Barbizon school of landscape, with its great protagonists, Jules Dupré, Corot, Rousseau, Diaz, Millet, and Daubigny, that it would not be easy to go wrong in setting forth its principles and practice. Not a few things that are both accurate and well put—we care not whether they be original or discreetly borrowed—are said about these unsurpassed artists, and especially about Corot and Theodore Rousseau; but it is something of a shock to find that Jean-François Millet, although he is acknowledged as belonging to this group, is divorced from it, in order to head a group of his own, entitled here "Rustic Genre"! The tragic genius of the peasant-painter is too vast, too massive to be pent up even by imaginary barriers within such narrow limits; and altogether such a classification has a distasteful ring of triviality.

Want of space prevents us from following the author closely in her examination of contemporary French art, which, however, is apparently the part of her task which she has executed con amore, and to which, indeed, the earlier part of the volume is more or less subordinated. The list of artists discussed and mentioned is, on the whole, a very full and complete one, the subject having evidently been closely followed up in its latest phases; and, as a rule, under safe guidance. As in the first section of the history, a few important lacunae and some unfortunately scanty notices of first-rate men are to be remarked; and these stand out the more markedly when contrasted with the relatively very full biographies furnished in other cases. Thus, we have failed to discover even the most passing notice of the artist who is now, perhaps, France's greatest portrait-painter, M. Elie-Delaunay; although his splendid intellectual and technical powers are now at last receiving full, if tardy, recognition on all sides, as is shown by the unanimity with which there has recently been accorded to him one of the great medals of honour at the present Exposition Universelle. The remarkable painter of pure decoration, M. P. V. Galland, is equally ignored; as are Benner, Debat Ponsan, Nellie Jacquemart, Roybet, Julien Dupré, Blanche, Hellen, and others; while one line is accorded to Eugène Thirion, and about the same to one of the truest and noblest artists of modern France, Fantin-Latour. The same almost total neglect obscures MM. Besnard, Cazin, and Dagnan-Bouveret, three of the most noticeable, and what is more, the most noticed painters of this generation: the first as the eccentric apostle of impressionistic decoration on a large scale; the second as one of the most poetic of realists in landscape; and the third as the worthy successor of Bastien-Lepage. On the other hand, full paragraphs are accorded to such lesser luminaries as MM. Vibert, Worms, the Leloirs, Comte-Calix, and many others. No better biographies on a small scale need be required than those of MM. Meissonier, Gérôme, Hébert, Bonnat, and Cabanel; but the great gravity with which the art of Gustave Doré as painter and sculptor is considered is almost comical. It is chiefly in England—and that almost exclusively by the country-cousin—that this portion of the gifted illustrator's life-work is taken au sérieux. It is by his "Rabelais," his "Contes Drolatiques," his "Juif Errant," and his "Münchhausen," and not by the huge Bond Street pictures, that he will live. But a poor analysis is given of the peculiar quintessencié manner which characterises that sad painter of splendid dreams, Gustave Moreau; while another great nineteenth-century idealist, M. Puvis de Chavannes, is better and more sympathetically presented; though Mrs. Stranahan fails to appreciate the all-penetrating influence which he, the once condemned enthusiast, is now exercising over France, and, indeed, over Europe generally.

So closely connected is the modern art of France with the kindred schools which she has created in America, in Scandinavia, in Germany, and even to a lesser extent in Italy, that some account of the most noticeable painters of these groups is required to complete a contemporary history such as the present work. Messrs. J. S. Sargent, Harrison, Kroyer, Edelfelt, Fritz v. Uhde, and Liebermann are, so far as technique goes, to all intents and purposes, French painters; and they do no less honour to the parent school whose most modern precepts they are developing to the utmost, than do their brothers in art who happen to have been born on French soil.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH, FARRAN & Co., have in the press a descriptive catalogue of the collection of pictures belonging to the Earl of Northbrook, illustrated with twenty-five photographs, by the Dixon and Gray orthochromatic process, printed in platinotype. The Dutch, Flemish, and French schools are described by Mr. W. H. James Weale; the Italian and Spanish schools by Dr. J. P. Richter. Some account will be given of the history of the collection, the beginnings of which date from the end of the last century, when Sir Francis Baring, the first baronet and founder of the banking house, acquired a fine series of Dutch masters. These, however, were sold to the Regent, on his death, in 1810; but the eldest son, Sir Thomas, formed a gallery of his own, mainly composed of Italian pictures. The collection, in its present form, is due to Thomas Baring, second son of Sir Thomas, who purchased in 1846 a third portion (together with Lord Overstone and Humphrey Mildmay) of the historic gallery of Dutch pictures belonging to Baron Verstolk van Soelen, of the Hague; and bought at a valuation the Italian, Spanish, and French pictures of his father on his death in 1848. Thomas Baring bequeathed the collection, which he was continually augmenting, to his nephew, the present Lord Northbrook, in 1873.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish immediately a Catalogue of the casts in the museum of classical archaeology at Cambridge, compiled by Dr. Charles Waldstein, director of the Fitzwilliam Museum.

THE report of Mr. Doyle, director of the National Gallery of Ireland, for the year 1888, shows that the number of free admissions to the gallery was 80,359, 21,570 persons having visited the gallery on Sundays. The number of new students admitted to copy was 28, of whom 23 were ladies and 5 gentlemen. Among the pictures purchased for the general collection was a large wooded landscape by Jacob Ruydael, with figures by T. de Keyser (£399); "A Halt of Soldiers," by Philip Wouvermans (£267 15s.), and "The Feast in Simon's House; St. Mary Magdalen anointing the head of Our Lord," by Luca Signorelli (£178 10s.). In order to enrich the National Historical and Portrait Gallery 11 portraits of celebrities were purchased, among them Sir Walter Raleigh (£110 5s.), Viscount Melbourne (£5), Thomas Moore (£50), John Wilson Croker (£54 10s.), Laurence Sterne (£4), Charles Lever (£15), and a drawing in indian ink of Oliver Cromwell (£5). Among the donations received during the year was a gift of £1000 from Sir E. Guinness to enable the board of governors and guardians to obtain a selection of mezzotint portraits at the sale of the Chaloner Smith collection. Two hundred of these were purchased for £694. Lady O'Hagan presented a portrait in crayons of Lord Chancellor O'Hagan; and Sir C. Gavan Duffy presented a small plaster bust of Thomas Davis, modelled from life. It was resolved to introduce into the National Historical and Portrait Gallery autograph writings of persons therein represented from time to time as opportunities offered. A collection of 20 autographs was presented by Mr. B. Green, containing, among others, autographs of Grattan, Curran, Plunket, and O'Connell. One of Moore's melodies, words and music in the author's handwriting, was purchased for £2.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Salomon Reinach announced that he had discovered among the papers of General Ant. Callier, who travelled in Asia Minor between 1830 and 1834, copies of a great number of Greek and Latin inscriptions, several of which, hitherto unpublished, are interesting for the purposes of ancient geography. One of them, found at Kirgol in the valley of the Rhyndacus, mentions the town of Alia, probably distinct from another town of the same name, known to us by its coins. Others establish for the first time that the modern Oushak, an important centre of carpet-weaving, is the site of the ancient Temenothyrae, which, under the empire, took the additional name of Flavio-polis. A little to the east of this was Grymenothyrae, also called Trajanopolis. Geographers have previously placed Temenothyrae far to the west of its true position, so as to bring it close to Mount Temnos, under the idea that the name meant the "pass" or "gate" of Temnos. M. Reinach pointed out that there existed in Lydia a town called Teira, besides the well-known Thyateira, from which he inferred that teira was a Lydian word meaning "town" or "fort," and that the true name of Temenothyrae ought to be "Temenoteira." Moreover, we know from coins that the town had an eponymous hero called Temenos. The original name would therefore mean "the fort of Temenos," which was changed to Temenothyrae in order to give a Greek meaning. A similar case of popular etymology is supplied by Mount Hymettus, which Italian sailors in the middle ages called Monte Matto ("mad mountain"), translated by the Greeks "Trelou Vouno," and so-called by them to this day.

CAPT. VAN ENDE, of the Dutch Army, has presented to the Bibliothèque Royale at Brussels, his collection of about 500 coins from Indo-China. The series begins with some pieces of archaic type from Java, apparently before the influence of Buddhism; and includes examples of Mohammedan mints in Sumatra and the Malay peninsula, and also the currency of the Dutch and English East India Companies.

OBITUARY.

JAMES ALBERY.

MR. JAMES ALBERY—a dramatic writer, who, many years ago, had a moment of brilliant success, and has since then been not without pecuniary prosperity or public repute—died on Friday in last week in St. Martin's Lane. His health had been for a considerable period a subject of distress to his friends. Mr. Albery was not originally destined for literary or dramatic life. His first efforts in authorship were those of the intelligent amateur; and it is true, we believe, not only that like Tobin, the once highly-valued author of "The Honey-moon," he derived an income from business, but that in some remote south-eastern suburb—Bermondsey, possibly, or New Cross—he was the proprietor of what is known as a "rope-walk." In other words, he made cord and twine. Very likely Mr. Albery's cord and twine were as good as other people's and no better. In 1870—when he wrote "Two Roses"—his witticisms were distinctly better than other people's, and he was unquestionably right in taking to dramatic writing. "Two Roses" started the fortunes of the Vaudeville Theatre, then managed by three popular young actors—for Mr. Thomas Thorne, who is still at its head, was associated at that period with Mr. David James and the late Mr. H. J. Montagu. With these, as an actor of eccentric character, was that not altogether unknown personage, Mr. Henry Irving. The charming Miss Amy Fawcett played the best girl's part in "Two Roses"; and when Mr. Stephens and Miss Newton are added, it will be seen that the cast of Mr. Albery's first important piece was of quite exceptional strength. Of course, the acting did very much for "Two Roses," yet the play had within itself the elements of high success. It was fresh; it was ingenious; it was pretty and touching; it sparkled with witty observation put into neat form. Alas, Mr. Albery never followed it up with work containing any such combination of attractive qualities! He did good work after "Two Roses." Indeed, "Apple Blossoms," "Forgiveness," and "Oriana"—each piece differing essentially from the others, and all containing good points—were in certain respects not unworthy successors. But not one of them hit the public taste seriously; and it is likely that for a while at least Mr. Albery got disheartened or careless, for he drifted into an adapter, not of the finer, more poetic, and graver French work, but of boisterous farce, the fun of it generally founded upon equivocal incidents. Thus, in 1877, we were presented with "Pink Dominos"—which was violently laughed at and very sharply criticised—and in 1880 there followed "Where's the Cat?" Into most of his adaptations of the improper and the entertaining, Mr. Albery no doubt put something of his own; but one could wish that he had devoted what we may call his energy to better purposes. In still later years, Mr. Albery has been supposed to have been to some extent the literary adviser of a shrewd, successful, and rightly-ambitious London manager. But recently his labours—whether of counsel or collaboration—have been, to say the least, unimportant. Perhaps other pieces of his besides "Two Roses" may, as time goes on, obtain a measure of favour, by reason of a distinct literary quality, hitherto somewhat ignored. "Two Roses," at all events, will keep him in the remembrance of this and, as we suppose, of the next generation of playgoers.

M. DAMALA—Sarah Bernhardt's husband, who was acting with her in London quite recently—died a day or two ago in Paris. He had been out of health for some time, and is said to have been in the habit of seeking relief by injections of morphia. As an actor, M. Jacques Damala was hardly "to the manner born." He was originally in the diplomatic service of Greece. But at least two of his performances—that in "Le Maître de Forges," and that of the almost intolerable lover in the "Dame aux Camélias"—marked him out as an artist of considerable force, and showed his capacity to rise distinctly above the achievements of the amateur. His first dramatic work, we believe, was in a company organised to accompany M^{me}. Bernhardt on a tour in foreign parts.

STAGE NOTES.

WE hear that Miss Alma Murray and Miss Mary Rorke have both accepted engagements to appear at the Adelphi Theatre in September.

THE comic entertainment of "Our Flat" and "Boys will be Boys" has this week been transferred by Mr. Willie Edouin from the Opera Comique to the Strand.

MR. EDWARD TERRY has, it is said, accepted an invitation to read a paper on "The Amusements of the People" before the Church Congress, which is to be held at Cardiff in October.

MR. TRESAHAR, the author, having made some alterations in "The Catpaw," Miss Muriel Wyllford and Mr. H. B. Conway, with others of the original cast, have started on a tour directed by Mr. Philip Atkinson. They were at Eastbourne last week, and are this week at Folkestone.

THE company organised for the provincial performances of "The Old Home," and of "The Farm by the Sea" during the autumn opened at the Theatre Royal, Halifax, on Monday. Miss Florence Wade plays the heroine of Mr. Buchanan's comedy, while Mr. Rudge Harding is cast for the careless husband in the same piece. In Mr. Wedmore's adaptation from Theuriet, Miss Ella Sennett now appears as Thérèse.

ON Saturday a new first piece, entitled "The Postscript," will be produced at the Vaudeville, which is now in the hands of Mr. Lilford Arthur; and, on the same evening, the first and second acts of "In Danger" will be given in a radically changed form.

IT is proposed to give a complimentary matinée to Sir Randal Roberts—who suffered severely from a railway accident last spring—at Terry's Theatre on September 25, when a new and original play will be produced.

A SOCIETY has been founded for the study of German dramatic literature, the special object of which is to impart to the members a thorough knowledge of the language by means of the performance of German plays. The president and director is Herr Paul P. Grünfeld; the hon. secretary is Lazarus Weisberg, Westminster Jews' Free School, Hanway Place, Oxford Street.

MUSIC.

MUSIC PUBLICATIONS.

A Key to "Parsifal." (Chappell.) This is a translation, by Mr. W. A. Ellis, of Herr v. Wolzogen's well-known pamphlet. In the preface—a part of a book not always read—the translator strongly deprecates motif-hunting in anyone visiting Bayreuth for the first time. He advocates first heart-enjoyment, then head-knowledge. But, if only it be not superficial, it seems to us to matter little whether knowledge come first or last. There are some who object to music which requires a key, but "Parsifal" is something more than music; and, besides, no one, so far as we know, complains of an analysis of the Choral Symphony. A key to the construction of the latter work is always welcome; a fortiori of a work of greater length, and of novel form. Mr. Ellis has not endeavoured to do more than give a faithful translation of Wolzogen's words, and so apologises for the "Englishing"; but if not "flowery", it is clear.

The Organist's Quarterly Journal, Part 83 (Novello), opens with "The Ancient Vesper Hymn," by Dr. Spark. The Hymn is certainly ancient, and offers a strong contrast to the florid character and the harmonies of the variations. The term "fuga" for the concluding variation is rather an ambitious one. A "Postlude," by Mr. A. Toase, is a piece of modest dimensions; and the close of the principal section is somewhat jerky. "A Fancy," by Mr. Allan Allen, is light and graceful. Mr. G. Halford's "Processional March" is not particularly original, but the writing is bright and vigorous. The two Trios in keys not so nearly related to that of the march would have afforded a pleasing contrast, as the march is heard three times.

Harvest Cantata. By Dr. George Garrett. (Op. 20.) (Novello.) This is a work of small compass, and the style of writing is comparatively simple. It is intended for performance in church; and hymns, evidently to be sung by the congregation, are introduced. They are, however, optional, for the composer considers the cantata complete without them. It commences with a brief choral recit. followed by a vigorous and tuneful chorus. A second one, in keeping with the words, is quieter in character, and possessed of a certain charm. The next number, which is smooth and flowing, opens with a theme for tenors in unison, afterwards taken up by the voices in harmony. After a graceful trio for female voices, comes a closing chorus of praise, bright and vigorous. The music is pleasing; but Dr. Garrett, with one exception, writes throughout in common time—and that exception is only a change to compound duple—so that there is not as much variety in the measure as one could wish. Even the hymn tunes are all in common time. The words have been selected and written by Dr. J. F. Waller.

In Loving Thee, by Dr. A. O. Mackenzie (Novello), is a short song of unpretentious character. The melody is graceful; and the accompaniment, with its clever harmonic touches and rhythmic changes, adds to its charm. It would need a good singer to do it justice. The words are by the Rev. J. Troutbeck.

Album for Violin and Pianoforte, No. 16. (Novello.) This is a set of twelve characteristic pieces by J. J. Haakman. They are all short, and of moderate difficulty. No. 1, "Oriental Song," is quaint and graceful; No. 4, "Pastoral," has a taking melody, and an interesting accompaniment; No. 5, "L'Onde," is clever and effective—it is in form a canon, and the double pedal throughout has a weird effect; No. 8, "Chant du Soir," is soft and soothing; and there is vigour about the "Patriotic Hymn," No. 12. We have singled out the numbers which attract us most; but all are good. These musicianly but modest pieces will, it is hoped, meet with the appreciation they deserve.

Six Trios for female voices. By Oliver King. Op. 42. (Novello.) No. 1, "May Day," in waltz time, is light and graceful. No. 3, "Sing, sweet birds," again in dance measure, is tuneful and Donizetti-like in the flow of its melody. No. 4, "Ebb and Flow," has music of pleasing character, and is effectively arranged for the voices. It may be noticed that all the six numbers are in 3-4 time, and that their rhythm is very similar. They would, therefore, prove monotonous if sung one after the other.

Love's Philosophy, a two-part song, by Martin Roeder (Novello), is well written, though a trifle commonplace for Shelley's dainty little poem.

A Lament and Night Song, also for two voices, by the same composer (Novello), are far more engaging. In the former Shelley's lines are set to expressive music; and the accompaniment, with its well-chosen harmonies and independent character, enhances the general effect. One passage in this song seems inspired by a Chopin prelude.

The Night Song, words by J. Russell Lowell (Novello), is also interesting. The accompaniment has much charm.

The Flowers' Review and Evening Song, two four-part songs, by Franz Abt (Novello), are both written in the smooth and flowing style which distinguishes that composer's music.

Remember now thy Creator and Cast thy Bread upon the Waters, by W. S. Bennett (Novello), for female voices, show the hand of a master. They are skilfully written, and yet simple.

The Torrent and I know a Glade, two trios for female voices, by A. W. Marchant (Novello), are light and pleasing, though somewhat conventional.

In the Hayfields, trio for female voices, by Ciro Pinsuti (Novello), is in the composer's usual graceful and florid style.

Ten Love Songs. By E. Allon. Op. 13. (London Music Publishing Company.) The words of these songs are by modern poets. The opening line—

"What way men have not loved you and shall I find out to love?"

—in A. R. Ropes's "Petition" is peculiar. With regard to the musical settings we find, as may naturally be expected, inequality. Some, such as "Rondel," "Could I be young," are smooth and flowing, but little more. In others, such as "Petition," "Homage," the melody is not particularly interesting, and the accompaniment rather monotonous. But in the "Legend of Is," "Unheeded," and "Where true love dwells," we find charm, delicacy, and, above all, pleasing variety of rhythm. They are three exceedingly attractive songs.

The Sea hath its Pearls and A Storm Wind. By R. E. Bryson. (London Music Publishing Company.) A good deal of musical feeling is shown in these two songs. The accompaniment of the first is rather stiff; but that of the second, though simple, is effective.

The Lord is my Shepherd: Anthem, by H. B. Osmond (London Music Publishing Co.) contains much good and effective writing. Particularly would we note the baritone solo, "Yea, though I walk," and the concluding fugue, "And I will dwell."

Six Four-part Songs, by S. C. Cook (London Music Publishing Co.), are well written for voices, and will be useful to choirs who want music pleasing and not difficult.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTE.

MESSRS. PATERSON & SONS, of Edinburgh, have made arrangements for a third series of subscription orchestral concerts next winter, to be again conducted by Mr. August Manns. Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's new choral Cantata, "The Cotter's Saturday Night," will be performed for the first time; and also a Cantata entitled "The Cameronian's Dream," which Mr. Hamish MacCunn is writing specially for the occasion. Both these composers will conduct their own works.

LITERATURE.

Remarks and Collections of Thomas Hearne.
Vol. III. Edited by C. E. Doble. (Printed for the Oxford Historical Society.)

THIS new volume of the diaries of the indefatigable antiquary at Oxford covers a period of about two years and a half, extending from the last days of May, 1710, to the middle of December, 1712. And they were in many respects the happiest years of his lifetime. It is true that the "Young King," under which loving title Hearne veiled the Old Pretender, was still in exile from his dominions, and that he was even compelled, as the diarist plaintively notes, to retire for a time from the court of St. Germain's; but the intruder from Brunswick had not yet seized on the throne, and the Whigs were no longer in possession of the seals of office. Moreover, there came, not infrequently, nights "when several of us were in company, all honest men;" and one of the band would assert, to the ready credence of his companions, that the Pretender was in England when Queen Anne was crowned, and that "the Queen kissed him at that time, he being present at the coronation." This was news indeed, and such as Hearne could joyfully note with the simple addition of the words, "This is a great secret." His labours, too, were receiving some slight recognition from the hands of those who had the smaller posts of the university to give away. In July, 1712, Dr. Hudson, who had not always been his friend,

"made the writer of these matters second keeper of the Bodleian Library, with liberty allowed him of being keeper of the anatomy schoole, or Bodleian repository, on purpose to advance the perquisites of the place, which are very inconsiderable."

In this congenial position Hearne quietly remained until the fatal day arrived when new oaths were imposed which his conscience would not allow him to take, and he was ejected from his situation. "New keys were made, and the lock of the library door was altered" to keep him from entering its doors again; and from that day Hearne dwelt an outcast from the institution which he loved with love as great as was ever felt by an Oxford don. The university dealt in those days but harshly with the students who were most active in exploring her past history. A chance passage in the Athenas Oxonienses subjected Anthony Wood to public ignominy; devotion to a dying cause forced poor Hearne to dwell apart from his beloved books in the Bodleian.

In one respect this volume differs from its predecessors. A far larger number of its pages are occupied with notes, partly topographical and partly historical, of the places around Oxford. It opens with a sheaf of notes concerning Littlemore Nunnery; there are animated narratives of excursions to Abingdon, "on purpose to view the antiquities there"; to Stonesfield, whither Hearne "walked over to view and review" its tessellated pavement; and to Hollywell manorhouse and the church which adjoins it. Hearne was one time at Stanton Harcourt taking copies of the monuments in the church, at another he visited the neighbourhood of Windsor and gossiped on the Roman way from Silchester to Henley. One antiquarian friend sent him transcripts of the epitaphs in Bisham Church to the memory of the family of Hoby, and Thomas Rawlinson communicated a dozen more partly taken from the chapels of the Inns of Court. From Kent he received particulars of the Roman remains in the Isle of Thanet. Nor did he shrink from inserting in his note books information on many other extraneous topics in which he was interested. He copies at length several documents respecting a distressed connexion of Sir Thomas Bodley, which the genealogists of Devon will do well to consult. He transcribes the inscription on the medal of brass in memory of John Lilburne's acquittal by the jury in 1649, and describes the head of the "fiery particle" as proving him to be "of a demure, puritanical, starch'd, invidious, and unsettled temper." The names of the brave men composing the jury are set out at length; and the inscription bears witness to their integrity, "who are juges of law, as well as fact"—words which sum up the claims of Erskine and the Whigs of more than a century later against the rulings of Mansfield and Buller in limitation of the jury's privilege.

The ferocity of political passion rages at its fiercest heat in Hearne's diaries. When Dolben, the archbishop's son, who took the leading place in Sacheverell's prosecution, died young, the party zealot jots down the fact with the comment "by which the hangman was sav'd a labour." Godolphin and Marlborough are driven from their places to the great joy "of all honest men." No facts in the former's life stand out more conspicuously than the disinterested spirit with which he held office for so many years, and the comparative poverty in which he quitted official life; but political animosity blinded Hearne into believing that Godolphin had made use of his opportunities to the "advance of his own secular fortunes." The character of Archbishop Tenison is assailed with equal fury. This worthy prelate is accused "of so mean a spirit that he lately, and perhaps does so still, puts the money of a certain school into his own pocket instead of letting it go to its proper use; and though he preaches up and often talks of charity, yet he has the least share of it almost of any man in England."

Mohun, the duellist, is dubbed, and not without reason (for if he had rivals in crime, he knew no superiors), "the greatest debauchee and bully of the age"; but it is difficult to believe on Hearne's authority that the Whigs appeared glad at the death of the Duke of Hamilton, and cried up Mohun for a saint. With no less fury does the prejudiced chronicler pursue his contemporaries in the academic life of Oxford. Take, for instance, the fellow of Brazenose (p. 21), to whom are tied the epithets of "white liver'd, sneaking, mean-spirited, and hypochondriacal"; or Dr. Whitby, on whom are saddled on the same page the adjectives of "a dull pretending heavy muddy-headed man," and an "injurious, Socinian, plagiarist, Whiggish, and conceited interpreter." Nor are these isolated instances of Hearne's opprobrious language on those who differed from him. It would not be difficult to discover as many instances as there are pages in this volume of unjust epithets applied to men eminent in the political world or of unblemished character in private life.

Hearne's references to the literary men of his age are full of amusement. Tickell, the translator of Homer, finds little mercy at the hands of the diarist. His election to a fellowship at Queen's College is noted under November 1710, with the emphatic statement that he was promoted over several of his seniors, "and such as were better scholars," and with the pleasing addition that "this Tickle [sic] is a pretender to poetry." In the same winter the newly elected fellow begins a course of lectures for Trapp, the professor of poetry, and the opening address on "The Nature and Laws of Bucolics" is dubbed "a very silly indiscreet performance." Time did not soften Hearne's harsh estimate, for in August 1711 the name of Tickell again comes to the surface as "a vain conceited coxcomb, and not able to write anything solid, nor indeed intelligibly." The death of Duke, another poetaster whose effusions are contained in Johnson's Poets, is entered in February 1711, as "he went to bed well and was found next morning dead in his bed"; but this forgotten versifier is lauded as "an ingenious man." The appearance of the Spectator is chronicled, and the accuracy of Hearne's information comes out in the remark that it was "written, as is suppos'd, by the same hand that writ the Tattler, viz., Captain Steel." The letter written from Oxford by one Abraham Froth is noted as a satire on Charlett, and the stir at the university over its appearance is summed-up in the sentence:

"Queen's people are angry at it, and the common room say there 'tis silly, dull stuff, and they are seconded by some that have been of the same college. But men that are indifferent commend it highly, as it deserves."

Several illustrations of current events are scattered through the volume. One college fellow died in September 1712

"of a rash and a feverett. I call it a feverett, it being a small fever that at this time goes all over England. It seizes suddenly and holds generally but three days."

The same malady is mentioned in the Wentworth Papers as "this new distemper call'd by Dr. Swift a feavouret."

The extracts which we have cited are a fair sample of the good things which abound in this new section of Hearne's note-books.

Angling Songs. By Thomas Tod Stoddart, with a Memoir by Anna M. Stoddart. (Blackwood.)

THAT Mr. Stoddart's life should be written is only natural. He was an accomplished angler, and (what frequently accompanies angling) an enthusiastic lover of poetry. Born in 1810, he was an intimate friend of the Wilson, of Aytoun, Hogg, Ferrier, "Delta," and Henry Glassford Bell, the last names in the literary supremacy of Edinburgh before the Muse fled south to the lake poets. Wordworth he never saw, and just missed dining with Sir Walter at the Ettrick Shepherd's house, owing to excessive devotion to the river-side. The great novelist, as it happened, was that night at his best; and deep was Stoddart's mortification ever after that he had missed such a treat. Tweed and Teviot he loved passionately through life, knowing every inch of their course, almost every pebble and flower along their banks. In a district where all are fishermen, he was universally acknowledged the chief. Numerous were the friends with whom he was thus brought into contact. Indeed, poetry, friendship, and fly-fishing satisfied Stoddart's ambitions. Late in life he criticised for six years the last of these topics in the ACADEMY.

"My life," he wrote a few weeks before he died, "has abounded in happy passages. I have been blessed with a joyous and loving wife, attached children, many genial friends, many endearing associations and delights, also a competent income, so far as my wants in that direction extend. What more can a man desire?"

There could not be much to chronicle in such an Arcadian life. Time was measured for Stoddart by emotions and sensibilities rather than by events. The Stoddarts (præ Stoutharts) had long been settled in Liddesdale and Ettrick, so that love of the Borders and of the free wild life which could there be led was hereditary with Thomas Stoddart. His father attained the rank of vice-admiral late in life. As a young officer he had seen much service afloat and was a stern disciplinarian, not much in sympathy, we gather, with the tastes of his son. The latter, first at the High School then at the University, acquired a strong love for the "romantic town." Educated for the law, he much preferred rambling over the hills and dales of the Highlands, and thus gradually acquired that intimate knowledge of every river and burn which is turned to good use in his Angler's Companion. On one of these excursions he made his way by Strathpeffer to the farmhouse of Contin, where he met his future wife, then a girl only able to speak Gaelic. Lovemaking was carried on under difficulties, as the young Sassenach was entirely ignorant of that language, and Miss Macgregor's father, as their medium, could not well understand his guest's compliments. However, the maiden was sent to school at Inverness, and in due time Stoddart married and settled down at Kelso in the centre of a district full of natural beauties and legendary lore. Here the rest of his life was passed in writing and fishing, in almost uninterrupted domestic peace, until death came gently and with kindly hand in 1880. Latterly, the old angler solaced his weakness by the culture of roses or by a day's visit to Yarrow instead of the annual stay which he made there of old. The record of the first trout which he caught as a boy in Cockle Mill Burn may be matched with that of his last salmon which he took in the Tweed in 1879. Some readers will remember the touching passage in Mrs. Gordon's life of her father, John Wilson, whose friendship was so valued by Stoddart. The old man sat up on his bed, asked for his fly-book, took out the flies which had so long been dear to him, tenderly smoothed and replaced them, and soon after died. With something of the same fond retrospect Stoddart never failed, as long as his limbs could bear him, to walk day by day to Kelso Bridge and look down on the river where he had so often fished and whose beauty he had enthusiastically sung. He was laid in Kelso Cemetery, in a spot which he had chosen, "where I can hear the Tweed," as he said.

Little remains to be said of so uneventful a life. Miss Stoddart has written it with much filial devotion and in a pleasant style, not altogether suppressing blemishes and failings, and thereby giving readers a more vivid impression of her father. Earnest, vigorous, impassioned in all he said or did, we hear of his quarrel with a water-bailiff, which led to an action, decided, however, in his favour. This eagerness seems at times to have passed into irascibility, which was soon spent. No man possessed a warmer heart, or made and kept more friends. His hastiness again emerges in his antipathy to the clergy; and one or two little circumstances mentioned in the memoir show that his mind was deficient in a certain reverence which most reflective men, certainly most reflective old men, have generally possessed. But Stoddart was a sterling character, and we are thankful to his daughter for giving us his portrait to hang among the many Border celebrities who are enshrined in literature.

Without question his Angler's Companion is an admirable manual to the fishing of Scotland. Partly from having long been out of print, partly from its not marking an epoch in angling, as did Stewart's Practical Angler published ten years after it, the Companion is not now so well known as it might be. Whatever Stoddart wrote was written from an ample experience. Our knowledge of the Salmonidae, however, has largely developed even since his death. His longer poetical works depended too much upon the supernatural and the unexpected to suit the ear of a generation turning with greater affection to the homely realities of Tennyson and the dainty fashion in which he deals with romanticism. Most of Stoddart's angling songs were written before he was twenty-five, and a selection of them accompanies this memoir. They suffer naturally from harping on one string. The love of nature manifested in them is extreme, and yet their wording is at times too artificial. In reading them every now and then a sigh escapes for the rugged simplicity of Roxby and Doubleday; for a fishing song, if not simple and natural, does not long maintain its sway in an angler's heart. "The Taking of the Salmon," however, is full of fire and spirit, while much sweetness comes out in "O waken, winds, waken!" if one prosaic line be excepted—

"Calm-bound is the form of the water-bird fair."

"The Yellow Fins of Yarrow" is a fitting contribution to the sad loveliness that overhangs that sweet stream. Much of Stoddart's fancy is lavished—and worthily lavished—on the Tweed, although he feels

"The soft sough o' a slender wand
Is meekest music for the Tweed."

In another poem the artificiality mentioned above spoils such a verse on this river as

"Dearer the streamlets, one and all,
That blend with its Eolian brawl
Their own enamouring voices."

A certain conventionality and lack of freedom, both in thought and expression, besets most of the sonnets here given. Thus, after speaking of the Conon gliding on, while hills enclose the quiet lake, the poet adds:

"At length, this soft repose—
The Syren bosom of the pastoral deeps
It rudely spurns, and with terrific leaps
Descends into the valley."

A similar awkwardness defaces the first few lines of a sonnet on the Findhorn. It will be long, however, before Border minstrelsy suffers Stoddart's verse to die; and we are glad, in the name of all anglers, to give it a cordial welcome. A generous appreciation of poetry is best shown by not ignoring its blemishes, or at the same time suppressing how the vigorous lines, and every here and there the tenderness of the poet's diction, wake deeper feelings and charm far-reaching memory. Want of space prevents us from noticing the many interesting passages on Scotland and her recent worthies which will be found in this book.

M. G. WATKINS.

Celtic Ireland. By Sophie Bryant. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

OF Mrs. Bryant's Celtic Ireland, I say at once, seldom has a book given me such unmixed pleasure. Not because the writer brings her political views to the front; she does nothing of the kind. With a woman's oneness of aim, she holds steadily before her the purpose of her inquiry: "What manner of people were the ancient Irish, and how have they, with an infusion of other races, developed into the modern Irish nation?" No; why I delight in her book is because, while she keeps close to facts, she shows such intelligent sympathy with her subject that, were she the veriest Unionist, she would command from every Irish Nationalist a grateful hearing.

There are two ways of telling historical truths. Mr. Froude, in everything he has written about Ireland and the Irish, adopts one. His English in Ireland is (like his Two Chiefs of Dunboy) full of truths, the most unpalatable, about English folly and misgovernment. About this he never minces matters; and yet somehow he manages to leave the impression that it is all the fault of the Irish. This "people of God's wrath" (as the Cromwellian Proclamation called them) contrived by wicked sorcery again and again to change the "imperial race" into a set of imbeciles. Like Demiurgus, handicapped by the imperfection of matter, the ablest English statesmen had to do what they could (and very bad indeed Mr. Froude proves it to have been) with the stuff that was at hand. You rise from his array of truths with the feeling that a people with whom even England failed so signally must "be gifted with a double dose of original sin." After reading Mrs. Bryant you see that the fault is not with the Irish people; that a much better hand might have been made of them had not their old home-developed civilisation (a reality, not a dream) been rudely checked at a critical moment.

The point at issue between Mr. Froude (with his unhappily large following) and Mrs. Bryant is just the question with which she begins her book: "What manner of people were the old Irish?" "Semi-savages," says Mr. Froude, "with no culture, save a little music." "Hypogorillaceous Celts with only a few grotesque saints," echoes the strong-voiced Canon Kingsley. "To them the Normans, apostles of Force, brought the blessings of civilisation which a stream of English 'undertakers' has gone on transmitting ever since." This error is, as Mrs. Bryant instinctively felt, not only widespread, but capital. Her whole volume is devoted to combating it, and the most prejudiced cannot question her success. Point after point she proves thoroughly, yet without pedantry. She has assimilated, as well as read her books (and her bibliography leaves little to be desired, including books like Prof. Rhys's Hibbert Lectures on Celtic Heathendom); and, with scarcely a footnote, she makes us feel that she has earned the right to speak with authority. The "semi-savages" theory, in fact, has no historical basis whatsoever. The English Baeda sufficiently confutes what is simply the expression of angry disappointment. The Welsh and Scotch, too, were, from the same cause, sadly misrepresented; but, for reasons so well set forth by Mr. Lecky, England soon changed her way of looking at them. Their national peculiarities, affected by a native aristocracy, became even fashionable. The Irish she has uniformly snubbed since Henry II. took over Giraldus to traduce them. The fact is they are a puzzle to England. They have outlived even Elizabeth's "Desolations of Munster"; they are a main factor in the population of America and Australia; and yet they cannot become English, which to many Englishmen means that they are incorrigible savages at bottom.

"No," says Mrs. Bryant; "it means that they, being not a residuum driven westward by abler tribes, but the foremost waves of the great human drift, the most adventurous, high-spirited, curious, imaginative . . . have preserved the consciousness of a home-grown culture, from which they were wrenched away, and to which, under happier conditions, they may hope to revert."

This all-important question has, as I began by saying, nothing to do with party-politics. Even if Home Rule had never come to the front, it would be well (for it would be helpful in rightly dealing with Ireland and the Irish) to settle which is true: were they half savages who owe almost everything to the English connexion? or has that connexion been so ill-arranged as to uncivilise, as well as to demoralise, them? As Mrs. Bryant says, this question all Englishmen are to-day called on to understand, and in part to answer; and she certainly, by putting forth in a very readable form the result of much careful study, does all that one writer can to enable her readers to understand it. Her division of the subject is judicious. On Irish ethnology she summarises, without dogmatising, the latest dicta of those best qualified to speak. Doubtless she is right in assuming a basis of truth under the florid superstructure of quasi-historical legend. We, who were brought up upon the since partly exploded Niebuhr, are apt to grow impatient, and to reflect that, for instance, the whole list of Pictish kings and their doings has been pronounced pure invention. But the consistency of Irish tradition and its persistence, and the support it receives from the vast mass of tales and poems—every one of which, as they are slowly brought out and translated, confirms some point of historical genealogy—place Irish legend on a very different basis. Mrs. Bryant's ethnology I will not pretend to criticise. She would identify the "aboriginal Iberian settlement" (Prof. Huxley's "dark little Basques" in his old controversy with "A Devonshire Man") not with the Firbolg, the earliest of the three main waves of legendary immigration, but with one of the still earlier and yet more shadowy races, the Firbolg being, according to her, "Celts who had on their way partly absorbed the aboriginal element" (p. 23), thereby getting the dark hair with which the old uncomplimentary description preserved in MacFibbis credits them. What makes her anxious to include the Firbolg among Celts is "the early bardic fiction that all the men of Erin were of one race," and the fact that not only did the latest wave (the Milidh, "Milesians") bury in the sepulchres of their predecessors the Danaan, and reverence their deified heroes (Aengus of the Brugh, for instance), but that they also worshipped at least one Firbolg king, MacErc (p. 97), and held the great games at Taillten (Telltown) in honour of his queen. Again, Mrs. Bryant thinks the cliff-castles, so common on the west coast (many of them described, with the late Lord Dunraven's photographs, in Miss Stokes's Notes on Irish Architecture), help to prove "that the Milesians landed from the south." On this I will not venture to pronounce. I will only point out that Worle Hill, by Weston-super-Mare, was a British cliff-village fenced on the land side with a triple earthwork. A like but far grander work fences off the "Logan" peninsula; while Maen (stone) castle, not far from Land's End, Kenidjack Castle, east of Cape Cornwall, and many more on the west Cornish coast, differ only from the Irish cathairs (caers) in being less elaborate. Local antiquaries have called these Cornish castles Danish, the difficulty being that even a Viking would find landing impossible for about half the year. Once more, I might ask a score of questions about her map. Why she writes Ulla for Uladh (Dalriada for Dal-Araide is sanctioned by usage), and Lahan for Laighen? Why Merville for Magh-bile (the plain of the old tree)? And is not Swords written Suird in the Chronicon Scotorum, under date 1021? But had I the right I have not the will to narrowly question small details. I will only remark, on the vexed question of races, that St. Patrick marks out two classes of Irish—the Hibernians, who came over to him in thousands; the Scots, out of whom he was glad to reckon his converts by twos and threes.

The main points (and these Mrs. Bryant proves) are, first, that the Normans have failed to bring over English, or Welsh, or Scotch, or Irish to their Gospel of Force. Her remarks on this are so eloquent and so apposite that I wish I could quote the whole passage:

"The Gael of Ireland believed so little in the Norman god of conquest that he did not realise what a terrible thing the rod of iron is. He had at last in his own manner broken the Danish rod. So he let the Norman settle in his midst; and probably it did not seem unreasonable to him that the king of England, being the greatest king in those parts, should claim the over-lordship, especially as he was recommended by the Pope. But he kept up his own ways of thought and feeling" (p. 51).

This is excellently put, though I take exception to what follows: "Each generation became more Irish than the Irish themselves." That mischievous half-truth which has saddled us Irish with all the vices of the drunken squires and squireens of a century ago is eminently untrue of at least two waves of invaders. They have remained "an army of occupation." Her other point is the culture of the old Irish. In art she has an easy task. There is the evidence of the remains; and though the Danish wars sadly damaged their "egg-shell civilisation," the Irish actually progressed in art during that wild time. The date of St. Inisgaltra is 1016, "two years after Clontarf, fifty years before romanesque was first used in England" (p. 198). Cormac's chapel was rebuilt in 1127. The cross of Cong, the last considerable bit of metal work wrought in Irish style by Irish hands, is dated 1123. Of native law, another branch of culture, the sanctions were necessarily weakened by the ruthless way in which the owners of the Pale dealt with "the Irish enemy." That any reverence for law lasted on, that Sir John Davies could, after centuries of demoralising inroads, "dare affirm that for five years past there has not been so many malefactors worthy of death in all the thirty-two shires of this realm as in the circuit of six shires in England," proves what he goes on to say, "that no nation doth love indifferent justice better than the Irish." Recriminations are idle, comparisons useless; but I remember Hepworth Dixon's picture of the state of Denver city—what the "imperial race" had come to in less than a generation of lawlessness. Mrs. Bryant's chapter on the Brehon, as it is the most elaborate, so it will be, for those who do not know Sir H. S. Maine, the most valuable in the book. The fitness of the Irish of to-day for Home Rule may, to some extent, be judged from the social and political system that they had developed. And this the Encyclopædia Britannica (under "Brehon") admits was considerably superior to the contemporary continental systems. Add to this that it is impossible to understand the Irish view of the land question without some knowledge of that code, which, though Jacobean lawyers ignorantly thrust it aside, is still ground into the very hearts of the peasantry. "The idea of a judicial rent is as old in Ireland as the institution of rent," says Mrs. Bryant (p. 144). And the idea of rack-rent too; for, though the tribesman's rent was fixed by custom, the daor fuidir (base stranger, often prisoner of war) had no rights against the chief, beyond the claim to protection.

"The effect of English law, therefore, leaving the tenants to supply and demand and the lord's goodwill and public opinion, was exactly the same as turning the Irish people into strangers or prisoners of war on their own land by destroying the whole class of peasants with rights in the soil. Nay the fuidir was markedly better off than the modern tenant in this, that his position was probationary. After two generations he became free, after three he rose to be a bodach, and so on" (p. 149).

But Mrs. Bryant does not limit herself to the Brehon land system: she goes through the whole code; and those who note the graduated series of assemblies, from the Mithal Flatha (assembly of tenants) upwards, will feel sure that the old instinct of the people will not fail them when the great change comes. Among many suggestive remarks, I was struck with one, the influence of "fostering" on "that race-fusion which has left the deep and abiding sense of a common racial character between persons not of the same race" (p. 149).

But, if I have succeeded in speaking as I feel, I have said enough to convince the most sceptical, not only that Mrs. Bryant is worth everybody's reading, but that she ought to be read as a duty by all who have hitherto held that mischievous "semi-savage" theory.

HENRY STUART FAGAN.

"ENGLISH MEN OF ACTION."—William Dampier. By W. Clark Russell. (Macmillan.)

CAPTAIN DAMPIER's life was a stirring one in its way; but there is no greater importance about it, no more adventure, no more success, no more—rather less—tincture of heroism about it than about the lives of a dozen of the mercenary, ruffianly sea-going adventurers of his day—pitiful, piratical scoundrels for the most part, over whom time and poetry have cast a romantic glamour. Dampier, indeed, was a brave man enough, as a burglar is brave; stubborn enough in fight, when running away was not a safer course; and neither more nor less cruel than the rest of the buccaneering fraternity who surprised and sacked defenceless towns, set peaceful homesteads in flames, and shed the blood of innocent men, women, and children with no higher motive than a brutal hunger for pieces of eight, and a ruffian's delight in what the Spaniards of his own day called el gusto de matar—the sheer lust of slaughter.

His sole distinction among as arrant a band of knaves as ever deserved hanging is that, having a good deal to say, he alone of all of them had hit upon the art of saying it plainly, to the purpose, vividly, with a masterly lucidity. The rough, low-born seaman was a close observer of every little material circumstance that interests mankind—the looks and ways of savage men; the forms and the habits of strange beasts, birds, and fishes of unvisited regions; the curious aspects of nature in far-off countries; the tides, the winds, the currents; the trees and the plants and the shells by the shore of tropic seas; and all the hindering chances, all the hopes, perils, and delays of ancient seamanship. All this he could record, not as other close observers, as a rule, record, with insufferable diffuseness and iteration, but with an artist's regard to the selection of essentials, and in the best, homely, mother English. He was the first describer of such things and events as these who put aside the pedantry and affectations of the learned man, and had his say in his own unadorned, unabated vulgar tongue.

Hardly one in a thousand educated Englishmen of to-day has so much as dipped into Dampier's narrative of his voyages; and it is, perhaps, no loss to the general reader that he has not, for, to all intents and purposes, Dampier's style—his only merit—lives in the pages of Defoe and of Swift. It has been bettered in Robinson Crusoe, and made imperishable by the genius of Swift in the ease and lucid strength of Gulliver's Travels. It is no idle surmise that had there been no Dampier these two masterpieces would never have been written. This is the best apology for the Life of this old sea marauder; and the writing of it could not have come into better hands than the eminent-seaman-author who is his present biographer.

Mr. Clarke Russell's opening chapter, wherein he discourses of the life led by the buccaneers and of their lawless ways and nature, is worthy of this old first master of strong and homely English. In an age when the rhetoric of written prose is somewhat overlooked as a motive power, this chapter deserves attention for its phrasing, that could not easily be bettered.

"In these days," Mr. Russell observes, "one is so used to the facilities of science for traversing the deep with swiftness and certainty that it is necessary to bend the mind with some severity of thought to compass the difficulties of the old sailors, and honour their triumph justly."

No living author could describe these difficulties of seamanship with such fullness of knowledge and such lucidity as Mr. Clark Russell.

It was unavoidable to fill the main portion of the book with an abstract of the narrative of Dampier's wanderings and faring by the way. It makes not very lively reading, for it is always dangerous to abbreviate a masterpiece; but perhaps there was no other way of making up the biography, and the popular taste, no doubt, desires a record of action rather than a criticism of style. The volume is adorned with a characteristic portrait of the old buccaneer—a sour-visaged, villainous-eyed, hang-dog looking fellow, who might, on the authority of the limner, step on to the boards of any London theatre to-night in the character of first villain.

OSWALD CRAWFORD.

A NEW EDITION OF THE ITALIAN WORKS OF BRUNO.

Le Opere Italiane di Giordano Bruno. Ristampate da Paolo de Lagarde. In 2 vols. (Göttingen: Dieterichsche Universitätsbuchhandlung.)

THE Bruno celebration at Rome which aroused the susceptibilities of the Vatican last June, following on that at Nola in 1887, and attended by various minor glorifications of their martyred hero by Italians in foreign countries, has had, as was reasonable, its literary outcome. This is as it should be. Bruno's fame, however much it may be accentuated by his cruel martyrdom, is primarily due to his writings. The erection, therefore, of statues and other such memorials, however natural and pleasing, could hardly be said to satisfy the demands of a Bruno resuscitation unaccompanied by improved editions of his works. Indeed, the ignorance even of his own countrymen on the subject of Bruno's teachings is nothing less than stupendous, and can only be justified partially by the rarity of his original works, and the miserable inadequacy of the two collections of them by Gfrörer and Wagner. Prof. de Lagarde, the editor of the improved collection we are now considering, tells us that when he was at Rome in 1885 in the stir of the Bruno enthusiasm, when the walls were placarded in every direction with appeals for contributions to the Bruno memorial, he amused himself by distinguishing among the names of the promoters men who he knew had not read a line of Bruno's writings. Among the many readers of these mural appeals he could not discover a single instance of an acquaintance with Bruno. He does not tell us whether his instrument was the Socratic elenchus or a Diogenes lantern. Probably it was the latter, for he proceeds to stigmatise this ungrounded enthusiasm as unworthy, giving as a reason that "a man must know adequately what rouses his enthusiasm." One hardly knows how to accept a principle which, however just in theory, is wholly unsupported by the practice of sequacious human crowds. The professor must know, one would suppose, that human enthusiasm, so far from being necessarily based upon an adequate knowledge of its object, often exists in the inverse ratio of such knowledge.

But if, as I think, this prevailing ignorance of Bruno is to be ascribed to the unworthy condition of his writings up to the present time, it is likely soon to be fully and finally dissipated. The admirers of Giordano Bruno of the present day stand on a far better footing than those whose admiration and study of him commenced a quarter of a century ago. There is now no lack of well-edited, trustworthy editions of his writings. First and foremost stands what may be called the national edition of Bruno's works, of which, up to the present time, three volumes are completed. This commences with the Latin works, though it is designed to include also the Italian. Meanwhile appears the edition of the Italian works at the head of this review—an edition which, so far as the text goes, leaves nothing to be desired. This has since been followed by Prof. Tocco's edition of the Latin works, which is likely, as including a translation into Italian, to become the popular edition of those writings for Bruno's own countrymen.

Limiting my remarks to the Italian works, every student of Bruno knows that the only collected edition of them up to the present time is that of Wagner, published so far back as 1830. What an unspeakable boon this edition conferred on Bruno students may be estimated by those who have watched the prices of Bruno's original works in the great book sales of modern times—e.g., in the Sunderland sale. So far back as 1711 a copy of the Spaccio realised £28 (the Sunderland copy fetched £25), while only last year a copy of the Heroici Furori was sold for 1350 francs. Owing to the extreme rarity of Bruno originals it is doubtful if a complete set of all Bruno's works exists in any library in Europe. The collection in the British Museum seems to be among the most perfect.

Students of Bruno, therefore, owe an unutterable debt of gratitude to Gfrörer and Wagner for their respective collections of the Latin and Italian works, though in both cases the collecting, editing, and literary supervising were exceedingly unsatisfactory. But it is ill speaking of the bridge that has carried us over. The present writer, in company doubtless with many other Bruno students, owes to those collected editions whatever knowledge of Bruno's teachings from their original sources he can claim to possess.

The defects of Wagner's collection of the Italian works have long been known to Bruno scholars. They are both positive and negative. Partly by ignorance, partly by carelessness, Wagner took upon him to alter his author's text to an extent which even the lax notions of editing current half a century ago cannot extenuate. His probable motive was to make his author more comprehensible by modernising him. For this he altered Bruno's spelling, his grammar, his phraseology, in a manner which demonstrates his own imperfect knowledge of the Italian of Bruno's time, and which made it impossible, as Prof. de Lagarde pertinently remarks, for students to discover how extremely important Bruno's writings are for the historical evolution of the Italian language. Nor did Wagner limit his emendations (?) to actual alterations of the text. He left out words, phrases, sentences which he could not understand, or which seemed to conflict with his own conception of propriety or linguistic usage.

In this new edition of Bruno's Italian works Prof. de Lagarde has carefully gone over Wagner's ground. With a practice in textual recension such as few European scholars can boast, and with the untiring industry which is an indispensable qualification for such labour, he has compared the Italian works of Bruno with their originals, and has given the results in a new and revised text, which has wholly superseded that of Wagner, and which must be considered for the present, if not also for all future time, as complete and definitive. The only improvement which can now be suggested is one which transcends the limit of mere textual accuracy. The general reader still requires an annotated edition of Bruno which will contain explanations, not only of archaic words and phrases, but also of allusions, references to contemporary opinions, and little known authors, &c., with which Bruno's writings abound. It is to be hoped that when the national edition of the Italian works appears this desideratum may be supplied.

But while all Bruno students will, I am sure, readily admit their debt of gratitude to Prof. de Lagarde for this handsome and well-printed edition of their master's Italian works, they will receive with due caution the remarks on his teaching, with which he concludes his textual labours. Perhaps our gratitude for his attention to Bruno ought to be the greater, inasmuch as it was wholly unexpected. Prof. de Lagarde has won his laurels in a very different field from that of the free-thinking literature of the Italian Renaissance—viz., in that of biblical and ecclesiastical archaeology; though it is instructive to observe how his attainments in this wholly diverse department of knowledge are made to throw light on the text of Giordano Bruno (see p. 775). It must not then stir our surprise, still less our ire, to find that he departs from the high general estimate which many centuries and many eminent thinkers have agreed to place on Bruno's teachings. As a consistent Romanist, he finds "more knowledge and research in the writings of Albert the Great and in the Summa contra Gentiles of Aquinas than in Bruno" (p. 790). The remark may be capable of justification so far as the accumulation of scientific facts and truths is concerned; but, as any student of him knows, it is not for these that Bruno is or ever was valued. It is for the spirit which prompted and animated his teaching, for his clear luminous far-reaching inferences from scientific truths, for his insight into the contrast between the teachings of science and the perverted dogmas of Romanism, for his single-hearted devotion to truth and nature, for which his works will always be treasured. Bruno is less a collector and arranger of the scientific facts of the sixteenth century than a prophet of science for all time. Had he been more of the scientific plodder which Prof. de Lagarde seems to have thought he was, his influence as a source of inspiration would have been less. There are a few remarks besides which I should have liked to have made by way of reply to similar attempts of the professor to depreciate Bruno; but I am restrained, partly by gratitude for his invaluable boon to Bruno students, partly by the fact that on such a subject we do not occupy common ground.

JOHN OWEN.

Three Lectures on English Literature. By William S. McCormick. (Paisley: Alexander Gardner.)

THESE lectures have already served the purpose for which they were composed, and admirably, too, I should imagine. They are clear in thought, vigorous in expression, ardent in conviction—precisely the sort of exposition to set youthful intellects aglow.

Addressed to the literature class in Queen Margaret College, Glasgow, Mr. McCormick's protest against Prof. Freeman's contention that philology should take the place of the study of literature in the university curriculum was, perhaps, none the less effective on account of its occasional over-emphasis, or of its personal warmth of argument. There was no danger that his fair audience might detect even a suspicion of pretentiousness in the enthusiasm of the lecturer as he dealt with the dangers of dilettantism and pedantry. Some of them may have blushed for the iniquity of their mothers in troubling themselves so little with educational questions; but probably all were delighted with the thrilling audacity of the rapier-play in the following passage:

"It does not seem to occur to Professor Freeman that there may be a higher and a lower, a true and a false standard of taste; that education is possible as well in taste as in facts; that perhaps Professor Freeman's own taste might be 'educated'; and that if he had had the advantage in his university course of what he contemns as a 'literary' training, he might now be able to scan some verses he at present fails to scan, and to follow the sense of writing, of which at present the meaning is, from him, carefully hidden."

The great majority of people, it seems to me, will be disposed to agree with Mr. McCormick rather than with Prof. Freeman as to the position of English literature. But surely it would not have been to the disadvantage of the students of Queen Margaret College had a more liberal acknowledgment been made of the value of philology; and Mr. McCormick's argument would certainly have lost none of its cogency had the personal element been eliminated when the lecture was sent to the printer. It will be generally conceded that one of the great evils of the critical spirit of our time is the tendency it fosters to read about literature in preference to reading literature; while the greatest evil of our educational system is the disposition to mistake technical and professional equipment for what may, perhaps a trifle too ostentatiously, be described as the organic development of character through the medium of the intellect. On both these matters Mr. McCormick writes with a force which should not be without profit.

The lectures on the poetry of Wordsworth and of Browning, which are considered "as parallel illustrations of the contemplative and the penetrative imagination of our century," were intended as introductory studies, and as such they may still fulfil a useful purpose. If neither can be regarded as exhaustive, they are each sufficiently wide in survey; and an occasional freshness and piquancy are afforded by the frankness with which the author asserts his opinion, even it may be in opposition to that of a critic of note. Insight is not wanting. Commenting for instance on the poem

"Three years she grew in sun and shower,"

Mr. McCormick keenly observes: "Those who are not thoroughgoing 'Wordsworthians' will recognise, it may be too acutely, the serious defect in even such a beautiful ideal as this—the lack in it of that other side of our nature—the social side"; though remembering the lines, which, indeed, are quoted on the next page—

"A creature not too bright and good For human nature's daily food"

—it seems super-subtle to note this defect as "the result of Wordsworth's character of half-ascetic solitariness." So, too, it would appear that individual taste must determine whether "any evident qualities his poetry possesses are at first rather repellent than attractive"; or whether there is "not a subject of his that is not at first view commonplace; not a phrase that at first hearing titillates our passing fancy by its cleverness or high-strung passion." In the study of Browning the points are more frequent on which differences of opinion may occur. One can conceive innumerable hot protests to Mr. McCormick's reservation that "The Ring and the Book" is a "masterpiece marred by the appearance of a Falstaff's 'ragged regiment' of quaint puerilities, ingeniously stupid conceits, and unfathomable nonsense." Still less beyond reach of challenge is the curious appréciation of "Pippa Passes": "It is built, not woven: the intermediate scenes are but mortar between the stones of a parti-coloured column. The Parts are essentially independent dramatic studies, bound together by a series of applications of a text." One is tempted to apply to Mr. McCormick the response which, with amusing bluntness, he applies on p. 87 to

Mr. Matthew Arnold: "Such a criticism betrays a misconception of the central idea of the" drama.

NEW NOVELS.

Miss Shafto. By W. E. Norris. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

The Fatal Phryne. By F. C. Philips and C. J. Wills. In 2 vols. (Sonnenschein.)

By the Western Sea. A Summer Idyll. By James Baker. (Longmans.)

Miss Kate. By Rita. (White.)

The Master of Rylands. By Mrs. G. Lewis Leeds. (Ward & Downey.)

Chronicles of a Health Resort. By A. Helder. (Fisher Unwin.)

What was It? By Fitzjames O'Brien. (Ward & Downey.)

MR. W. E. NORRIS'S new novel is as well-constructed, well-told, and enjoyable a story as any of its predecessors, though it is hardly so rich as one or two of them in that half-satirical but wholly genial humour which is one of the author's greatest charms. The quotable remarks by the way which enable the dullest critic to make his review readable are also less numerous than they are wont to be in the books of this charming writer; and Miss Shafto, therefore, will not provide quite so much material for the editor of the inevitable "Norris Birthday Book" as he will find stored between the covers of The Rogus and My Friend Jim. When, however, Mr. Norris does "drop into" reflection, he is as good as ever; witness the remark à propos of Mr. Shafto's visit to his old home:

"A king, when once he has abdicated, should not return to his former dominions; nor a vicar, who has accepted another living, to his former parish; nor a squire who has let his place to the estate upon which he has ceased to reside. It is sad (however much one may have been prepared for it) to find that things have deteriorated during one's absence; it is not perhaps quite so satisfactory as it ought to be to find that they have improved; so that, upon the whole, such reappearances can only be recommended to persons of large views and sweet temper."

Mr. Norris has been compared to Thackeray, but in the clause which I have italicised there is an allusive lightness of satirical touch which is very unlike the elaborateness of Thackeray's mordant passages; indeed, the comparison has never struck me as being in any respect specially happy or illuminating. If we are to adopt this not very profitable method of affiliating the living upon the dead, I should incline to speak of Mr. Norris as a member of the family of Anthony Trollope. Miss Travers, familiarly known as "Old Nell Travers," the very plain, and also very plain-spoken old maid, who utters what is in her mind with an appalling frankness, is one of the most original as well as one of the most delightful of the author's creations; but original as she is, we are again and again reminded of the broad, effective handling of the great artist—for such he certainly was—who painted the portrait of Miss Dunstable. The books of Mr. Norris are, however, mainly worth reading not because he recalls this or that distinguished predecessor, but because he has a charming manner of his own, which is rendered recognisable not by eccentricity or whim, but by wholesome artistic individuality; and one does not nowadays often read a fresher, brighter, cleverer book than Miss Shafto.

Mr. F. C. Philips and Mr. C. J. Wills are both writers of ability, but their several abilities do not seem to work well in combination; and each of them, working singly, has produced better books than the novel which is the result of their collaboration. The scene of The Fatal Phryne is laid in Paris, and the atmosphere is palpably Parisian; indeed, the authors have succeeded in writing a story which in feeling and handling is much more French than many of the stories which come to us from France. The book is a gratuitously unpleasant, indeed, positively painful, study of an emotion which may best be described as dog-in-the-mangerish jealousy. Dr. Tholozan, who has passed his sixty-first birthday, is a man distinguished in his profession. He is a lecturer at the Ecole de Medecine, he has a large practice, and is a frequent contributor to the medical journals. Dr. Tholozan lives in a house which has been bequeathed to him by his deceased brother, an amateur painter; and the large studio, which is a feature of the place, is occupied by a lodger, George Leigh—a promising English artist of the romantic school. To this house the doctor brings home a wife in the person of his young ward Hélène Montuy, whom he has married, not because he loves her or because he supposes that she does or will love him, but because he can thus most easily relieve himself of a little crowd of minor responsibilities. The probability that his wife and his lodger will be attracted to each other is recognised by him, but it seems to fascinate rather than to repel. It will be interesting to watch the progress of events; and he even endeavours to hurry it by throwing the two in each other's way, and by telling Hélène that such an attraction is "but natural." When, however, he knows that his prognostications have been verified, a savage, cruel jealousy is born within him, and he plots and executes a terrible revenge upon the man and the woman who, in the face of the great temptation which he has deliberately set before them, have striven to be true to him. Dr. Tholozan is simply a moral monster, and the only interest which can be felt in him is the morbid interest excited by the study of ethical pathology. The other characters possess little interest of any kind, though M^{me}. Pichon in her slight way is a capital portrait, and the book as a whole is by no means deficient in cleverness.

One does not expect much narrative substance in a book which is described by its author as "A Summer Idyll"; and, as a mere story, By the Western Sea could not well be slighter than it is. As, however, its slightness is not too long drawn out—the simple tale being begun and ended in one moderately sized volume—there is no unpleasant impression of attenuation; and the reader is compensated for the absence of quantity by the presence of very fair quality. The landscape background is naturally a little more prominent than usual, for the scene of the story—at any rate of the greater part of it—is laid on that North Devon coast where nature counts for so much; and the two principal masculine characters are the landscape painters, Brunskill and Lovatt, who, in their very different ways, are rival competitors for the love of Winifred Fausset. Brunskill is a well set-up man with a little cleverness, more cynicism, most conceit. Lovatt has been deformed by an accident, and is not much to look at; but he is a genius and has soul. With these qualifications it was almost unnecessary that he should save the heroine's life at the risk of his own. But it is never unwise to make assurance doubly sure; and the opportunity for distinguishing himself in the perilous adventure off the Ramsay Cliffs was one of those strokes of well-deserved luck which the happy novelist has always in his control. By the Western Sea is a pretty and pleasant story, though it is hardly a carping criticism to suggest that the cynical worldliness of Brunskill is a little overdone. The man who thought as he thought would for mere prudential reasons be as impressively silent as the well-known parrot.

"Rita's" new novel is, from a literary point of view, a quite impossible book. It is a story which purports to be told by a domestic servant who has risen or fallen—one must speak hesitatingly upon such points of precedence—to the position of a "caretaker"; and the imaginary narrator emphasises her lack of culture by obvious misspellings, which the printer's reader has not been allowed to correct, doubtless for the same modest reason which prompted Mrs. John Gilpin to enter the chaise at the corner of the street instead of at her own door. Unfortunately, however, the literary Jane, as she warms to her work, forgets her servitude and her humility. She spells with the proudest of us, and proves herself a mistress of that fearful and wonderful art of fine writing which the veritable "Rita" always has at her fingers' ends. The story which Jane has to tell is the kind of story which is dear to her tribe. Her heroine, who is taken from the Foundling Hospital and adopted by Mr. Vining, the retired tea-dealer, naturally turns out to be the daughter of a baronet; and when she marries a man old enough to be her father we know that the inevitable lover will soon put in an appearance. Rex Tresyllion is a name which cannot fail to find favour in the kitchen and the servants' hall; and the young gentleman to whom it belongs lives up to it, and even dies up to it, in the most approved fashion. When he is not philandering with Mrs. Cray, the novelist, he is philandering with Mrs. Carruthers, née Miss Kate; and when the sudden re-appearance of Mr. C., who has been supposed to be drowned, causes the collapse of an aneurism of his too susceptible heart, we part from him without regret. The book is, in truth, a very sentimental affair, but it contains some passages of true and unforced pathos.

The Master of Rylands may be commended to those readers who are prepared to find refreshment of sense and spirit in the story of a homicidal maniac who is in the custody and under the control of two other homicides who have not the excuse of mania. These worthies, mother and son, are about as revolting a pair of villains as one is likely to meet with even in the world of third-rate sensational fiction; but as they are not only revolting, but incredible, our flesh obstinately refuses to creep. The best parts of the story are the chapters which come before the horrors begin, and which are devoted to the humours of a minor watering-place, and to the sayings and doings of the selfish, superficial, scheming, and supremely silly young widow, Mrs. Langford, whose hard but not wholly undeserved fate it is to win for a second husband the above-mentioned maniac, who is nominally the master of Rylands, but whose ancestral home is really an unlicensed lunatic asylum in which he is the only patient. As for Stephen Levasson and Mrs. Carthew, they are bogeys of a very inferior type.

There is no need to say much about Mr. or Mrs. Helder's Chronicles of a Health Resort, which is one of Mr. Fisher Unwin's neat and handy "novel series" of reprints. It is a sketch rather than a novel, having no plot-structure to speak of; but it is much more readable than many books which are stronger in obvious narrative interest. The officers of the Royal Wessex regiment, which is stationed at Coddleham, perhaps resemble the tame cat a little too closely in their habits and manners to be accepted without reserve as portraits from real life. But the Pike girls and their mother, known in the regiment as the "Rag-a-muffins," are excellent; and the book is full of brightness and humour, with here and there a pretty and winning pathetic touch.

It is not often that we find in a volume belonging to the "shilling shocker" family such really good work as that which Mr. Fitzjames O'Brien has put into What was It? and its seven companion stories. The title-tale is based on a refreshingly blood-curdling conception of a mysterious something which is quite invisible, but which vindicates its vitality and tangibility by endeavouring to strangle the narrator in his bed. The central idea is not, I think, quite new, for I have a vague recollection of having seen something like it before; but connoisseurs in horrors will gratefully recognise the freshness of some of the gruesome details. "The Lost Room" is an equally successful piece of fantasy, and "The Golden Ingot" is an ingenious invention in which the author shows his power to produce a weird effect without having recourse to supernatural machinery. The weakest story is "My Wife's Tempter," the revelation of Hammond Brake as a commonplace Mormon missionary being a most disappointing anticlimax; but this is an exceptional lapse, and Mr. O'Brien's best work is not far behind that of his countryman Edgar Poe.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

SOME VERSE TRANSLATIONS.

The Love-Songs of Heinrich Heine. Englished by H. B. Briggs. (Trübner.) Although the dogma of the necessary inferiority of translation to original (in poetry) forms no part of our creed, we must in candour admit that a very large proportion of the translations offered to us are inferior to the originals. One very good reason for this lies very near the surface. The poems which attract translators are usually the works of the great writers; while the vast majority of their interpreters are not great writers. This is particularly the case where modern languages alone are concerned.

The—at any rate superficial—accessibility of the thought tempts a large number of unpractised and otherwise incompetent hands to attempt the work, with the natural result, now of imperfect expression, and now of misconception of meaning. The dainty little volume before us, which contains the Lyrische Intermezzo and the Heimkehr, minus the Prolog of the former and Nos. lxviii. and lxxx. of the latter, is no exception to the rule. Gifted with no supra-literal insight into his author's mind, and apparently not "well-up" in the circumstances amid which these essentially personal and temporal poems were written, Mr. Briggs at his best gives us only a feeble and sometimes distorted reflection of Heine, and what he gives us at his worst is mere nonsense. Mr. Briggs at his worst may be seen by anyone who cares to compare his version of the fiftieth poem of the Heimkehr with the original. As a specimen of his best the following (Lyr. Int., xlii.) may serve:

"Alone in our little bark,
Clinging so close were we,
And drifting along in the dark,
Far on the silent sea.

"The fair magic island lay
Dark in the moonbeam's glance,
And there to sweet music's sway
Circled the spirit-dance.

"And ever the magic strain
Sounded more plaintively, While we in our weary pain
Drifted along the sea."

This is pretty, and seems to ask to be set to music—and there is much of Mr. Briggs's work which approaches this quality; but it is scarcely Heine. The peculiar rhythm, which goes so near to constituting lyrical individuality, is gone; and the absence of any equivalent for the weite Wasserbahn of the first stanza, together with the rendering of Geister-Insel by "magic island" in the second, does away with much of the weirdness of the original, and quite abolishes the suggestion of an after-death voyage. Mr. Briggs is clearly not the heaven-sent interpreter of Heine to the English.

Selections from Schiller's Poems. Translated by E. P. Arnold-Forster. (Hamilton, Adams, & Co.) There is a touch of pathetic interest in this little book, as embodying what was probably the last literary advice given by Mr. Matthew Arnold. Within a week of his death, he advised his nephew, the translator, to add to his selection the poem of "Cassandra." The advice was taken, and the poem appears on pages 32-37. The translation, though it lacks the sonorous simplicity of the original, will be read with pleasure. Here is the last verse, "Und noch hallen ihre Worte," &c.:

"Still her doleful words were ringing
When a murmuring clamour spread,
From the distant temple springing:—
Thetis' mighty son lay dead!
Eris shakes her snake tresses,
All the gods in haste are gone,
And the angry storm-cloud presses
On devoted Ilion."

Perhaps the true test of a book like this would be the question—"Would a person ignorant of Schiller be much stimulated, by the translation, to make acquaintance with the original?" In a certain sense, we think that the answer would be favourable to Mr. Arnold-Forster. He has selected twenty of the best poems—we cannot say the best twenty, for he has omitted "The Complaint of Ceres"—and something of the vigour of Schiller appears in many places of his version. On the other hand, he cannot express, though we doubt not that he can admire, the imaginative force of Schiller. Take, for instance, the last verse of the hackneyed, yet ever beautiful, "Gods of Greece," from "Müssig kehrten zu dem Dichterlande" to "Muss im Leben untergehn." The original is like one long deep sigh "ueber die verlorne Schöne." How little of it reappears in—

"The gods depart in sorrowing token
That happy childhood is outgrown;
The leading strings at length are broken,
The ungrateful world can soar alone.
All lovely form with them was taken
To grace the home whence erst they came;
So was the world by Art forsaken,
The gods on Pindus' heights find leisure,
Untroubled by the tide of time;
And Fancy, crushed by life's stern pressure, Lives but in Poetry sublime."

Here, in the first two lines, the essential thought "zu dem Dichterlande" is wholly omitted. In the fourth, the "soaring" of the world is absolutely contrary to the tone of the poem. In the last four, the leisure of the gods on Pindus is Epicurean, not classical nor Schillerian; and the final thought is twisted round and loses half its force. But the "Veiled Picture at Sais," the somewhat difficult elegiac poem, "The Walk," and the "Song of the Bell" are rendered with spirit and appreciation. Here and there a harsh rhyme jars upon the ear—e.g., in "The Hostage" (p. 42), we find:

"He sees the towers of Syracuse;
When his faithful servant Philostratus," &c.; or an inelegant phrase, e.g., p. 106, "God has brushed away my fears." Nor do we see why (p. 4) the wife of Admetus should appear in English as Alceste; nor why the very marked change of metre at the close of "The Diver" should be ignored, and the finely-descriptive definition of the shark—

"Der ensatzliche Hai, des Meeres Hyäne" —should be melted into the commonplace of: "The shark, that ubiquitous scourge of the sea."

In a word, where Schiller is merely forcible, Mr. Arnold-Forster renders him very fairly; where he is delicate, imaginative, remote in his fancy, the translator fails to do him justice, as most of us would fail.

Schiller's "Maid of Orleans." The Prologue and first two Acts. Translated by Major-General Patrick Maxwell. (David Nutt.) The translator somewhat disarms criticism by speaking of his work as "a humble fragment." It is for its fragmentary character, not for its style, that we feel inclined to blame it. The original drama has a direct and forcible simplicity—a military quality, so to speak—which gives it a certain charm; but it has comparatively little high poetry in it. It deals too much in vigorous platitude, and may, perhaps, suit the stage better than it does the study. But the first half of it, isolated and sundered from its natural conclusion, is for the most part dull reading. The whole play, translated as these two acts are, would be interesting; but the two acts by themselves hardly repay perusal. The defect of the blank verse is the usual one—it is rhythmical, but extremely monotonous. The cadence is far too uniform; far too many verses are strings of monosyllables, e.g.:

"I can do nought but warn and pray for her."

"No man could tell the day nor yet the hour."

"And as I gave him birth I'd take his life."

Sometimes it varies into an unmetrical or perplexing form, e.g.:

"Yes, e'en the hardy boors of Westfriesland."

"Behold the Archbishop, who brings Dunols."

Nor will English readers easily reconcile themselves to the constant scansion of "Joan" as a dissyllable with the accent on the first half. This tramples on Shakspeare without reproducing Schiller. On the other hand, there is a good deal of spirit in the translation of Act II.,

So. ii., where Isabeau shows her true character. Is there authority for rendering—

"Ich kam als Königin
In dieser Land, zu leben, nicht zu scheinen"
by—

"I came as Queen
Into this land to live and not to pine"?

Is not "scheinen"—to be a show, i.e., a mere pageant of a queen? Here, as elsewhere, the translator seems inclined to substitute for Schiller's thought an inference from that thought. But this is the function of a reader, not of a translator. If it is undertaken by the latter, the former is apt to be misled.

The Ion of Euripides. Now first translated into English in its Original Metres. By H. B. L. (Williams & Norgate.) The preface to this translation will be interesting to musical and metrical connoisseurs. On p. 8, we think that the late Prof. Kennedy's version of the Agamemnon deserved a direct mention rather than mere inclusion in a reference. On p. 9, is not "the Hellenic republic" a somewhat misleading phrase? When, from p. xiv. to p. xxi., H. B. L. deals in literary criticism, he seems to us fantastic and lacking in sound judgment. He thinks, for instance, that Krcousa's idea that she was with child by Apollo finds a curious counterpart in the well-known illusion of Joanna Southcote, at the beginning of this century, that she was pregnant with the "second Shiloh." He is at pains to explain that Krcousa's tale about Apollo will not hold water. He talks in true Ruhmerist style of an "unattended damsel in a remote suburb [the Marpa are neither remote nor a suburb], a mid-day siesta, a swain with bright yellow hair," &c.; and actually adds that "similar incidents are described in Dumas' Mémoires d'un Médecin, Hope's Anastasis, Mery's Frère et Sœur, and Ducange's Il y a seize Ans." No doubt: they are the staple of many English and more French books; but what has all this unsavoury platitude to do with the Greek drama in general or the Ion in particular? To burrow into hypothetical origins of this sort for the human myth of Ion is a task which, whatever its value, has no bearing on the poetry or interest of the drama. The elaborate stage directions added to the translation are not without their interest, though they seem to us all too copious. As to the translation in the original metres, we think a more poetical sense and ear was required. The beautiful anapaests (ἄλλατα μὲν τάδε λαμπρὰ τεύχεα) appear here in this form:

"See, from on high, 'mid a lustre resplendent,
Héllos urge car four-hors'd to the earth!
See what a fire sends stars fro' the sky, in a flight, Nûx to rejoin!
Parnêso, on heads which we ne'er can a'proach,
With a glow from his wheels' bright glare is ablaze,
Ere men get a glimpse of a day's dawn.
Smyrneese resin up to the god's parâpêta
Puffs smoke in a cloud."

The iambic renderings are better than this, though often very prosy. Here is a specimen (p. 54, ll. 925, etc.):

"As I survey thy face, my heart with pity swells, My daughter dear! Alack, my brain begins to turn!
As some sea skiff, while stemming waves which shock the prow,
Is overwhelmed by billows rushing o'er the stern,
So we, while stag'ring 'neath Misfortune's heavy blow,
Are felled by news of grievous ills we knew not of!"

It appears to us that poetry cannot be represented fairly in another language by merely showing a facsimile of its form. We doubt if anyone who read this translation without a knowledge of the original could even imagine that the original was a fine play. The notes, though rather rough in form, are helpful. Why, in that on l. 100, does the ancient Lebadeia, the modern Livadia, appear in the hybrid form Libadia?

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. A. H. KEANE—who lately resigned his professorship of Hindustani in University College, London—will sail at the end of next week to America for a stay of two or three months' duration. He has been invited to deliver a lecture at Richmond on the negro question; and he will also visit Washington, in order to conclude arrangements with the board of regents of the Smithsonian Institution for the publication of a work on the races of mankind, for which he has been collecting materials for many years past. The aim of this work, of which a prospectus appeared in the ACADEMY of May 12, 1883, is to place in the hands of the ethnological student a comprehensive treatise on the races of mankind, harmonising with the present state of anthropological enquiry. It will be in three parts: (1) a general introduction, dealing with such questions as the antiquity of man, the criteria of race, and the evolution of language; (2) a classification of the human family under their great physical divisions; and (3) an alphabetical index of all known races, tribes, and languages. The Smithsonian Institution has undertaken to print and distribute 15,000 copies of the work.

SEVERAL German professors and other doctors have been at English work lately in the British Museum, and some of them are still—Prof. Schipper, Kluge, Brandl, Drs. Fischer, von Fleischhacker, Schirmer, &c.

DR. EDUARD JACOBS, librarian and keeper of the archives at Wernigerode to Count von Stolberg, is about to publish a careful biographical and historical sketch of Juliana Countess of Stolberg-Wernigerode (1506-1580). This lady was an ancestress of Queen Victoria, for by her marriage to William the Rich of Nassau-Dillenburg she became the mother of William, Prince of Orange (1533-1584), the great grandmother of Frederick V., Elector of the Palatinate, who married the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of King James I. of England, and the great great grandmother of Sophia, Duchess of Brunswick-Lüneberg (1630-1714). The present work, which was undertaken at the desire of the present Count von Stolberg, will embody the results of years of research among the original documents at Wernigerode and elsewhere, and will contain a considerable amount of information of interest to English readers. It will appear in the course of September, and will be published by Handel, of Halle-on-the-Saale, at 10s. in whole cloth.

THE success of the cheap edition of the more popular of Charles Kingsley's books has been so great that Messrs. Macmillan propose to add several more volumes. This week they have published Prose Idylls, which makes the twelfth and last volume of the series as originally projected. But they have now arranged for six more volumes, to appear monthly, which will contain The Roman and the Teuton, and the several collections of essays and lectures, historical, scientific, and literary. We venture to hope that they will be encouraged to add Glaurus; or, the Wonders of the Sea-Shore, if not also The Hermits, both of which can at present be obtained only in the six-shilling edition. There would then remain some half dozen or more volumes of sermons, which (with selections, &c.) make up the twenty-eight volumes of the collected edition of Kingsley's works.

LORD TOLLEMACHE, of Helmingham, has lent to Dr. Robert von Fleischhacker, for the use of the Early English Text Society, three more of his manuscripts: (1) The Lapidary (of which another copy is in Douce 191 at the Bodleian), which is preceded by Hampole's Pricke of Conscience; (2) Harding's Chronicle, with an unprinted poem at the end; (3) The book of Maumet. Lord Tollemache has also kindly promised to lend the society his MS. of Trevisa's "Bartholome on the Properties of Things," the Middle Age Cyclopaedia, for Dr. von Fleischhacker's new edition of the work, which has not been reproduced since Butman printed and added to it in Queen Elizabeth's time for Shakspeare and others' behoof. Dr. von Fleischhacker reports that Lord Tollemache's MS. "is really superb," and the best he has seen—an opinion which Dr. Furnivall confirms—but it is not in the wanted South-Western dialect. Its "are" is not "buth," but "beth" most often, and "ben" sometimes; and its forms are not consistent. If any of our readers knows of a "buth" MS. of this work, he is entreated to send notice of it to the Editor of the ACADEMY.

DR. FURNIVALL, who is spending his holiday close to Lichfield, has been collating the Cathedral Chaucer MS. for Prof. Zupitza, and the two Hampole MSS. for Dr. Bülbring, &c. He has also been working at the earliest wills in the registry; and has written some leaders in the Lichfield Mercury which have secured new editors for the Early English Text Society, started an "Antiquarian and Local Notes and Queries" in that paper, and promoted the formation of one or two Shakspeare reading parties during the winter season.

ONE of the Lichfield Hampole MSS. is of the fourteenth century, with many final long /s. It is strongly, though not consistently, dialectal, probably North-East Midland, and alters and transposes Hampole's lines in an extraordinary way. Both MSS. are of the second version or β type, though the later MS. has the first line of the α type with "Fader almyty," not "Fader of hevenc." Dr. Bülbring intends to examine and classify all the score or more of MSS. of the Pricke of Conscience, outside the British Museum, whose eighteen Dr. Percy Andrae has already dissertated on and pedigreed. Sooner or later an edition of the β type of the work will be undertaken by the Early English Text Society; and it ought to be in at least four parallel texts, like Dr. Morris's edition of the Cursor Mundi, so as to show the differences of dialect and text. The Lichfield MS. 18 has "ty" for "th"—a rare spelling. Its second writer almost always uses "ty."

MESSRS. DEAN & SON announce for immediate publication an authorised translation of Souvenirs intimes de la Cour des Tuileries, by M^{me}. Carotte (née Bouvet), at one time private reader to the Empress Eugénie.

THE German text of Chamisso's ever attractive Peter Schlemihl, edited by Miss Buchheim, with notes explaining the linguistic difficulties and the numerous literary allusions, will shortly be issued by the Delegates of the Clarendon Press.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT will publish next week, Geoff, a novel, in three volumes, by Gertrude Forde, author of "In the Old Palazzo."

ANOTHER copyright volume is about to appear in "Cassell's National Library," being Mr. F. T. Palgrave's Visions of England, which by the kind permission of the author will be issued as vol. 193 on Monday next.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. will shortly publish, under the title of Religion: a Dialogue, and other Essays, a selection from Schopenhauer's "Parerga und Paralipomena," translated by Mr. T. B. Saunders.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK, & Co. announce a new edition, being the nineteenth, of Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, brought down to the autumn of 1889. It will be issued in about sixteen monthly parts, of which the first will be ready by the end of September.

THE next volume in the "Camelot" Series will be Shakespeare's England, from William Harrison's contemporary account, with an introduction by Dr. F. J. Furnivall.

THE Revista Contemporanea for August 15 shows a new form of flattery of public men. P.P. del Busto Valdés has turned the "disertissima oratio" delivered by S. Pidal y Mon before the recent national council at Madrid into a long poem of Latin elegiacs.

THE miner-poet, Mr. Skipsy, the newly-appointed custodian of the so-called Shakespeare's birthplace, writes:

"Mrs. Skipsy and I find our new post a great improvement upon any we have hitherto had, and we like it very much."

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

WITH the October number the English Illustrated Magazine will begin a new volume; and the publishers have accordingly issued a prospectus of the arrangements made and the fresh features to be introduced. Henceforth, the letterpress will be printed across the page, and not in double columns; and the thickness of the paper will be increased. In consideration of the large number of subscribers in the United States, special efforts will be made to interest American tastes, though it is not expressly stated that this will be by means of American contributions. Only one serial novel will run at one time, the first being "The Ring of Amasis," by the Earl of Lytton; but each number will also contain a short story. Princess Christian has promised to write three illustrated papers. Mr. Walter Crane will contribute a series of drawings illustrating his recent journey through Greece; Mr. Alan S. Cole will write on "Tapestry," illustrated from the South Kensington Museum and from some examples woven by Mr. William Morris after designs by Mr. Burne Jones. Among new series of papers will be "The Public Schools of England," "Girlhood in Different Countries," "Celebrities of the Day," social questions such as "Children in Theatres" by Mrs. Jeune, sporting articles such as "Yacht Racing" by the Earl of Dunraven, and descriptive accounts of the great routes that connect the component parts of the British Empire. In this last series Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace will tell the story of his journey home from India through Persia.

SOME difficulty has been experienced about the title of Dr. George Macdonald's new story, which will begin to be published as a serial in the October number of the Sun (Alexander Gardner). As originally announced in the ACADEMY, it was to be called "Kith and Kin"; but it has been discovered that another novel bearing that name is already in existence. The author then suggested as a title "A Long Home." But he has likewise been compelled to withdraw that, because he found that it would be confounded with the title of his former book, Home Again. It has now been finally decided to call the new story "There and Back."

THE forthcoming number of the Library will contain a second instalment of "Caxtoniana," by Mr. F. Norgate; "A Day's Reading in the Mitchell Library, Glasgow," by Mr. John Ingram; "The Duty of Governments to provide the People with easily accessible Books," by Mr. G. R. Humphery; and papers on "The Bodleian Library" and "Contractions of Fore-Names."

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE EBB OF THE TIDE.

LEAVING its foam, its driftwood, on the sand,
The weary tide retreats—receding slow,
As though it would resist the Almighty hand
That draws it from the land.

Deep rest has fallen round me; but I know
That in far other hollow clefts and caves
The turning waters have begun to flow
With surge and murmur low.

So with the tide of years that passes o'er
The sands of this our life; the weary waves,
Here ebbing, flow upon another shore,
But there shall ebb no more.

SOME THEATRICAL LAWSUITS: A SUPPLEMENT TO CIBBER'S "APOLOGY."

I.

THE unreliableness of the dates in Cibber's charming book is well known. But it is not so widely known that there were several important suits in the Court of Chancery connected with the theatres in his time of which he makes no mention whatever; and an examination of the original records relating to cases to which he does allude throws considerable light upon the facts.

During the earlier years of Queen Anne's reign, Christopher Rich reigned supreme at Drury Lane. Betterton had opened a new theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, but by 1704 he was glad to make over his licence to Vanbrugh. In 1705 Vanbrugh opened a new theatre which he had built in the Haymarket. But in spite of every effort the new venture proved unsuccessful; and Vanbrugh proposed that Owen McSwiney, or Swiney, acting manager at Drury Lane, should take over the house, clothes and scenery, together with the licence to use them. Rich agreed to this arrangement, thinking it would bring both houses under his control; and told Swiney he could take with him such actors as might prefer to go to the Haymarket, with the exception of Cibber. All profits were to be shared equally between the two undertakers. But Swiney had not been established long before he and Rich quarrelled, and Cibber went over to the Haymarket. Swiney then entered into a partnership with Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett in March, 1708, as we shall see. In June, 1709, came the memorable silencing of the actors at Drury Lane, followed by a petition from Booth and the rest for leave to act. They described themselves as reduced to the lowest want (Add. MS. 12,201). On November 22, Mr. William Collier, M.P., a Tory lawyer, acting upon the strength of a letter from Sir John Stanley, the Lord Chamberlain's secretary, came with soldiers and broke into Drury Lane Theatre, turned out Rich's servants, and seized the clothes, scenes, &c. Booth and the other actors who had not gone to the Haymarket joined with Collier, and the theatre was re-opened. At the Haymarket, in spite of structural alterations which improved the acoustic properties of the house, the season of 1709-10 was not very prosperous, at any rate until Dr. Sacheverell's trial was over; but things were still worse at Drury Lane, and Collier, bringing his political influence to bear, arranged for an exchange of theatres. On November 6, 1710, licences were accordingly granted to Swiney, Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett for the acting of comedies and tragedies at Drury Lane; and to Collier, for the performance of operas at the Haymarket. Collier, moreover, was to receive £200 from the comedians, and Drury Lane was to be closed on Wednesdays, to give the opera a better chance. After a time Collier found the bargain he had made was not so good as he expected, and, political influence being again brought to bear, Swiney, in spite of all remonstrances, had to let Collier come back to Drury Lane, and himself return to the care of opera at the Haymarket. The new licences to Swiney for opera, and to Collier, Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett, for acting at Drury Lane, were granted on April 17, 1712. Swiney found the opera, in the state Collier had left it, so unprofitable that he went abroad, and remained in exile twenty years. Collier insisted upon having a fixed pension of £700 a year, instead of an equal share with the rest; but Cibber says that if Collier had been content to take his share, he would have received £300 a year more than he did.

With these facts before us, the litigation between Swiney and Wilks, Cibber and Doggett in 1711 will be more intelligible. Of these Chancery proceedings, protracted as they were, Cibber makes no mention whatever. The original action was brought by Swiney against Wilks, Cibber, Doggett, and Champelon, treasurer at the Haymarket; but this was immediately followed by a cross action brought by Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett against Swiney. It will be convenient to give all the pleadings first, and then the orders and decrees, because the two suits were to a great extent heard together. Taking the original action first, the following is an abstract of Swiney's bill, dated January 12, 1710[-11]. (Chancery Pleadings, Hamilton IV. B. and A., bef. 1714, No. 668.)

Your orator, Owen Swiney, of the parish of St. James, Co: Middlesex, gentleman, humbly complaining, shows that he, being possessed of a lease and the residue of a term of fourteen years of and in the theatre in the Haymarket, and also of the assignment of Her Majesty's licence for acting plays, operas, &c. for the like term, and being thereby entitled to the power of directing and governing Her Majesty's company of comedians, players, and other performers, and servants therein, and to the profits arising thereby, did agree to admit and receive Robert Wilks, Thomas Doggett and Colley Cibber into co-partnership with him, and did enter into articles with them for that purpose on the 10th March, 1708; whereby it is recited that by indenture of lease dated 7th March, then last past, and made between John Vanbrugh, of Whitehall, Co: Middlesex, Esquire, of the one part, and your orator of the other part, Vanbrugh, for considerations therein mentioned, demised to your orator all that new-built brick theatre containing in length 140 feet of Assize, and in breadth 60 feet of Assize, more or less, as the same is enclosed within the four walls in a street called the Haymarket, and the room or office without the walls commonly called Mr. Smith's office, and the piazza next the Haymarket paved with stone, and the covered passage between the theatre and a certain street or lane called Market Lane, together with all rooms, entries, &c., thereunto belonging; also with six rooms even with the floor of the stage, built on part of the ground lying between the theatre and Market Lane, and all rooms over the said six rooms, and a yard even with the floor of the stage, built on part of the same ground, and all rooms over the said six rooms and the yard, with a large cistern and pump and New River or Thames water laid on for the use of the premises, and two houses of office, and all the plays, operas, clothes, scenes, machines, &c., used in acting in the said theatre (saving as therein excepted), to hold the said theatre, &c., unto your orator, his executors, administrators and assigns, from the day next before the day of the date of the said indenture of lease for 14 years, at the weekly rent of £25 for every week in which there shall be any theatrical entertainment publicly acted in the said theatre or elsewhere by the company of players belonging thereto, so as the weekly sums of £25 did not exceed £700 in the whole year, nor prove less than £500, except the acting of plays, &c., in the said theatre should be prohibited by the government or the Lord Chamberlain, in which case the payment of the said weekly sum was to cease with other covenants and agreements, as by the said indenture of lease, one part whereof your orator is ready to produce. And your orator shows that upon admitting Wilks, Doggett and Cibber into the said co-partnership the same was to last, and your orator was to have the government of them and other Her Majesty's company of comedians, &c., in the said theatre, and in any other theatre which might afterwards be taken with the consent of the said parties, which was a consideration with your orator in agreeing to receive Wilks, Doggett and Cibber into partnership, and to carry on the same for their joint profit. Wilks, Doggett and Cibber agreed to act from the 1st July following, and your orator agreed to manage the theatre, and not to assign the lease to anyone without the consent of the said parties; and Wilks covenanted to direct all rehearsals. And it was agreed that a clear account should be kept of all receipts and disbursements. Your orator had the property in the said clothes, &c., and was liable for the rents, &c., to Vanbrugh, and was primarily responsible for debts; it was therefore agreed that he should be manager of the cash running in the said stock and business and should in the first place out of the receipts, preferably to all other payments, satisfy the rent, and next pay all such sums as should be due to actors, servants, &c., or for wages, clothes, or other incidental charges, which control over the cash was not given to any of the other parties, nor were they to intermeddle therewith. And then your orator was first to receive out of the profits £300 yearly, and then Wilks, Doggett, and Cibber each £200, which is mentioned to be for their overseeing the business of the said theatre, or acting therein, and particularly for their performances on the stage thereof; and Wilks was further to receive £50 a year for caring for rehearsals. After this the net profits were to be applied as follows:—one half was to be received and retained by your orator without rendering any account for the same, and the other half was to be divided equally between Wilks, Doggett, and Cibber. Losses were to be similarly shared. And Wilks, Doggett, and Cibber were each to have a benefit performance in March. Your orator and the said parties carried on the house in this way from the 10th March, 1708, to the 10th June, 1710, and your orator kept a plain account, to which the said parties had free access at all times, which account your orator believes to be just and true. But now Wilks, Doggett, and Cibber, combining and confederating together with divers others, as yet unknown to your orator, to defeat the said Articles, and to deprive your orator of his right, pretend that they are not to await the account of profits or loss by the said acting, or to be subject to the said rent and considerations to Vanbrugh for the theatre, but that your orator only is liable thereto, and that they are well entitled to the management and receipt of cash belonging thereto, and to receive money for their particular and private purposes thereout, without regard to the charges which by the said Articles are to have the preference, and they say that they will continue to hold and retain all such sums as they have received for such their occasions; and your orator doth expressly charge that although by the accounts kept as aforesaid and the last balance thereof for nine months from 15th September, 1709, to 10th June, 1710, by divers means well known to the confederators, the said acting has accounted to a loss of £208 0s. 9d and upwards, as will appear by the books when produced, yet they have drawn out of the receipts the several sums following:—Wilks £150, Doggett £100, and Cibber £100; and they, having wasted and endeavouring to waste the said stock or cash, refuse to repay the same, but endeavour to turn the event of the loss thereof upon your orator, who has been obliged to maintain the theatre and the acting therein; and they are become further indebted to him on that account, your orator not only having advanced £183 8s. 11d. for such support of the said house above all his receipts during these nine months, but also is and stands indebted on the said confederates' account for and towards the said sum of £350 by them had to one Mr. John Hall, for clothes for the confederates and others of the said company. Yet the confederates refuse to reimburse or suffer your orator to reimburse himself out of the receipts, or otherwise to secure himself from the said rent, although they have the benefit thereof and of the clothes, &c. They are also about to employ and lend out the same to waste and dispose thereof without your orator's consent, although they have no right to interfere with them or any of the receipts, except such share as shall by the event of the accounts belong to them by these Articles; yet they pretend your orator is not the proper person to receive or manage the said cash or receipts, and refuse to pay or come to account with your orator, although he has several times in a fair and amicable manner desired the same. All which is contrary to right and equity, and as the accounts are properly examinable in a Court of Equity, and your orator has no witnesses to prove the same, but they are either dead or in parts beyond the sea remote and unknown to your orator, he therefore prays that writs of subpoena may be granted to Wilks, Doggett, and Cibber, commanding them to appear, and answer to these premises.

Then comes a second bill from Swiney, also dated January 12, 1710[11], which, after repeating much of the above, continues as below. There seems to be some difficulty about the date of the payments to Wilks, &c., taken from the books, and mentioned in this bill, even allowing for the difference of old and new style; for the bill itself is dated January 12, 1710[11].

Your orator intrusted Francis Champelon to receive the cash and to give account to him as he should require, and satisfaction to the other parties, and no objection appears to have been made by Wilks, Cibber, or Doggett, in the said books, but they acquiesced therewith until 10th June last, what your orator had done being for the benefit of the said partnership, as might be supposed, as your orator had the greatest share in the loss or gain therein. But now they, confederating with John Vanbrugh, Francis Champelon and others, to defeat the said Articles, pretend they are not to await the account of profit or loss, &c. (as in the preceding bill); and your orator doth expressly charge that Champelon, by the contrivance of the other confederates, now denies to be your orator's servant or agent, and refuses to pay the said cash or profits to your orator, whereas such receipts are plainly intended to remain with your orator for his security. The profits are in some months much better than in others, so that without a rule being kept as to paying dividends your orator would sometimes lose, as he has during the past year. Your orator was frequently obliged to disburse £200 a week or other great sums to support the acting in the said theatre, and the same was kept up with your orator's own proper money, and turned to loss. And Wilks, Doggett and Cibber have received large sums, which ought to have been devoted to paying expences, to the extent of £4000 and upwards. Your orator, also, by the lease with Vanbrugh covenants, among other things, not to sell, transfer, &c., the said theatre or any part of the premises to anyone without Vanbrugh's special licence, nor to dispose of or wilfully let run to ruin clothes, machines, &c., and at the end to peaceably give up the same, including all stock added in the 14 years, in good condition; but the confederates pretend they are not subject (if they had estates or wherewith to make satisfaction) for breach of any of the leases or covenants, but pretend they have power to dispose not only of the said cash but also of the said stock; and Wilks, Doggett and Cibber have received from Champelon since the 10th June last the further sum or sums of £2000 or upwards, and divided among themselves all cash belonging to the said stock. The books show that on the 31st January, 1710 Cibber, Wilks and Doggett sent the following order to Champelon: 'Pay to Mr. Doggett all money you have now in cash or that shall hereafter be from the 24th November last, except £400, and take his receipt for the same, he being now accountable to the company now acting under Her Majesty's licence.' On November 11, 1710, Wilks, Doggett and Cibber each gave a receipt for £20, being part of the money in cash from the 4th instant; on November 30 each received another £40; on December 13, £50; on December 21, £50; on December 23, £40; on January 3, 1710, £50; on January 11, £50; on January 18, £50; and on January 25, £50. On January 26 Wilks received £20, part of his allowance for management; and on February 2, 1710, Doggett had £267 8s., 'being all the money remaining in cash from 4th November last to 26th January inclusive, except the sum of £400, for which I promise to be accountable to those now acting under Her Majesty's licence. Theatre Royal. Witness my hand, Thomas Doggett.' And divers other sums are in the said books mentioned. The confederates have, as your orator has lately discovered, kept one or more private books, and they are the only persons who can discover the same, and to what sum your orator is or may be liable according to the event of the said next year's account, as may happen for the said year, besides his portion of the loss accruing or that may accrue by the said acting. And the confederates threaten to sue your orator for pretended breaches of great penalties at law; and Vanbrugh, joining with them, has consented to take his rent from them, and yet to load your orator with the same when he thinks fit; and the confederates give out that they are to be his paymasters, pretending the said Articles do so mention and direct; and they let out, sell and exchange the Haymarket with and for other theatres, and contract severally great debts for the rent, &c., of several theatres at the same time, which may subject your orator to a two-fold payment without any security given him for or against the same rents. Your orator may be liable to a rent of £3 12s. 0d. per diem, £1123 4s. 0d., or other great claim for the theatre at Drury Lane, 12s. a day more than your orator did propose to agree unto for the same, and this without his privity and against his consent. The confederates share the profits of the said theatres without regard to your orator's consent or to his share or interest therein, and alter or dispose of affairs, actors and servants in the said theatres contrary to your orator's contracts made with them before with the said confederates' consent, and of the said stock, pretending that Vanbrugh has so agreed, and that he will not insist upon your orator's said lease or covenants, or expect any satisfaction from him for any loss arising thereby.

We now come to the answer put in by Wilks, Doggett, and Cibber. The "former answer to the plaintiff's original bill" appears to be lost. The answer here given is dated April 17, 1711.

The defendants deny that Swiney by any agreement made with them was to have the command or keeping of the stock of clothes, machines, &c., or the direction or government of Her Majesty's Company of comedians and others, or was to be manager of the cash running in the stock and business of the theatres, further, or in any other manner than is expressly mentioned in the Articles referred to in these defendants' former answer to the plaintiff's original bill, and to which these defendants refer themselves. They deny that to their knowledge or belief any account of the profits of the theatre in the bill mentioned was publicly kept by the plaintiff's means, to which they might resort as they pleased; on the contrary, they often desired to peruse the accounts of the said co-partnership, but have never been permitted to see the same, except on a Sunday morning, as is in the former answer set forth; and they verily believe that such accounts as they have seen are unjust; and as to the plaintiff's employing Champelon, they admit he was employed as treasurer or as steward to the said theatre; but they believe the accounts were kept in the complainant's own possession, nor could they receive any satisfaction in relation to them. They were so far from acquiescing in the proceedings of the complainant in relation to his management of the undertaking under the said Articles that they several times protested against all his proceedings, as arbitrary, unjust, and contrary to the Articles. And on or about the 4th November last, Her Majesty being pleased to grant a new licence to these defendants and the complainant jointly for acting comedies and tragedies, and thereby to vacate the licence before in force, and which had been granted to Mr. Congreve and Mr. Vanbrugh, and being also pleased to grant a licence for the acting of operas to Mr. Collier, these defendants humbly conceive that they are thereby made equal sharers in the said new licence for comedies and tragedies, and that the Articles made under the old licence for operas, as well as comedies and tragedies, are perfectly void and at an end; nor do they conceive themselves any way liable for the payment of the rent for the theatre in the Haymarket, or to any other of the covenants in the said lease; the theatre in the Haymarket is now solely in the possession of Mr. Collier for performing of operas therein, and he, as these defendants are well satisfied, does pay the rent thereof; that theatre was delivered up to Mr. Collier by the complainant's own consent, given under his hand. And the defendants believe that by the granting of the new licence all contracts entered into by the complainant with any performers are vacated and void. They own that after the granting of the said new licence they, and the complainant, continued the defendant Champelon in the place of receiver under them, and they do all own that they are each equally liable to share loss as well as profit with the complainant under the said new licence, and are willing to bear their shares; and they say that in whatever dividends of the profits have been made under the new licence since the granting of it regard has been had to the complainant's share, one-fourth part, and the complainant might, if he had thought fit, have retained the same; and they say that by reason of the complainant's management during the continuance of the said Articles, without their privity or consent, the defendants are altogether strangers to those accounts, but are willing to have such accounts stated according to the said Articles, for the time they were in force, whenever the complainant thinks fit to make out and justify his account. They deny that they have advanced Champelon's salary, or have agreed with any of the players or servants for any large sums, save only that they have agreed with two of the actors, by particular request and purely to oblige the complainant; and they own they have received of Champelon several sums of money mentioned in complainant's bill to be paid, amounting to £400 each, which they have received and divided, and the like sum of £400, being the complainant's share of such dividend, has been offered him, and lies ready when he thinks fit to take it; and the said £400 each is all that has been divided among them since the said new licence was granted. Wilks owns he has received £20, and Doggett £267 8s., and some other moneys which are and were to remain in cash to make good necessary charges. And these defendants own themselves equally engaged with the complainant for the payment of the rent of Drury Lane Theatre, and for all other charges relating to acting therein, where these defendants do now act; and they are willing to account with the defendant from the time of their acting in Drury Lane under the new licence. And they say that upon the complainant delivering up the theatre in the Haymarket to Collier, Collier delivered up to these defendants and the complainant the theatre in Drury Lane which was in his possession, and for which these defendants pay the same rent as Collier did under his lease, and no more, being £3 12s. a day when they act therein; and they deny that they know or believe either the complainant or they to be liable for the rent of the Haymarket Theatre or any other theatre except the one in Drury Lane, but believe Collier only is liable as regards the Haymarket, and that he pays the rent to Vanbrugh. And they own that since the granting of the new licence they have been forced to take care of and to carry on all the affairs of the theatre in Drury Lane without the complainant, who, though often requested, has refused to join with them therein; and they hope it will appear that when the new licence was granted the defendants were placed each in equal power with the complainant as to the management of acting comedies and tragedies, and were freed from the arbitrary proceedings of which the complainant had been guilty while the said articles were in force. And they deny unlawful confederacy.

The answer of Lucretia Champelon, widow, is dated July 3, 1711. She states that the complainant employed Francis Champelon, her late husband, to receive daily the profits and cash arising from acting at the Haymarket Theatre, which he entered in the books, and paid various sums, as directed by the complainant; and she is willing to hand in the books as the court might direct, but could not do more, being a perfect stranger thereto. She does not know if at the close of the account her husband was debtor to the complainant or to Mr. Hall. Her husband lay in a weak state of health for a long time before he died; but she is not aware that the complainant ever, by word of mouth or writing, stated during that time that her husband owed him anything. She denies all unlawful confederacy.

SHAKSPERE'S "MAKE ROPE 'S IN SUCH A SCARRE."—"ALL'S WELL," iv. ii. 38-9.

Lichfield: August 24, 1889.

In this much-commented-on and much-emended passage, Mr. P. A. Daniel is surely right in insisting that the 's which follows the verb "rope," ensnare, means—as it so often does in Shakspeare—us, and describes the same folk as the "ourselves" which follows it. Diana, pretending to be driven into a corner by Bertram's vehement passion for her, and his pleading for her illicit love, affects to yield to him, and says,

"I see that men make rope 's [=us] in such a scarre [scare]
That we'll forsake ourselves [give up our maiden purity]."

This use of the causative verb is well known in earlier stages of the language; but the verb is generally do—"do hang him," cause him to be hanged, have him hung, and like phrases, are common as possible in Chaucer, Caxton, &c. Make, however, is used in the same way (as in French), at least by Caxton—"He made the town sawte ofte tymes feel sore," that is, he caused or made the town to be assaulted oftentimes, he had or got it assaulted. (The sentence above is from Caxton's Blanchardyn (from the French), p. 152, l. 4, now editing for the Early English Text Society by Dr. Leon Kellner, with a valuable dissertation on Caxton's syntax.) Treating Shakspeare's "make rope's" as one of his frequent survivals of earlier usages—for others of which see Abbott—his meaning becomes clear, and no emendation of any kind is wanted in this "All's Well" passage. "Make rope 's" is "make or cause us to be roped or ensnared"; and Diana's speech is—when she is leading Bertram to believe that his specious and vehement pleadings have overcome her maidenly reserve and made her resolve to yield to him—

"I see that men make us to be ensnared [men get us ensnared] in such a scare [or fright] that we'll forsake ourselves"; "you've trapped me in such a fix that I'll yield to your importunities."

It is study of earlier English, and not emendation, that is needed to clear up Shakspeare's seeming puzzles. If Shakspeare had written Greek or Latin all the difficulties in him would have been cleared up long ago. These languages are held by the learned to be worthy of study. But English! The language of modern carters! Who need care for that? So the Hellenic Society has 800 members, while the Early English Text has not 400. Patriotism in language means support of Greek.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "CLOUGH."

Oxford: August 24, 1889.

In Barbour's Bruce (xvi. 376-87) we are told that Sir James of Douglas assembled fifty men against Sir Thomas of Richmond,

"And in a clowch on the ta hand
All his archeris enbuscht he";

that is, he laid an ambush in a hollow of the hill-side. This Scottish cleuch (or "cleuch") is of course identical with the English "clough" used in the same sense, and familiar to us from its occurrence in English names of places. It was from some "clough" in the North of England that the author of "The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich" derived his name.

What is the derivation of the word "clough"? I have consulted a good many dictionaries and books on names of places, but have not succeeded in finding an etymology of the word which was scientifically possible. Dr Isaac Taylor has no difficulty in identifying English "clough" with Erse cloch, "a stone," apparently following Jamieson; but as "clough" does not mean a stone, and as Erse words are not found till quite late on English soil, we may dismiss this guess without the slightest hesitation.

Prof. Skeat sees in "clough" a doublet of "cleft," and follows Webster-Mahn in deriving it from O.E. clēofan, "to cleave, to split." In both dictionaries the form "clough," with its final guttural, is identified with, and is supposed to proceed from, Icel. klofi, a rift in a hillside. Now this etymology should be absolutely rejected, as it cannot be supported by any sure analogy in English phonology. It is of course true that an English labial f may correspond with an O.E. g spirant, as, for instance, "dwarf" = duwerg; but in English the converse of this never happens. A primitive Germanic f cannot be represented in English by a guttural sound. In Dutch we find cht = Germanic ft, as, for instance, Dutch kracht = Old Saxon craft; but we have nothing analogous to this in English.

What then is the etymology of "clough"? And, as a preliminary question, what form may we assume for "clough" in Old English? A theoretical form has to be assumed, as unfortunately the word does not occur in any Old English text. From the analogy of English "tough" = Scottish teuch = O.E. tōh, and of English "enough" = Scottish eneuch = O.E. genōg, we may infer clōh* or clōg* as the theoretical O.E. form of "clough." Let us take tōh and see whether its etymology will throw any light upon clōh*. O.E. tōh, tough, is the precise phonetic equivalent of O.H.G. zūht, from a primitive Germanic base tūxu-* = tanxu-*, guttural n disappearing before x according to rule. By a special law in Old English tanxu-* became tonxu-*, whence O.E. tōh. The Germanic tanx* had the meaning to hold fast together, and in the form tang- (a form due to the operation of Verner's law) appears in Mod. H.G. zunge and English tongue.

In precise analogy with O.E. tōh, "tough," we may derive O.E. clōh*, "clough," through clonxu-, from a Germanic clanxu-. By this process we can bring "clough" into ablaut relation with O.H.G. clingo, chlingo, Mod. H.G. klänge, which Weigand in his dictionary explains by the words "thalbach, schmaler bach, schmale schlucht," and which is therefore identical in meaning with our "clough."

For a similar dropping of the nasal before x(h) in Gothic we may compare þeins, "time," for þinxo-, primitive Germanic þenxo-, þenx*, whence by grammatical change O.E. þing, Icel. þing, a meeting held at an appointed time.

Rigveda Samhitā. Translated by H. H. Wilson. Edited by E. B. Cowell and W. F. Webster. Vols. V. and VI. (Trübner.)

THESE two volumes bring to a conclusion the first complete translation of the Rigveda in English. This is in itself a fact deserving to be recorded. An additional reason for not passing over its completion in silence is the consideration that the translation was made by one who along with Colebrooke was one of the great pioneers of Sanskrit scholarship in Europe, and that it has been supplemented and partly edited by the most learned among living Sanskritists of English birth. When Prof. Wilson died in 1860, only three volumes of his translation had appeared. He left behind him, however, in MS. what appeared to be a complete translation of the remaining half of the Rigveda. It is interesting to note that, as the fourth volume of Max Müller's Rigveda was not published till 1862, Wilson translated the last three books entirely from MSS. The MSS. of the Rigveda being almost altogether free from various readings, this was no such difficult matter; but to translate with the aid of MSS. of Sāyana's commentary was a much more serious undertaking.

Prof. Cowell took upon himself the pious task of editing the remains of his old Oxford guru, and published the fourth volume, which extends to the twentieth hymn of Mandala VIII., in 1866. The printing of the fifth volume was proceeding when it was discovered that the whole of the eighth Mandala, from the forty-fourth hymn onwards, was wanting in Wilson's MS. Prof. Cowell supplied the deficiency; but the large amount of purely voluntary work which he took upon himself as professor of Sanskrit at Cambridge prevented him from continuing at the time to edit Wilson's MS. of the ninth book, which had been left in a very rough state. The suspended work of correcting the MS. of this and of the tenth book was at length taken up by Mr. Webster, a former pupil of Prof. Cowell's, and thus Wilson's intellectual grandson (prasishtya). To vol. v. is added as an appendix a translation of the Vāṅkilya hymns by Prof. Cowell. The last volume contains the whole of the tenth Mandala, for the editing of which Mr. Webster is wholly responsible. The MS. translation of this book, left tolerably complete by Wilson, Mr. Webster, as he states in his preface, gives unaltered, except where there was an obvious slip, or where Sāyana's commentary was not adhered to.

Wilson himself professed to follow the traditional interpretation presented by the Hindu commentator. No other course was open to him, even towards the close of his life, for Vedic scholarship was then still in its infancy. So close, indeed, is his adherence to Sāyana that his renderings frequently assume the appearance of a paraphrase rather than a translation. The critical deficiencies of Sāyana's interpretations have been fully demonstrated by the late Dr. John Muir in his valuable essay on "The Interpretation of the Veda." Sāyana's commentary, as is well known to students of the Rigveda, contains many absurdities; but they are such as would not be very surprising in the native interpretation of a bygone literary period in any country when the light of the comparative method is lacking. His very absurdities serve to inspire confidence in the value of critical research. Sāyana had, however, the advantage of being a native interpreter of ancient thought in a country where tradition has been more continuous, custom less progressive, and the aspects of nature widely different from those of Western lands.

Wilson's translation has, at all events, the value of presenting what was the earliest complete exegesis of the Rigveda, elaborated a century before the first European ship sighted the shores of India. His work also makes it easier to judge to what extent Sāyana was right. Mr. Webster, in his preface, justly points out the unfairness of giving the name of a European for an interpretation which is already to be found in the Hindu commentator. The somewhat stilted and prosaic style of Wilson's version gives but a faint idea of the great poetical beauty of many of the hymns of the Rigveda. The latter quality is more likely to be done justice to in the translation to be looked for in forthcoming volumes of "The Sacred Books of the East," which will, at the same time, represent the critical side of Vedic interpretation by embodying all the most recent results of European research.

The numerous footnotes supplied by Prof. Cowell and Mr. Webster will prove valuable to students of Sāyana. They also contain useful references to the parallel passages in the Sāma-Veda, with Mahidhara's comments and Benfey's and Roth's interpretations. Wilson seems occasionally to have adhered too closely to Sāyana; as, for instance, in X. xiv. 5, where he takes the nominative suvarākā as an instrumental. Mr. Webster has failed to note some cases in which Wilson diverged from Sāyana. Thus, the form dakām (śb. v. 12) is not, with the commentator, rendered as a past indicative, nor āyamai (v. 14) as a subjunctive. In the note on navagā (p. 32, vol. vi.) "affliction" is a misprint for "affection" (prīti). Judging by his note on the śal urvīh (p. 34), Wilson must have misread the name of one of them as arkah in his MS. of Sāyana, the reading in Max Müller's edition being urk ka, "and strength."

Mr. Webster's footnotes are distinguished from Wilson's by square brackets. The explanation of Sāyana's words, in note 2, p. 69, as "Art thou there?" can hardly be right. Kim itī must mean: "What is the purport of my speech?" the answer being the words of the text atra eva tvam, which are explained to mean asmin sthāna eva dhara, "Do thou be here." Again, in note 5 of the same page, Sāyana scarcely says: "Treat him kindly for the sake of the sacrifice"; but rather, "Act kindly towards him, the (dead) sacrificer (yajamāna): the meaning of asmai being given by yagamāna, and the dative form explained by arīham."

After what has been said it must be evident that Prof. Cowell and Mr. Webster have done good work as well as fulfilled a pious duty in completing a translation which has not merely a historical interest, but must have a certain value as representing a phase of Vedic scholarship that cannot altogether be ignored.

OBITUARY.

PROF. S. BEAL.

IT is with much regret that we have to record the death of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Beal, professor of Chinese at University College, London, which took place on Tuesday, August 20, at the rectory of Greens Norton, near Towcester, in Northamptonshire. For some years past he had been in weak health.

Prof. Beal was born in 1825, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1847. He never proceeded to a higher degree, though the university of Durham conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L. in 1885. After holding several curacies, he was appointed to a chaplaincy in the Royal Navy in 1852. The accident of his serving upon the Sybil during the China war of 1856-58 gave the impulse to the course of his studies for the remainder of his life. He must already have made some progress in the knowledge of Chinese, for we learn from the Navy List that he was specially mentioned in despatches for his services as Chinese interpreter on the occasion of the destruction of forty war junks up Escape Creek in the Canton River. On retiring from the navy in 1877, he was appointed by the Admiralty to the Greenwich Hospital living of Falstone, in Northumberland; and in the same year he was elected to the chair of Chinese in University College, London. In 1880, he was transferred to another Greenwich Hospital living, that of Wark, also in Northumberland; and only last year the crown presented him to the more valuable preferment of Greens Norton.

Prof. Beal's name will always hold a high place in oriental scholarship as being the first Englishman (following in the steps of Rémusat and Julien) to translate direct from the Chinese the early records of Buddhism in that country, which throw such a flood of light upon the dark period of Indian history. So far as we know, his first publication was a paper on "The History of the Temples of Hakodate," read before the Chinese branch of the Royal Asiatic Society in 1857. In the same year he printed for private circulation a pamphlet aiming to prove that the Shogun, or Tycoon, was not the real Emperor of Japan. At the first oriental congress, held in London in 1874, he presented a report upon the Chinese Buddhist books in the India Office Library; and at the Berlin Congress (1883) he read a paper upon "The Buddhist Councils."

But the work by which Prof. Beal's fame was established is the series of books in which he traced the travels of the Chinese Buddhist pilgrims in India from the fifth to the seventh century A.D. The first of this series was The Travels of Sung-Yun and Fa-Hien, translated from the Chinese, with notes and prolegomena (Trübner, 1869). Next followed The Si-yu-ki; or Buddhist Records of the Western World, translated from the Chinese of Hsien-Tsiang, which forms two volumes of "Trübner's Oriental Series" (1884). And finally the series was completed only last year by the publication of The Life of Hsien-Tsiang, by the Shamans Hwui Li and Yen-Tsung, with a preface containing an account of the works of I-Tsing. We believe that he has left in MSS. some further contributions to the same subject.

Among Prof. Beal's other works may be mentioned The Catena of Buddhist Scriptures from the Chinese (1872); The Romantic Legend of Buddha (1876); Texts from the Buddhist Canon commonly known as the Dhammapadu, translated from the Chinese, with accompanying narratives (1878); The Fo-sho-hing-tsan-king: a Life of Buddha translated from the Chinese version of a Sanskrit original, forming vol. xix. of "The Sacred Books of the East"; and Buddhism in China, in the series of "Non-Christian Religious Systems" of the S.P.C.K.

Such, in brief, is the record of an active life which was by no means entirely devoted to the pursuit of oriental studies. Chinese scholars as good-nay, better—may survive, but none more laborious and single-minded.

SCIENCE NOTES.

WE quote from the Times the following anticipations of the subjects that will probably be discussed at the meeting of the British Association at Newcastle-on-Tyne from September 11 to 18. The address of the president of the meeting, Prof. Flower, will treat in the main of the organisation of museums as a means by which science may be advanced, with some general reference to the still unsolved problems relating to the evolution of organic life. Capt. W. de W. Abney, the president of section A (mathematical and physical science), will take for the subject of his address "Photography and Molecular Physics," with special reference to the latest advances in photography and the photographing of colours. In section B (chemistry), Sir I. Lowthian Bell will discourse on "The Progress of the Manufacture of Iron with and without the Aid of Science"; and there will be two important discussions (1) with the economical section on "The Teaching of Chemistry in Schools," and (2) with the mechanical section on "Blast Furnaces." In section C (geology), Prof. James Geikie will devote his address mainly to giving an outline of the results obtained during the last few years by continental workers in the domain of glacial or pleistocene geology, with special reference to the origin of the loess and the existence of palaeolithic man in interglacial epochs. Dr. A. Geikie will read a paper on "The Geological Structure of the North-West Highlands as compared with that of Scandinavia"; and Dr. Nansen will probably describe the geological results of his recent journey across Greenland. In section D (biology), Prof. J. S. Burdon-Sanderson proposes to give a forecast of the future of physiological research, founded on the direction in which modern work is tending, and the nature of the problems now occupying attention. Mr. Romanes will read several papers, and also open a debate on "Specific Characters from the Point of View of their Usefulness." In section E (geography), Sir Francis De Winton's address will deal largely with the commercial and other practical aspects of the subject. Among the African travellers expected to be present are Mr. Joseph Thomson, the Rev. Mr. Ashe of Uganda, Capt. Hore of Lake Tanganyika, Capt. Thys of the Congo railway, Sir Charles Metcalfe, and Capt. Lugard and Consul O'Neill of Nyassaland. Among the papers announced are "Some Curious Physical Changes in the Nile Valley," by Mr. Flinders Petrie; "The Course of the Upper Nile," by Mr. Ravenstein; and "Explorations in North Queensland," by Mr. Lumholtz, of Christiania. In section F (economics and statistics), Prof. F. Y. Edgeworth will confine himself in his presidential address to the definite question: "What is the Use of the Mathematical Method in Political Economy introduced by Jevons?"

Two special discussions have been arranged for: (1) "The Incidence of Export and Import Duties," introduced by Prof. Bastable of Dublin; and (2) "The Comptist Criticism of Economic Science," by the Rev. Dr. Cunningham of Cambridge, in the latter of which it is hoped that Mr. Frederic Harrison may take part. In section G (mechanical science), Mr. William Anderson will devote the greater part of his address to a review of our knowledge respecting the molecular structure of matter, with special reference to a right understanding of the properties of steel; and he will also dwell upon the recent development of petroleum as an illuminating and heating agent. In section H (anthropology), Prof. Sir W. Turner, of Edinburgh, will give an address upon "Some Recent Theories on Heredity," to be followed by a discussion. It is expected that M. Paul du Chailu will challenge opposition on the main thesis of his forthcoming book, in which he maintains that the Vikings of Scandinavia, and not the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes, were the ancestors of the English race.

MESSRS. HIRSCHFELD BROTHERS will publish in a few days a new and enlarged edition of Dr. A. M. Brown's work on The Animal Alkaloids Cadaveric and Vital; or, The Ptomaines and Leucomaines, Chemically, Physiologically, and Pathologically considered in relation to Scientific Medicine. The new edition will include a fresh chapter on "Insanity by Auto-Intoxication," and an introduction by Prof. Armand Gautier, of Paris.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

HERR TEUBNER, of Leipzig, announces a collected edition of the miscellaneous writings of Alfred von Gutschmid, edited by Dr. Franz Rühl. The first volume, besides a portrait, will consist mainly of his papers on Egyptology and on Eusebius. In a later volume will be given the German originals of the articles which he contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica on "Phoenicia," &c.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Bréal suggested some Latin etymologies. Cælum, before meaning "heaven," must have had the meaning of "vault" in architecture. It may, therefore, be derived from the verb caedere, like velum from vehere and prelum from premere. Rabies comes from a verb rabere, of which the precise meaning has not been clearly defined. M. Bréal remarked that a recognised symptom of madness in dogs is their running about at random; and also that the Greek ῥάβδω is used in this very sense of "turning hither and thither." He was, therefore, disposed to connect rabere with ῥάβδω, and to assign it the same meaning. Such is also the original meaning of réver, which means "to wander" in Old French. M. Bréal proposed to explain this verb by a noun raive, which would come from a low Latin rabia for rabies. To this last suggestion M. Paul Meyer objected that Latin rabia could give in French nothing but rage, and rabiare nothing but rager. Finally, there is in Latin an adjective forda or horda, meaning a "pregnant cow." This has been derived from fero; but M. Bréal was rather disposed to see in it a popular doublet of gravida. M. Bréal, in another paper, contested Prof. Brugmann's theory of the origin of the feminine gender in Indo-European languages, according to which the ending -a was adopted for the feminine generally simply because it happened to be the ending of certain words which represented females, such as mama "mother," gna "woman."

FINE ART.

SOME ARCHAEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Manual of Oriental Antiquities. By Ernest Babelon. English Translation by B. T. A. Evetts. (Grevell.) M. Babelon's work has already won such a high measure of praise from the students of oriental archaeology that its place is assured among modern authorities on the art and culture of the ancient civilised nations of Western Asia. It aims at doing for them what Prof. Maspero's Manual of Egyptian Archaeology has done so well for ancient Egypt. It is, in fact, an abbreviated and popular presentation of the great work of MM. Perrot and Chipiez on the history of early oriental art, though M. Babelon is an independent worker in the field, and derives his materials from many sources. The large number of excellent illustrations adds greatly to the value of the book. Mr. Evetts has performed his part as a translator with success. His English is good and idiomatic, while fully giving the sense of the original. We only regret that in preparing the work for English readers he did not feel himself at liberty to "enlarge" and "revise" it more frequently. English authorities should have been more often referred to, and errors accordingly corrected like the statements that the Elamite cylinder represented on p. 146 is Median, and consequently connected with Ecbatana, or that the second Hittite figure near Smyrna mentioned by Herodotus "has been lately discovered by M. Humann" (p. 201). The translator's position in the British Museum ought to have enabled him to "revise" these and similar inaccuracies. His not having done so cannot be ascribed to undue respect for his author, seeing that more than once (pp. 22, 79, 139, 172) he has inserted a footnote flatly contradicting the assertions of the text. The footnote on p. 187, however, is erroneous, M. Babelon being quite right in his description of the figure there represented. It is only the drawing of the figure which is incorrect, the feet being represented as bare instead of shod with pointed shoes.

Die Ortsgottheiten in der Griechischen und Römischen Kunst. Von O. Schultz. (Berlin: Calvary; London: Nutt.) Dr. Schultz begins by drawing a sharp distinction among "Ortsgottheiten"—a general name for deities connected with places. There are gods of places who may be depicted in ancient art as taking part in a legendary story, acting either in their own proper place or in another; and there are gods of places who are not conceived as separate from their places, and who are accordingly introduced in works of art to show where the action is supposed to occur. To the latter, Dr. Schultz would restrict the name "Lokalgottheiten." He then goes on to show how, of the deities connected with places, the divine element alone comes out in early art. They are divine agents, but with time their divinity recedes; and at last, their local aspect only being left, they become mere "Lokalgottheiten," mere symbolic scenery. No local gods, in this narrow sense, can be shown with certainty on vases earlier than Alexander's time. Even "Ortsgottheiten" in the general sense are scarce before that period. They are confined to scenes of heroic action, and do not appear amid the transactions of daily life. In late works of art, however, notably on Roman sarcophagi, we find place-gods frequent and present at any action, merely to show the locality. Within this broad difference Dr. Schultz has much to tell us of the mode of representation of hills and towns, rivers, springs, and harbours. The name may be affixed to the figures or may not. Towns or countries appear as richly-dressed female figures. Sometimes a mural crown marks the goddess of a city; sometimes a special costume indicates the country. The goddess Roma has a peculiar treatment, as an armed maiden. But it is the rivers which occur oftenest; and they receive an artistic treatment which, though always conventional, is yet the most diversified. (This may be due to the long-enduring genuine river-worship, to which Tacitus and later authors bear testimony.) Whereas the deities of the springs are always female and young, those of the rivers are always male, and either young or old. A somewhat sad expression of face is common to all the water-deities. The older Greek idea identified the river and the godhead. The later Greek, and still more the Roman, idea pointed rather to a god in the river. Hence the figure of an anthropomorphic deity rising out of his riverhead on Trajan's column. In tolerably late work the river-god is often decked with attributes which point to the wealth he causes—ears of corn or a cornucopia. And thus Dr. Schultz's essay runs naturally off into the detailed examination of various works of ancient art.

La Piscine de Bethesda à Jerusalem. By C. Mauss. (Paris: Leroux.) This sumptuously edited volume is an indispensable addition to the libraries of all those who are interested in the archaeology and topography of Palestine. M. Mauss was the architect to whom was entrusted the work of restoring the Church of St. Anne on the north-east side of the Haram at Jerusalem; and the book he has just published contains an account of the archaeological discoveries made during the progress of the work, and is adorned with a profusion of valuable and beautifully executed illustrations. The main object of the book is to prove that the Church of St. Ann occupies part of the site of the Pool of Bethesda. The arguments in favour of this conclusion are drawn partly from the discoveries made under the foundations of the church, such as a mosaic pavement, a fragment of a column ornamented with Christian symbols, and the remains of aqueducts as well as of the "porches" of an ancient pool; partly from the evidence of old maps and writers like Antoninus, who visited Jerusalem at the beginning of the seventh century. The architectural training of M. Mauss lends special authority to what he has to tell us.

Sculptures et Inscriptions de Palmyre à la Glyptothèque de Ny Carlsberg. Décrites et expliquées par D. Simonsen. (Copenhagen: Lind.) It is to be hoped that this catalogue will attract the attention of some of the orientalistes now in congress at Stockholm to the unique collection of antiquities from Palmyra brought together by Mr. Carl Jacobsen, with the assistance of the Danish consul at Beyrout. They consist, in the main, of funerary monuments, sculptured in high relief, dating from the two centuries that preceded the destruction of Zenobia's city by the Romans. A number of them, evidently portraits of the deceased, are here reproduced in photogravures, which show the peculiar form of art represented—that of the Greek decadence—and also enable us to recognise the elaborate nature of the dress and ornaments worn. One of them is a mummy. In many cases the monuments bear inscriptions in Aramaean, giving little more than the family names of the deceased, with conventional expressions of mourning. These inscriptions have been carefully reproduced by zincography, with the assistance of Prof. J. Euting, of Strassburg. Though several of both the monuments and the inscriptions have already been published, this complete catalogue to the collection forms an invaluable aid to the study of Palmyrene art. It is beautifully printed—as, indeed, are most of the publications that reach us from Scandinavia.

THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

THE thirty-second Annual Report on the National Portrait Gallery records the purchase of seven new works and the acquisition by gift of double that number. One of the most interesting of those bought is a view of "The Court of Chancery as held openly in Westminster Hall, during the Reign of George I." It shows the four judges of the court—Lord Chancellor Macclesfield, Solicitor-General Sir Philip Yorke (afterwards Lord Chancellor Hardwicke), Sir Thomas Pengelly, and another, possibly Sir Joseph Jekyll—seated against the tapestried south wall of Westminster Hall, clad in black gowns, long wigs, and hanging cravats. On a green-covered table in front lie the chancellor's mace and the purse of the great seal. About sixty heads appear in the picture, which is a curiously vivid glimpse into the past of our law courts. It is the work of Benjamin Ferrers—a deaf and dumb artist known by his portrait of Bishop Hoadly in the Bodleian, and by his portrait of Bishop Beveridge, mezzotinted by Sherwin. Formerly in the possession of the Earl of Hardwicke, it was acquired at the Wimpole sale. Here, too, was bought a three-quarters length of the Earl of Macclesfield, the presiding judge in the former picture, painted by Kneller, in 1714, when he was Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. Another example of Kneller's work is a half-length of Charles Montague, Earl of Halifax, president of the Royal Society, and the friend of Pope and Newton. A curious picture is the portrait of the Earl of Rochester, the boon companion of Charles II., by Wissing, where he appears, richly dressed, in the act of placing a laurel-crown on the head of a monkey, which has torn up some papers and offers him a scrap. By Michael Wright is a portrait of Thomas Chiffinch, the confidant of Charles II., and keeper of his jewels and pictures; by Mireveldt is a highly important picture of Sir Horace Vere, Baron Tilbury, celebrated for his military exploits in the Netherlands; and by Kneller a portrait of Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, lord high treasurer in the time of James II. The gifts include a full-length of the Duke of Cumberland, by Jervas, in the robes of the Order of the Bath; the Countess of Sunderland, second daughter of the Duke of Marlborough, by Sir Godfrey Kneller; the poet Cowper, a drawing by W. Harvey after the well-known engraved picture by Abbot; busts by the late M. Noble of Lieut.-General Sir James Yorke Scarlett, G.C.B., and Harriet Elizabeth, Duchess of Sutherland; Sir John Watson-Gordon's portrait of Sir William Molesworth, editor of Hobbes; a bust-portrait of Clarke, the traveller, by Opie; and the full-length seated portrait of John Bright, by Oulless, etched by Rajon, which was sold last May at Christies'. The trustees record their satisfaction that through the offer of an anonymous donor they "have at last a prospect of seeing the portraits located in a building worthy of the collection," which now comprises a total of 879 works.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE annual autumn exhibition of pictures in the Walker Art Gallery at Liverpool will open on Monday next, September 2.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. announce a new serial publication, to be called the Cabinet Portrait Gallery. Each monthly part will contain three cabinet-sized photographs of eminent men and women of the day, with accompanying biographical sketches. The photographs are taken by Messrs. W. & D. Downey, and are reproduced by the Woodburytype process.

Two memorial brasses of the Washington family have been stolen from the parish church of Sulgrave, near Banbury. Though even the late Col. Chester was unable to prove the steps in the pedigree, we believe it is generally admitted that George Washington was descended from the Sulgrave family. From the American side, the earliest ancestor is a Laurence Washington, who emigrated to Virginia with a brother John, and died there in 1676. The difficulty is to find the father of Laurence and John, the old explanation of Sir Isaac Heard, Garter King of Arms, having been exploded by Col. Chester's genealogical researches.

MESSRS. C. H. SHANNON and C. S. Ricketts—two artists of kindred tastes, some of whose work may be seen by the general public in the current number of the Universal Review, illustrating a remarkable story by Mr. Julian Corbett—have conspired to produce for a more limited circle a serial art publication of their own, to which they have given the name of the Dial. Concerning the letterpress, we do not propose to say much, except that the sentiments are French, if not gaulois, and that the style throughout bears marks of immaturity. The draftsmen are more at home in their proper medium. The cover, the initial letters, and the plates alike make a frank appeal to feelings and to methods that have yet to win popularity in this country. Boldness of imagination, not to be deterred from attempting the mystical by the risk of reaching the grotesque, deserves acknowledgment in proportion to its rarity. And we are better pleased to record the large measure of success which Mr. Shannon at least has attained in the most difficult forms of illustration, than to point out certain minor details that we could have wished otherwise. Those who are in sympathy with this newest aspiration of English art should address themselves to Mr. Shannon, The Vale, King's-road, Chelsea.

THE STAGE.

The London Stage: its History and Traditions from 1576 to 1888. By H. Barton Baker. In 2 vols. (W. H. Allen.)

MR. BAKER's book, which is a sort of complement to Our Old Actors, is less comprehensive in its scope than the title and a few words in the preface might suggest. He does not attempt to write a philosophical history, to analyse any remarkable plays, to trace the development of the actor's art, or to point out the connexion between public taste and dramatic phenomena at different periods. Beginning with a rather full account of the Elizabethan stage, he simply makes it his business to narrate the varying fortunes of every London theatre, both past and present, and is content to devote about thirty pages to the other matters which receive his attention. Like Dr. Doran, whose mantle he seems anxious to catch, he seldom rises above the level of the anecdotic style. Yet, humble as his aim may be, such a work as this is unquestionably wanted, since the information it conveys is not to be obtained elsewhere in a compendious form. Mr. Baker has failed to make a very good use of his opportunity. His volumes are certainly full of interest, but the way in which he treats the subject is open to adverse criticism on several points.

The most conspicuous defect in The London Stage is a too frequent want of accuracy. Mr. Baker, to do him justice, has a fear that in this respect he is not wholly blameless. "It would be too much to expect," he writes at the outset in reference to dates, "that errors have not crept in. Printers have a happy knack of confusing the figures 3, 5, and 8." The obvious reply to this plea is that he should have taken the trouble to compare his proofs with the MS. But some of his mistakes are not due to the happy knack he mentions. Addison's "Rosamond" came forth in 1707, not 1770. Mrs. Siddons's last appearance on the stage was later than in 1817. Robertson's "Caste" was produced in 1867, not 1869. Mr. Baker has a right sense of the importance of Mr. Irving's career, but this does not prevent him from assigning "The Bells" to the year 1872 instead of 1871, or the Lyceum revival of "Richelieu" to 1874 instead of 1873. In the spelling of names, too, he is often at fault. Genest appears as Geneste, Marguerite de l'Epine as Marguerite l'Epine, Erekman as Erekman, the translator of "Don Quixote" as Motteaux, the heroine of "An Unequal Match" as Hesther Grasebrook, Adrienne Lecouvreur as Lecouvreur, and Diderot's Paradoxe sur le Comédien as the "Paradox d'un Comédien." Again, Mr. Baker is scarcely fortunate in affecting an intimate knowledge of the old French stage. "Betterton," he says, "accompanied Davenant to Paris to study the arrangements of the theatres, and must have seen the great Baron act, and Champmeslé, and Dumesnil" (sic). It seems almost cruel to remark that at the time in question (1661) Baron was hardly out of the nursery, that Champmeslé had yet to desert her father's home at Rouen to go on the boards, and that half a century was to elapse before Dumesnil even came into the world. The chief players seen by Betterton in Paris must have been Molière, Floridor, and Montfleury.

Mr. Baker's studies of the poetic drama do not appear to have educated his ear in the niceties of verse. His feeling for metre and rhythm is at best slight. In recording the progress of Italian opera in England, for instance, he asks us to believe that John Byrom's epigram upon Handel and Buononcini (which, as though to show how hard old errors die, he ascribes to Swift) was as follows:

"Some say that Signor Buononcini Compared to Handel's a mere ninny;
While others say that to him Handel,
Is hardly fit to hold a candle;
Strange that such difference should be
'Twixt Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee!"

Let us now quote this sneer at the opera, or rather at music in general, as the satirist wrote it:

"Some say, compared to Buononcini,
That Mynheer Handel's but a ninny;
Others aver that he to Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle;
Strange all this difference should be
'Twixt Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee!"

Except upon one hypothesis, it is impossible to understand how Mr. Baker came to pass his version of the epigram without verifying it. Another sign of verse-deafness is to be found in his quotation of Lord Rochester's attack upon the players who made public sport of the peculiarities of Mohun in his decrepitude:—

"These blades, indeed, are cripples in their art;
Mimic the foot, but not the speaking part.
Let them the Traitor or Volpone try,
Could they rage like Cethegus or like Cassius die?"

Rochester had not a few sins to answer for, but he was surely incapable of writing such a line as the last of those just cited.

Some of the opinions expressed by Mr. Baker are quite untenable. He sees in Garrick the greatest actor that England, or perhaps the world, has ever known. It is not often possible to prove or disprove an assertion like this, as the ephemeral stories of the stage are hardly to be perpetuated by the highest literary skill. But if the greatness of an actor is to be measured by the extent of his tragic force—a proposition which to us is beyond dispute—the claim here put forward in behalf of Garrick must be rejected. Nothing he did had so powerful an effect upon playgoers as that produced by Edmund Kean in the most vivid scenes of "Othello," "Richard III.," "Hamlet," "Macbeth," "Lear," "The Merchant of Venice," and "A New Way to pay Old Debts." It was not for "Punch," as Johnson perhaps too harshly called his old schoolfellow, to make "the pit rise at him." He was deficient in earnestness, in sincerity, and in the gift of self-abandonment. In the midst of an impressive scene he would jest with friends standing at the wings. "We cannot help being sceptical," wrote Leigh Hunt, "about Garrick's talents in characters of deep and serious interest, since off the stage he was little better than a quick-eyed trifle, full of phrases of gabbling jargon, and coarse-minded withal." His sway over the world of passion, too, was comparatively small. Kean identified his name not only with characters which Garrick for a time made his own—Richard III. and Lear—but with characters in which Garrick failed or shrank from appearing—Othello, Shylock, Iago, and Sir Giles Overreach. It should also be borne in mind that Kean lived in a far more critical and exacting age than that which preceded the intellectual agitation induced by the Revolution. Altogether, instead of merely being the tragedian who came "nearest to Garrick," as Mr. Baker is good enough to allow, he surpassed his predecessor by many palpable degrees.

Nor does our author's judgment become more trustworthy as he passes on. He betrays a curious lack of penetration in regard to the principal actor of our own day. Mr. Irving is described in one place as the present representative of the school founded by Macready, and in another as a disciple, though in no way an imitator, of Charles Fechter. How Mr. Baker reconciles these inconsistencies he neglects to tell us. As a matter of fact, Mr. Irving's style, whether we relish it or not, is quite peculiar to himself, and has as little in common with the cheap statuesqueness of Macready as with the cheap picturesqueness of Fechter. No less unhappy than Mr. Baker's effort to trace a descent of theatrical method is a part of his criticism upon Miss Terry. According to him, it is in "The Amber Heart" that her genius rises to its highest point. He is right in admiring the exquisite tenderness and grace of her impersonation in the piece; but to affirm what he does is to imply that she cannot avail herself of the larger scope afforded her in the "Merchant of Venice," "Hamlet," "Faust," and, above all, "Much Ado about Nothing."

Of this readable yet disappointing book there is little more to say. Mr. Baker, though evidently well posted up in the history of the modern stage, is guilty of at least three serious omissions. Signor Salvini, who created so deep an impression at Drury Lane about fourteen years ago, is never referred to; the association of Mr. Irving and Mr. Edwin Booth at the Lyceum in 1881, interesting as for various reasons it was, is passed over in complete silence; and for any information as to "All for Her"—one of the few plays of recent times that take rank as literature—we must not go to the account of the theatre at which it was first produced.

If a second edition of The London Stage should be called for, Mr. Baker would do well to test his statements of fact, reconsider his most cherished views, and strive to make his record adequate within its prescribed limits, as in that case he might readily impart to his volumes a worth which, while provided with a good chronological table and index, they do not at present possess.

LITERATURE.

A Century of Revolution. By W. S. Lilly. (Chapman & Hall.)

"A CENTO from the Revolutionists" would be a more appropriate title for this volume. Mr. Lilly tries to show by a series of extracts from a certain number of writers, whom he chooses to regard as authorised representatives or apologists of the French Revolution, that its principles are fatal to true liberty, hostile to religion and morality, degrading to art, inconsistent with science, and injurious to legitimate democracy. Christianity, on the other hand—especially, we are left to suppose, under the form of Roman Catholicism—is eminently liberal and ennobling in its tendencies, as well as perfectly compatible with the Darwinian theory. By an unfortunate misunderstanding, saints have often appeared as persecutors, while the exclusive advocacy of toleration has been left to unbelievers; but in future the opposing parties will assume their true relative positions as friends and enemies of liberty and knowledge.

Mr. Lilly is himself a sincere and earnest—in some respects even what would be called in England an advanced—Liberal; and much of the work done a hundred years ago by the National Assembly seems to meet with his hearty approval. What he attacks as fatally mischievous to the true interests of France both then and now is the principle of popular sovereignty exercised through universal suffrage. According to him, this principle, as expounded in Rousseau's Contrat Social, implies the natural goodness of all men, their equal fitness to pass judgment on political questions, and, implicitly, the decision of moral issues by reference to a majority of votes. He points out the incompatibility of the first postulate—that is the natural goodness of mankind—with the Christian doctrine of a fall, and deduces from it the hostility towards religion shown by the first French Revolutionists and by their successors, the present rulers of France. Now, were this explanation correct it would only account for their rejection of those forms of Christianity which involve a belief in human depravity; whereas the essential part of Mr. Lilly's case is to prove that the Revolution as such wages war, not only on Christianity, but on every kind of theism (p. 57). Mr. Lilly cannot be unaware that Rousseau was himself a devout theist, and that his chief disciple Robespierre sent the atheistic worshippers of Reason to the guillotine. He must know also that Mr. John Morley, from whose writings he quotes largely in order to prove the anti-Christian character of the Revolution, is no believer either in the natural goodness of man or in any other of Rousseau's metaphysical principles. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the republican statesmen of modern France draw their inspiration from the Contrat Social. The parliamentary system which they have established and are now struggling to uphold was particularly hateful to Rousseau. Were that philosopher now framing a constitution for France he would probably give her a strong and independent executive, tempered by the reference of every new law to a mass vote of the people. In fact, the plebiscitary system of Gen. Boulanger would go nearer to realising his ideas than any régime that has ever been tried in France.

However this may be, no far-fetched reason is needed to explain the attitude of more or less active hostility towards Catholicism, towards Christianity, and even towards every form of theism, which undoubtedly characterises most continental revolutionists and some English Radicals. It is natural that the persons who disregard authority and tradition in practice should also disregard them in theory; and it is on authority and tradition that the claims of faith most often rest. Conversely, the adherents of ancient creeds have generally shown a marked predilection for ancient institutions; while Christianity, in particular, has tended from the very beginning to league itself with the powers that be. When modern revolutionists attack the Church, we must remember that they often do so in self-defence. Those who sang a Te Deum to celebrate the destruction of the Second Republic by a perjured assassin; who gave their support to the despotism of the Second Empire through its whole duration, except when it was allied with Italian freedom; and who, after its fall, sought to establish what would have been the worse tyranny of Henri V.—these men should not complain if they are treated with distrust or enmity by the Third Republic. Mr. Lilly affects to wonder at the eagerness with which Darwinism has been welcomed by the revolutionists. Darwinism is no doubt unfavourable to the foolish notion that all human beings are born with equal capabilities for wisdom and virtue; but it is much more obviously destructive to the Catholic doctrine of a fall, and its significance in this respect has been much more justly appreciated by Dr. Franz Delitzsch than by our author.

Passing to the domain of art, we find an even worse confusion of ideas. Nothing but the blindest partisanship could in one and the same polemic make the Revolution responsible both for the metaphysical politics of Rousseau and for the realistic method of M. Zola. According to the latter, as here cited,

"the problem is to know what a certain passion, acting in a certain environment and in certain circumstances, will produce as regards the individual and society. And the way to solve it is to take the facts in nature, then to study their mechanism by bringing to bear upon them the modifications of circumstances and environments" (pp. 151 sq.);

while Rousseau assumes

"an abstract, an unrelated, a universal man: identical in all ages, in all latitudes, in all races, in all states of civilisation" (p. 167).

The typical novelist of Rousseau's Revolution is, in fact, Victor Hugo, not M. Zola; but it would not have suited Mr. Lilly's purpose to single out that great idealist as the object of his assault.

Interwoven with the criticism on M. Zola's naturalism—a sufficiently just although misplaced criticism—is a violent attack upon Paul Bert, at whose probable damnation the author not obscurely hints (p. 102). The physiological experiments of that ill-fated savant are skilfully used so as to make his anti-clerical policy odious in the eyes of the English public. Without being stated in so many words, it is implied that radicalism in politics, atheism in speculation, and vivisection in science are logically connected with one another. Nevertheless some very orthodox and conservative people are known to approve of experiments on living animals, when performed in the interest of scientific research; while others who hold very advanced opinions in religion and politics regard them with profound abhorrence. Mr. Lilly is, of course, free to argue against vivisection as a method of investigation, although the way in which he uses it to illustrate the artistic method of M. Zola suggests an almost inconceivable ignorance of what experiment means. But he is not free to denounce it on moral grounds after penning the following passage:

"The supreme law which rules throughout the universe is a law of tendency upward, of striving after perfection. . . . What a flood of light is hereby thrown upon that deep saying that 'the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together,' waiting for the deliverance! 'In pain'; pain everywhere; pain throughout the boundless battlefield, the illimitable sepulchre of creation, but everywhere the necessary instrument of advance, not fruitless. . . . Darwinism tells me of law reigning throughout this universe of pain and death. Conscience replies, 'Yes; supremely just law. And that is enough for thee to know. Cease thy foolish pratings of happiness and unhappiness. . . . Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' " (pp. 127 sq.).

What is this but describing the Creator as an almighty Paul Bert?

When Mr. Lilly attempts to represent Catholic Christianity as the indispensable basis of liberty he is no more fortunate than when he attempts to reconcile its dogmas with the results of science. In defining liberty as "the unimpeded use of any faculty" (p. 18), he virtually admits that to be complete it must include free thought and free speech; and there are abundant indications throughout the volume that liberty understood in this comprehensive sense is, according to his philosophy, a simple human right. But to assert that this great principle is, under the name of freedom of conscience, an essential element of Christianity, seems, to say the least of it, rather audacious. Nobody can claim freedom of opinion, or, if the term be preferred, of conscience, as a personal right unless he is prepared to concede the same right to those who differ from him; and that is just what Catholic ecclesiastics, at any rate, have never done until they were compelled. What Christian martyrs in all ages have suffered for was not free conscience, but what they considered to be truth. Mr. Lilly readily admits that during many centuries even the saints of his church persecuted without the slightest scruple, and that "the man who gave the death-blow to theological persecution was no St. François de Sales, no St. Vincent de Paul, no Wesley, no Butler, but Voltaire" (pp. 29 sq.). His apology is that "the modern conception of religious liberty was impossible in the Middle Ages," because "religious unity was the keystone of mediæval polity," and so in the mediæval inquisition he "recognises a relative right" (p. 29). That is not a question that need be here discussed. I would only ask, what then becomes of

"the belief in justice, in the old sense, as something quite transcending mere expediency—fiat justitia pereat mundus" (p. 95), and of "the acknowledgment that there are eternal immutable principles and rules of right and wrong . . . the everlasting adamant upon which alone the social edifice can be surely established" (p. 195).

Either justice is not immutable, or human beings had as much right to be left in undisturbed possession of their religious opinions in the thirteenth century as they have in the nineteenth. If, on the other hand, it was justifiable to maintain the status quo by violent measures against the Albigenses, then it is equally justifiable to maintain it by violent measures against the Jesuits now.

Mr. Lilly makes much of the Catholic (not necessarily the Christian) doctrine of freewill as a support of liberty. Yet believers in that metaphysical subtlety have never felt precluded by their own principles from applying coercion to the volitions of their neighbours; nor have determinists been rendered more prone to impede anyone in the use of his own faculties because they were convinced that the mode of exercise depends on a balance of motives. Mr. Lilly enumerates Stoicism among the factors of modern European liberty. Is he ignorant of the fact that the Stoics were rigid necessarians? Scarcely, or he would have mentioned them along with "Plato and Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas, Leibnitz, and Kant" (p. 84), as supporters of freewill. By the way, the list of names here paraded is open to some exception. The point at issue had not been properly mooted in Plato's time; but his utterances, such as they are, show a tendency in the direction of determinism. It would be interesting to know where Leibnitz has expressed a belief in freewill, which would have been fatal to his theory of a pre-established harmony. As to the matter in dispute, Mr. Lilly contents himself with repeating the time-dishonoured arguments of his school; but here again his rhetorical fluency hurries him into assertions that flatly contradict his original thesis. He assures us that were the views of Mr. John Morley to prevail, "the human mammal" would be handed over "helpless and impotent to the blind impulses of egoism, to the terrible heritage of savage instincts, accumulated in his nervous system, and now barely held in check by religion and philosophy" (p. 89). . . . Such is the necessary, the inevitable effect, upon the public order of that determinism which is a primary dogma of the revolutionary religion" (p. 91).

If free will is a reality it cannot be abolished by a belief in its own non-existence. And, assuming it to exist, you have no right to predicate necessity and inevitability of results which in the last resort must depend on human volitions—least of all when they are exercised in circumstances of which you have no experience whatever.

Mr. Lilly has endeavoured to take his place as an assessor by the side of such judges as M. Taine and Prof. Goldwin Smith, without the learning or the wisdom which make their sentences on the Revolution so terrible and so conclusive. He is, in fact, too much infected with the intellectual vices of the Revolutionists to estimate their work at its right value. "A few gaudy phrases, a few specious formulas, a few abstract ideas, an illimitable self-confidence, and an ebullient enthusiasm were," he tells us, "their equipment for the work of re-creating society" (p. 10); and such seem to be his own qualifications for the work of protecting society against the spread of revolutionary doctrines at the present day.

ALFRED W. BENN.

The Bird-Bride. A Volume of Ballads and Sonnets. By Graham Tomson. (Longmans.)

Or the ballads and sonnets which give their second title to this book of verses, the present writer must plead guilty to preferring the sonnets. For one thing, the ballads are written in a language that is perhaps Scotch, but is not English; and so an Englishman instinctively shuns it, preferring fourteen lines that he can understand to fifty in a strange tongue. And, for another thing, no ballad worth reading can now be written. We lack all the conditions that made that poetry possible—fresh feeling, a fresh outlook on the world, a fresh vocabulary. Of the best in this kind we must say, as Matthew Arnold said of much of our lives, that it "is eloquent, is well, but 'tis not true."

Of our author's ballads, it must be owned that they are eloquent and well written. The lines flow easily, and if there are no surprising heights, there are also no depths. Moreover, the subjects are such as, if ballads be at all allowable, may fairly be chosen for them. "The Bird-Bride," after which by a perverse modern fashion the whole volume is named, is an Eskimo legend of a man who won and lost a sea-gull for his mate. Other titles are "The Cruel Priest" (he slew the bride, whom he loved, to prevent her marrying the bridegroom), "Deid Folks Ferry," "The Blind Ghost," "The Fause Brither," and "The Ballad of Pentyre Toun." Among them, and looking curiously out of place, is a poem in the manner of "The Stream's Secret," very pre-Raphaelite.

Turning to the sonnets, we come upon the following to Boccaccio, which contains an idea we never remember seeing expressed before.

"Now let you idle tales forgotten be (Forsaken follies of a fervid youth)
And set on high my strivings after truth;
Lest women young and fair cry shame on me,
Saying, 'For sure a graceless knave was he,
Some lewd, light jongleur of the drinking booth.'"

In vain, Boccaccio, these are dead, in sooth—
And those, foredoomed to immortality."

The sonnets to Herodotus and Omar Khayyám are less successful. They are descriptions, not thoughts, and should not be addressed to the persons described. They remind one somewhat of that disagreeable form of testimonial which fond friends sometimes write to instead of about you. "Blind Man's Holiday" is another capital sonnet; and hardly less good is "Hereafter," although students might find fault with the misunderstanding of a famous verse in the Apocalypse: "There was no more sea." It must not be objected to the sonnets that they are written in Rossettian cadences. No one not a born metrician can now write them in any other way.

The third section of the book, entitled "Verses," is, to the present reviewer, the most interesting of all, and "Arsinoë's Cats" its most interesting piece. This might very well be a translation from the Greek Anthology.

"Arsinoë the fair, the amber-tressed,
Is mine no more;
Cold as the unsmiling snows are is her breast,
And closed her door.
No more her ivory feet and tresses braided
Make glad mine eyes;
Snapt are my viol-strings, my flowers are faded—
My love-lamp dies.

"Yet, once, for dewy myrtle-buds and roses,
All summer long,
We searched the twilight-haunted garden closes
With jest and song.
Ay, all is over now—my heart hath changed
Its heaven for hell;
And that ill chance which all our love estranged
In this wise fell.

"A little lion, small and dainty sweet (For such there be!)
With sea-grey eyes and softly stepping feet,
She prayed of me.
For this, through lands Egyptian far away
She bade me pass;
But in an evil hour I said her nay—
And now, alas!
Far-travelled Nicias hath wooed and won Arsinoë
With gifts of furry creatures, white and dun,
From over-sea."

Among the poet's other pieces, every lover of poetry will find something to his taste, if nothing quite so out of the common as this. Many will remember the charming "Scythe Song" that first appeared in Longman's Magazine. "Fleur-de-lys" is a pretty conceited piece. "A Silhouette" recalls Mr. Dobson, both in style and workmanship. "Bygones" is an original enough echo of Mr. Swinburne. Some half-dozen religious poems that there are cannot be said to be very helpful. One called "The Quick and the Dead" appears to regard the great boon gained from death to be a conscious share in the process of all natural life; just as if what little consciousness we have of our own processes was not among the greatest miseries of life. Certainly, sympathy will be a real thing in the day when we share in each other's digestion.

"Oh! but the life of me! gathering, growing,
Emmet and butterfly, flower and thorn,
Poppy and rose in the gold sun glowing,
Over and over unmade, reborn.

It is not nature who speaks here, but the dead individual! A poem called "The Smile of all Wisdom" seems a little contradictory. It tells how the sculptor of the sphinx found this smile of which he was in search not among the living, but in the face of the dead; and yet not, as one would have judged, because the dead become such thorough naturalists, but because they know that they know nothing.

"Lo, we have lifted the veil—there was nothing to see!
Lo, we have looked on the scroll—there was nothing to learn!"

Perhaps our author, very properly, does not regard natural science as useful knowledge.

The "Hymn of Labour," again, seems to give dubious counsel.

"Strive for the strife's sake only, smite nor foeman nor friend,
Strive for the strife's sake only, set no shrine for an end;
Set no goal for the winning, no bright bourn for the scope;
Ask no guerdon of praise, and hope thou nothing from Hope.

So shalt thou come to thy reaping."

Surely "sowing for sowing's sake" is a puzzling gospel. However, there are but a few of these pieces, and our censure has already exceeded all due proportion.

The last section of the book is by no means the least entertaining. The ballades and villanelles have much of the facility and felicity of Mr. Lang's achievements in this kind. "Love the guest" is especially happy in one key, and in another "Betty Barnes the Cook." The volume, in short, well deserves purchase. It is not at all the first book of a coming poet, it is too smoothly written for that; but smooth and graceful writing has its value. Against one word only should we like to raise a protest—the word "wavering." Our author's birds "waver" too much, recalling another poet's "flitterbats."

"STATESMEN SERIES."—The Marquis of Dalhousie. By Capt. L. F. Trotter. (W. H. Allen.)

It would be hard to overpraise this miniature biography of a great man. The life of Lord Dalhousie—abridged as it was, yet abundant in result—is here summarised by Capt. Trotter with fullness of knowledge and due literary skill. He has also had the benefit of most valuable aid from personal friends of the deceased nobleman, as is duly set forth in a modest preface.

James Andrew Ramsay was born, in 1812, of a good old Lowland stock, and educated at Harrow and at Christchurch. Among his early associates were Cardinal Manning, Mr. Gladstone, the younger Canning, James Bruce—afterwards Lord Elgin—Robert Phillimore, and Liddell, the present venerable Dean of Christchurch. Heir to a dilapidated Scottish peerage, the young man began public life, in his twenty-third year, as a follower of Sir Robert Peel. Defeated in his first candidature, Lord Ramsay two years afterwards was more successful, entering the House of Commons as member for Haddingtonshire. Next year, however, he was moved to the Upper House by the death of his father. In 1839 he married the sister of the present Marquess of Tweeddale; and soon after he joined the Conservative government as Vice-President of the Board of Trade, his chief being his old fellow-student, Mr. Gladstone. On the resignation of the latter Dalhousie became his successor, entering the cabinet as President of the Board. It was the time of the budding of the railway system; and the young minister showed his true character at once. Working fourteen hours a day, he soon elaborated a scheme for giving state control to the nascent enterprise. His scheme did not find favour with his colleagues, or much subsequent expense and trouble would have been prevented.

In 1847 Dalhousie was appointed to succeed Hardinge as Governor-General of British India, and in the first month of the following year he landed in Calcutta. All sorts of peaceful expectations were professed in the best-informed circles; but those optimistic opinions were rudely falsified in a very few months by the rebellion of Mulraj at Multan, soon joined by most of the leaders and men of the lately conquered Sikh army. At the famous dinner at Barrackpore, in October, the new governor-general, after alluding to the vain efforts that he had made to keep the peace, concluded his speech with the historical words: "The Sikh nation has called for war; and war, gentlemen, they shall have with a vengeance." The war ended, as we all know, with the conclusive victory of Gujarat, February 21, 1848; and Dalhousie instantly, on his own responsibility, without waiting for sanction from home, and in direct opposition to the views and arguments of Henry Lawrence, annexed the Punjab. His bold action was confirmed by the court of directors, and the Queen made him a marquis. The Punjab was placed under the control of a board of administration, in which the malcontent Henry was furnished with two tame elephants to keep him in order. But it would not work; and ultimately the knight errant had to be transferred to Rajputana, and John Lawrence became supreme. The next remarkable incident in the career of Dalhousie was his quarrel with Sir Charles Napier, of which some account was lately given in the ACADEMY when we had to review Mr. Holmes's Four Great Soldiers. Some farther trouble with Henry Lawrence ensued. But the next serious trial of his quality was to come from a different quarter. The food and transport of the armies employed in the late war had been costly; and it was resolved to prosecute the contractor, Lala Joti Prasad, on charges of fraud. The trial was conducted before a civilian judge and a mixed jury, by whom the accused was acquitted. Dalhousie suffered in prestige on this occasion—deservedly as most people thought.

In 1852 Dalhousie entered on an inevitable war with Burma. He became his own war minister, and displayed astonishing energy. The sea-board of Pegu was conquered in a few months, and the interior country secured by the end of the year. Lower Burma was annexed with the entire acquiescence of the Burmese inhabitants. As Capt. Trotter says, the whole affair was a triumph of "masterly common-sense."

Next year Dalhousie sustained a severe blow in the death of his wife; and his own health, which seems never to have been strong, showed symptoms of giving way. But he found a temporary cure in increased labour. "Work, work," was his first cry on hearing of his domestic misfortune; and the result quickly appeared in many branches of the public service. Cheap postage, railways, electric telegraphs, a new and well-endowed department of public works, were among these first fruits. But his health grew worse, and his medical men counselled retirement. Dalhousie firmly refused, unostentatiously replying to the advice that he believed it to be his duty to remain in India until his work was done. Many legal and social ameliorations followed; and "the doctrine of lapse" was applied to many native States—a subject on which a few words will have to be said before concluding.

Finally came the great debatable act of all—the annexation of Oudh. It has often been claimed by Dalhousie's more ardent partisans that this measure—which was undeniably one of the causes of the outbreak of 1857—was ordered by the court of directors or the British government in opposition to Dalhousie. Capt. Trotter repeats this contention, urging that his hero "was, in fact, opposed to the annexation of Oudh," and that "his part in the transaction was the last sacrifice which he made on the altar of duty." Now, by turning back only one page, we find that Dalhousie's scheme for the better government of this unhappy province was that "the Company should take the whole government for ever into their own hands." Those who can see any real distinction between this and annexation are surely more scholastic than practical.

Dalhousie did nothing to prevent the evils that were preparing the tragedy of the coming years. Had he understood the condition of the native army in Bengal he would have amended the recruiting by which the tribes, castes, and creeds, were mixed, so as to make each regiment the exact counterpart of the others; he would have improved the pension rules; endeavoured to make regimental work acceptable to the European officers; and provided for the speedy mobilisation of the troops when required.

Dalhousie's reputation as an administrator must always stand among the very highest. He earned it by constant vigilance, labour, clear insight, and utter fearlessness of responsibility and of opposition. His masterfulness might sometimes grate upon the minds of able subordinates. For example, of Herbert Edwardes he wrote to Henry Lawrence:

"There are more than Major Edwardes who appear to think themselves governor-general at least. The sooner you set about disenchanting their minds the better for your comfort and their own. . . . For my part, I will not stand it for half an hour, and will come down unmistakably upon any of them who may try it on."

Nor was his language much more gentle in cases where the difference of opinion was with Lawrence himself. But the times were trying, and every man in difficulties must use his own character as one of the weapons with which he has been provided. That he was not without tender consideration for the feelings of others when such could safely be shown many private letters and anecdotes are recorded to demonstrate.

For the rest, the work Dalhousie did is written large on the pages of Indian history. There is hardly a point among the attainments of the Indian Government for which his measures did not directly make preparation. The exception is in matters pertaining to the army, as to which he may be thought to have been somewhat lacking in complete wisdom and foresight. The very points which he failed to grasp in military administration are those which conduced to the troubles of the great Mutiny; and here alone his successors have found work to do which is foreign to Dalhousie's administrative schemes.

The question of his rank as a statesman is a more open question, the solution of which will differ according to a fundamental difference of opinion. It has always been a besetting vice—in the view of some critics—for Anglo-Indians to over-estimate the value of English rule for the Indian populations. Surrounded by advisers of that class, even an original and clear-sighted governor would be liable in the long run to receive a bias. In the political minutes of Lord Dalhousie—as in the columns of the able weekly paper which was his undoubted organ of communication with the English-reading public—we see a strong conviction ever manifested. That conviction was that no opportunity should be missed which might allow of the extension of modern European government into native territory. The failure of actual offspring was regarded as such an opportunity. Adoption, it was admitted, conveyed heirship under Hindu and Muhammadan law. But inheritance to political power—unless directly sanctioned in each case—adoption did not give. A distinction was sometimes allowed when the adoption was made in a state which had maintained a certain independence. But in general adoption was not recognised as a means of transmitting political power; and the cases of Sambalpur, Satara, and Jhansi all showed the determination of the British government to avail itself of the failure of natural progeny and to set aside the succession of adopted heirs. This distinction between one sort of succession and another was opposed to public opinion; and one of the first consequences of the assumption of royal authority in India after the suppression of the revolt was its formal abolition. Those who question the propriety of introducing English rule in countries not accustomed to it, and where the people have not been consulted, will always be able to point to this reversal of policy as a sign that Dalhousie's statesmanship was most seriously defective in this particular.

In 1856 the marquis quitted the scene of his labours, prematurely but permanently broken down. Four years he lingered on in enforced retirement, beholding with proud patience the tragical doings in India and the attempts made to saddle him with all the responsibility for them. Most readers will agree with Captain Trotter that time and truth will do much to vindicate the memory of one of the most laborious and faithful servants that this country has ever lent to her remote dependency.

William Hazlitt, Essayist and Critic. Selections from his Writings. With a Memoir, Biographical and Critical. By Alexander Ireland. (Frederick Warne.)

HAZLITT can be well represented by a book of this kind, and Mr. Ireland's "labour of love" is such a selection as Hazlitt himself might have pronounced "liable, congruent, and measurable." The biographical and critical memoir is forcibly written, and, considering the limited space, remarkably full. Mr. Ireland's modest wish that those who make their first acquaintance with Hazlitt in this volume may be inclined to seek a more intimate knowledge of him ought to be amply fulfilled; for there are here five hundred closely yet clearly printed pages of Hazlitt's best writing, on men and things, on poets, dramatists, novelists, on art, history, religion—a book for refreshment, consolation. The mere table of contents stirs speculation.

One omission may be noted. There is no extract from the Liber Amoris, the remarkable record of Hazlitt's love for Sarah Walker. Mr. Ireland justifies this by stating that "from the nature of its contents it would be impossible to convey a correct idea of it"—the Liber Amoris—"by detached passages." Detached passages are not needed. The first part, containing the seven brief dialogues, the two letters, and the note on the fly-leaf of Endymion, is complete in itself, and would have occupied only a few pages. Apart from the high quality of the work, it is unfortunate that there should be no extract from it, because of the light it throws on Hazlitt's character. It was Coleridge, he tells us, who wakened up "his dry and untractable understanding"; and in the same essay, the "First Acquaintance with Poets," he laments that "his heart has never found a heart to speak to." Hazlitt's love for Sarah Walker was not an infatuation, not an "insane passion"; nor was it, more than any other passionate love of which the world holds record, a vindication of "the ideal theory of Berkeley that mind is the great creator and matter a fable." For the first time, and after as unfortunate an experience of matrimony as ever befel a literary man, he had found "a heart to speak to." He is amazed at feeling himself in love in love in the old heroic way of the poets he loved so well. He is so overwhelmed with delight that he takes the words, the images at hand, and becomes coarse. He cannot use the lover's speech, but he can express himself in a breathless way of his own. Above all, he is made to believe that he is not hated by her he loves. He says "she was the only woman that ever made me think she loved me, and that feeling was so new to me and so delicious that it will never from my heart." He was deceived, or rather he deceived himself; but he had had his dream. He had known what it is to love passionately, and he had a gentler and a higher heart ever after. Listening to his pathetic appeal—"Do not mock me, for I am a child in love"—it is difficult to understand why his critics, with the signal exceptions of Lord Houghton and Mrs. Jamieson, should have echoed the sneers of his friends until they have succeeded in making Sarah Walker a byword.

During the twenty years that have elapsed since Mr. Ireland issued his admirable bibliography of Hazlitt, he must have noticed with chagrin how slight has been the growth of interest in this great writer. The cause of the indifference with which Hazlitt is still generally regarded appears to be twofold—the nature of his work, and the false bruit that attaches to his name. Criticism has to be renewed for each generation. In many respects the critic is like the actor. Both interpret for the men and women of their time, from the point of view of their time, the creations of others; and both take rank in England according to the value of their Shakesperian work. Criticism, like acting, is a kind of invention. On the stage the actor creates, or re-creates, characters that live with the lives of his audience, and therefore survive him so long as one old playgoer remains to say "I saw him act." The thought of his contemporaries is the only atmosphere in which the actor's creations can exist; or, at the longest, a few ghosts like Garrick's Richard III., Siddons's Lady Macbeth, and Kean's Othello, haunt the memory of posterity. Substitute the reading public for the theatrical audience, books for the stage, the critic for the actor; and, though there are divergencies, the above holds true in the main. Hazlitt's chief work is in literary criticism; and, while it is by no means certain that the best of it has been surpassed, any more than we dare to say that Mr. Irving excels Kean, we naturally prefer to know what our contemporaries are thinking, as we prefer the actual performance to the reported one. But there is a reason in Hazlitt's historical position why his work should receive more attention than it does. If not the greatest critic of his time, he is one of the greatest; and his greatness consists in this—that he had "the courage to say as an author what he felt as a man." With Coleridge and Lamb he introduced the new method. Literary criticism had been a scratching of the surface. They turned up the soil and showed the fresh earth; and Hazlitt was not the least lusty husbandman of the three. Yet his fame is dim compared with that of the others. It is true he performed no excelling service like Lamb's discovery of the Elizabethan dramatists, nor has he anything that may rank with Coleridge's poetry or Elia's humour. His gift was single, and his glory is single, though its lustre be dull. Misrepresentation of the man's life, like a corroding vapour, has tarnished the aureole. He was "paid with contempt while living," and, if not "with an epitaph," then with pity "when dead." Even Lamb, who lived one of the happiest lives of this century, has been pitied; and while it is to be resented, it cannot be wondered at that the melancholy Hazlitt should be commiserated, for vanity feeds on the degradation of others. With the exception of his father and his son his relations were not sources of satisfaction to him; his wives were anything but help-meets; he was often in economical straits; his health was bad; the whole outward circumstances of his life were dingy, but not more so than those of many a hermit who in rags and nameless discomfort communed with heaven night and day. There has been no pleasure in contemplating Hazlitt because he has been considered such a miserable fellow. Pity is akin to love, but it is also akin to despise; and it is common to hate the wretchedness that offends. When the great satisfaction that Hazlitt took in living is clearly understood his fame will grow brighter. His last words were, "Well, I've had a happy life"; and, since no man is a critic on his death-bed, it may be taken for an unpremeditated, impulsive cry as his years flashed past him, each laden with profound meditation on subjects of his own choosing.

JOHN DAVIDSON.

The History of the Parish Church of All Saints, Maidstone. By the Rev. J. Cave-Browne. (Maidstone: G. Bunyard.)

MAIDSTONE and its noble church have had no inconsiderable amount of attention paid to them by local historians. In 1741 the Rev. William Newton's MSS. collections relating to the parish were published. Just a century later, Mr. Whichcord, a meritorious architect, wrote an excellent notice of the church, in which he felt more than a professional interest; and a further history from the pen of Mr. Beale Poste, an antiquary of no mean repute, contributed much additional information. More recently there have appeared two minor works upon the same subject, which, it has remained for Mr. Cave-Browne to show, still admits of further treatment. He has dealt ably and adequately with the history of the fabric, its ministers, and its monuments; but he is constrained to admit that lack of space has prevented him from doing justice to the fourteen volumes of parish registers which include the period between the thirty-fourth year of King Henry VIII. and the end of the last century. He is probably right in leaving this field of research almost untouched; for the great merit of his history is that he has gone very thoroughly into its several parts, and, through his industry and acumen, has brought many new facts to light.

The antiquity of the church at Maidstone is unquestionable. The Domesday Book mentions the place under the head of the archbishop's possessions, and adds Ibi Ecclesia. No part of this structure has survived; and but few traces have been found of the later building—undoubtedly an important one—in which Archbishop Islip held a general diocesan synod in 1351, and which previous archbishops had occasionally used for ordinations and other purposes. From time to time tiles of an early design (belonging to the middle of the thirteenth century) have been found beneath the pavement of the existing church; but their position gave no certain indication of the area occupied by the older building. In truth, the restorer or refounder at the close of the fourteenth century did his work quite as completely as the most ruthless architect of modern times. St. Mary's Church became All Saints, and nearly every feature of the former structure disappeared in the conversion of the parish church into one of a collegiate character. It has been customary to attribute to Archbishop Courtenay the entire work of re-construction. Undoubtedly the general character of the building is perpendicular, and there is no question that the archbishop obtained licence from the king in 1395 to convert the then existing fabric to collegiate purposes; but Mr. Cave-Browne has discovered certain details which suggest that the church may have been adapted to its new uses rather than altogether built by Courtenay. It certainly seems easier to believe that he should have made some use of what was on the spot (as Wykeham did at Winchester) than that he should have levelled it to the ground. In the chancel or choir the archbishop's hand is clearly seen, and the Courtenay arms appear again and again upon the carved stalls. Here also stood—forming the most conspicuous object in the passage to the altar—the raised tomb of Archbishop Courtenay, of which only the slab with the matrix of the mired effigy now remains. Whether it ever covered the body of the primate is a vexed question. In his will he expressed a wish that he should be buried in Exeter Cathedral, but in a codicil this was revoked in favour of his own college at Maidstone.

"Yet in spite of that codicil, in spite of the once goodly tomb and gorgeous brass attesting the fact and protesting against all rival claims to that honour, a counter-claim is put forth in favour of an unnamed tomb in Canterbury Cathedral, which can show neither inscription nor escutcheon in support of such a claim."

Still, it is only fair to remember that the tradition of his interment at Canterbury dates back at least to the time of Archbishop Parker, and Somner—no mean authority—says:

"I find in a Leiger Book of Christ Church [Canterbury] that the King [Richard II.] happening to be at Canterbury when he [the Archbishop] was to be buried, upon the monks' suite it is like, overruled the matter and commanded his body to be here interred."

This Leiger Book is not now forthcoming, but the Chapter Library contains a MS. (endorsed with the date 1486) in which the above incident is glowingly described. But Mr. Cave-Browne is sceptical. If the MS. be no earlier than its endorsement its value as evidence is small; while it is a noteworthy fact that in the official record of the burials of archbishops preserved in the cathedral library, and known as the Dies Obituales, not a word is said as to the interment of Courtenay within the cathedral walls. The epitaph upon the tomb at Maidstone is ambiguously expressed, but, on the whole, is rather against than in favour of the Canterbury tradition. A similar difficulty in determining the burial-place of Thomas, the first Lord Wharton, occurred to the writer of this notice. In Healaugh Church, near York, there is a handsome monument to his memory, with the date of his death and other particulars; while at Kirkby Stephen there is another monument of almost identical character, with an inscription beginning with the words, "Thomas Whartonius jaceo hic," which seems positive enough. Nevertheless, his lordship's will was found to contain his request that he should be buried at Healaugh; and that wish was undoubtedly carried out, as his widow, some fifteen years afterwards, desired to be laid beside him in that church. We certainly agree with Mr. Cave-Browne that there is a very strong presumption in favour of Maidstone having been the burial-place of its great benefactor, Archbishop Courtenay.

In treating of the clergy attached to the chief church of Maidstone, Mr. Cave-Browne notices the changes made in their designation by the successive alterations in the constitution of the church. First it was parochial in character, and we thus have a list of the rectors of St. Mary's. Then, when converted into a collegiate foundation, they were known as the masters or wardens of All Saints' College. At the so-called "surrender" of the college (which took place in the early part of the reign of Edward VI.) the rectorial lands and tithes were granted to Sir Thomas Wyat subject to the payment of the salary of a "curate" for Maidstone Parish Church. The curates thenceforward appear to have been appointed by the archbishop and removable at his pleasure; but in the middle of the last century the minister was designated "perpetual curate," and enjoyed the ordinary status of an incumbent. Lastly, in 1869, the title of "vicar" was substituted for the older term, and was fitly borne by the Rev. D. D. Stewart, to whose personal zeal was largely due the erection of no less than four district churches within the limits of the parish.

Although none of the incumbents have been men of conspicuous mark, yet not a few of them attained some degree of distinction. William de Cornhill, the earliest rector whose name Mr. Cave-Browne has been able to discover, became, in 1215, Bishop of Lichfield; John Mansell, a pluralist of pluralists, was Lord Keeper in 1247 and Lord Chancellor soon afterwards; Dr. John Wotton, the first master of Courtenay's College, rivalled the archbishop in his munificence; William Grocyn has been termed "the Patriarch of English Literature." Josiah Woodward was a worthy divine and industrious pamphleteer; and Thomas Dealtry, sometime Archdeacon of Madras, completed the work of restoring the parish church which his predecessor, William Vallance, had successfully begun.

We have failed in our object if we have not shown that Mr. Cave-Browne has had a most interesting subject for study, and that he deserves high praise for the manner in which he has dealt with it. In many respects his history is quite a model of what such a book should be.

The Amber City. By Thomas Vetch. (Biggs & Debenham.)

Sant' Ilario is a continuation of Saracinesca; and, like that story, is a picture of the ways of the old Roman nobility under the last days of the Temporal Power, drawn with the force and fidelity which we have learned to expect from the author. He shows us both good and bad types, bringing them into effective contrast by means of an ingenious plot, turning upon a family arrangement in a former generation, affecting the rank and property of the Saracinesca. He is less happy than his wont, however, in labelling his artist with such a name as "Gouache," and his villain with that of "Meschini." These savour rather of such inartistic formations as "Sir Pertinax Mac Sycophant" and "Mrs. Candour" than of Thackeray's felicitous symbols of the kind, such as "Little Tom Eaves," for example, where "Peeping Tom" and "eaves-dropping" are just suggested to the reader, and not obtruded on him in a manner which does not flatter his understanding. And Mr. Crawford's villain, though vigorously sketched, is not new. He is to be met, suicide and all, in more than one previous work of fiction; even Harrison Ainsworth has got one very like him. We are promised a third instalment of the Saracinesca series, to deal with the fall of the Temporal Power and the unification of the Italian kingdom, which will give Mr. Crawford an excellent opportunity of drawing the contrast between the families which took opposite sides in the political questions involved.

The Tree of Knowledge is a capable book, with bold incident, clever character-drawing, and a healthy view of life. The leading hero is perhaps a little melodramatic, being a cross between Sintram and Monte Christo; but he is true to the author's conception, and unusual rather than impossible. And the heroine, or to speak more correctly, the lady who occupies the largest space in the story, is very well conceived. The reader is led at first to expect a change in her like that in the Sleeping Beauty, that her long repressed nature will awake at the touch of love, and develop into flower and fruit. The fact is that there is nothing to develop, and the idealist who has staked all upon her is rudely disillusioned at last. And not the least capable touch in the book is the mode of extrication devised for him. The minor figures are also firmly sketched in; and altogether the book is to be commended.

Mrs. Macquoid's nine short stories are distributed between France, Germany, Switzerland, and England. They are all readable; but she works more easily and effectively on a larger scale, and there is nothing here to put beside Diana, The Evil Eye, or At the Red Glove. Further, in what is perhaps the pleasantest of these tales, "The Ratcatcher of Hameln," she has the great disadvantage of seeming to compete with Mr. Browning's "Pied Piper of Hamelin," which is incomparably more vivid, picturesque, and effective. It was unwise, attractive as the theme is, to invite the comparison. "Mary Abbot's Tryst" is the strongest feature in the volumes; but here again Mrs. Macquoid would probably have been more successful if she had expanded the story to the dimensions of a volume all to itself, and worked out the characters and situations in more detail.

The Secret of Fontaine-la-Croix, though bearing a London publisher's name on the title-page, has on the back thereof an intimation that it enjoys American copyright, and that it has been printed in America—as, indeed, the corrupt following of American dictionaries in the matter of orthography shows only too plainly. Some of the French spelling has fared as badly. There is a dog, for instance, in the story, who appears as "Ron" throughout; and only a casual remark on one page, that his master calls him with the old Norman war-cry, discloses that "Rou" is intended. The author is probably guiltless of this, but must accept the responsibility for "mademoiselles" twice over, and for the common American solecism of using the verb "help" without a "to" before the following verb, thus: "Then she helped Yvonne deck the château." The story is that of an English girl going to live as governess-companion in a French family of distinction, and becoming intimately bound up with its inmates and their affairs. The secret turns on the ecclesiastical regulations affecting the right of burial; but the incident seems somewhat forced and improbable, as much simpler solutions of the difficulty are obvious, and would scarcely have been overlooked in parallel circumstances. On the whole, the book has merit, and there is some power of drawing character evinced, though a certain flavour of inexperience is perceptible everywhere.

The Milroys so far bears out its secondary title that it is the story of three orphan sisters who leave London and settle in a country village, where two occupy themselves in writing for the press, and one in working as an art-decorator. But it does not deal with the larger general problem of woman's work, nor is there anything so exceptional in the quality of the productions ascribed to the sisters as to make them central points of interest. The book is a very crude one, with some promise of better things; but the style is not what might reasonably be looked for from a writer who heads every chapter with three or four mottoes from Shakspeare, and dedicates her book to Mr. Walter Besant, whose courteous acceptance is reproduced upon a fly-leaf facing the title-page. On the contrary, the diction throughout is colloquial to the verge, and often over the verge, of slanginess, and that not only in the dialogue, but in the connecting matter also. And there is a fault of another kind recurrent—that the author uses prompter-work and stage directions constantly, telling the reader this, that, and the other about the characters, which they should have been made to act out for themselves as part of the movement of the plot. A word of warning to the publisher is needed too. The volume is unpleasantly got up, both in form and in letter. Very long lines, very closely set, and in very small type, prove most fatiguing to a reader, and create an unfavourable prepossession. It is the first book we have seen issued by this house, and it ought not to set a precedent in these respects.

Favour and Fortune are not abstract ideas, but two very concrete young ladies, having these forenames. They both marry without due consideration, but with a difference: Fortune weds a very good fellow whom she does not care about; Favour weds a cad with whom she is in love after her fashion; and the story is chiefly occupied with telling how the two marriages turn out. This is fully done in one of the two cases, the other is left partly incomplete, and there appears to be some sequel hinted at, as yet to appear; but this may be only a misconception of an ambiguous sentence in the closing chapter.

The Amber City is yet another of the many voyages imaginaires in Central Africa which have been pouring from the press in rapid succession for some years past. It is a fairly good specimen of the kind; for the author possesses some faculty of invention, and has devised a few novel and effective situations. But the fact that the "amber" is only gum-copal, huge bricks of which serve as the building material for a congeries of huts of the ordinary Nigritian type, is allegorical of the story, which can excite only a factitious interest, not because the author has failed of his aim, but because the thing aimed at is hardly worth achieving.

RICHARD F. LITLEDALE.

SOME BOOKS ON ECONOMICS.

Mining Royalties. By W. R. Sorley. (Oxford: University Press.) This is the report of an inquiry made at the suggestion of the Toynbee Trustees. It is the second of the series of publications which was brilliantly inaugurated by Mr. Price's Industrial Peace. The report is worthy of the auspices under which it is brought forth. The careful investigation of facts is combined with an almost Ricardian power of abstract reasoning. Not that Prof. Sorley agrees entirely with the great theorist. He points out that Ricardo and his followers have been mistaken in applying the analogy of agricultural rents to mines. The worst mine which is worked, unlike land at the margin of agriculture, does theoretically pay rent. To that extent—say about 4d. a ton for coal and ironstone—price is heightened by the existence of royalties. The abolition of royalties would therefore probably produce some alleviation, but much less than reformers who have not studied the theory of rent assume. The advantage would be counterbalanced by the disturbance of trade which would follow the remittance of all royalties great and small. Let a bonus of 8d. or 9d., in the way of remitted royalty, be given to South Wales, of 4d. and 5d. only to Northumberland, and perhaps the coal industry in the less favoured district would be ruined. Moreover, the principle of royalties, violently expelled, would still recur. The occupant, who has virtually been presented with a valuable property, might let it to another. This is what actually has occurred in Spain and France, where the concessionnaire frequently lets his property at a royalty to a new lessee. For these reasons Prof. Sorley is not with those whose easy method of improving a defective institution is to abolish it. In a more English spirit, Prof. Sorley proposes cautiously some moderate reforms; in particular, that the royalty charged should be a percentage of the output, and that there should be no restriction put on the time for working "shorts." It must be for experts, of course, to determine the exact form in which these suggestions should be carried out.

Capital and Wages. By the Rev. Francis A. Minton. (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) This is an interesting and remarkable book. The author is a clergyman whom the duties of his profession have brought into contact with the destitute classes. Disappointed in his philanthropic efforts to abate their misery, he has resolved to study the causes of the evil. "If this work should prove the most futile of all my efforts, I hold, reader, that it is better to have tried my utmost and failed with the brave than to have played the coward and done nothing." In the pursuit of this noble purpose Mr. Minton has studied and collated the principal writers on political economy. His citations are unusually copious, often extending over several of his pages. This peculiarity has its charms, especially in the case of the less read or less readable authors. The extensive extracts from Mr. Macleod's writings are particularly valuable. From Mr. Macleod our author has learnt that credit may play the part of capital. He has come to doubt "what has been dinned into our ears with weary monotony by political economists"—that capital is the result of saving. "I maintain," says Mr. Minton, "that it is far more the result of working." We understand him to be in accord with what Prof. Sidgwick has well said on this point. Indeed, our author appears to us to possess in a high degree what Hesiod called the second best species of talent—the power of learning from others. He is abreast of the modern economic movement, but not, we think, ahead of it. He ascends, like the wren of fable, with the eagles as high as they carry him; but, when we look for his own additional independent flight, there seems to be only a fluttering in vacuo. Thus, his prolonged contention that "Malthusianism is absurd" contains nothing, or nothing deserving of attention, which would not be admitted by accredited contemporary economists. Nothing is added to, or taken from, Prof. Marshall's orthodox doctrine that "the progress of civilisation, while it presses on the resources of land, enlarges those resources." So again, with respect to the doctrine of value, he has been led beyond Ricardo, but he does not lead us beyond Jevons. He will not admit what even Ricardo, if we remember rightly, in one of his letters concedes—that the value of an oak is not in general proportioned to the labour expended in producing it. Mr. Minton insists that there must have been an "effort of society" to maintain proprietary rights. Otherwise, the oak might have been split up and divided among all comers. This oak-splintering and hair-splitting does not seem to us very profitable. Again, the definition of capital is needlessly laboured. No doubt, as Coleridge or some one has said, in order to be certain that a dispute is only about words, there is required a large knowledge of things. We are ready to admit that Mr. Minton's lengthy disquisitions about the meaning of capital have some of the virtue ascribed to the Platonic search for definitions. The dispute about words draws attention to distinctions between things. At best, however, the success attained by our author is of an academic sort. He does not seem to have much grasp of fact, when he speaks with a light heart about the consequences of war; when he advocates the repudiation of the National Debt, as having been in great part "contracted in curbing the ambition of Napoleon Bonaparte."

"Had he devastated England as the Germans devastated France in the Franco-German War, in the ordinary course of events the effects of the calamity would soon have been obliterated by the labour of the people."

It is strange that Mr. Minton, who extolls credit so high as to describe it as capital, should not have considered the shock which repudiation of the National Debt and other drastic measures advocated by him are calculated to give to credit. Altogether, the book appears to us not so much as a "possession for ever," as of the nature of a prize essay. It has performed its proper function in having stimulated the industry and evoked the talent of an able and promising student.

The Tariff History of the United States. By F. W. Taussig. (Putnam's.) Prof. Taussig is already favourably known to the students of political economy by his History of the Recent Tariff, and by several essays on finance which have appeared in scientific journals. The collection of these contributions to science which this volume contains will enhance his reputation. Such a combination of logic and learning is seldom brought to bear upon the doctrine of Free Trade. The author is free from that bigotry which prompts some "orthodox" writers to deny the speculative tenet that the protection of young industries may conceivably be beneficial. In fact he admits that an impulse was given to some American industries by the restrictive measures of 1808-1815, which constituted in effect a severe though crude and wasteful protection. For the rest, a careful consideration of the principal industries—the cotton, the woollen, and the iron manufactures—in the days of their youth shows that their growth was not appreciably accelerated by protective legislation. Tracing the history of American fiscal history up to the war, Prof. Taussig renders it probable that tariffs have had less effect upon the prosperity of the country than excited partisans on either side of the controversy have assumed. It is reasonably certain that inferior processes of iron manufacture were kept alive by the protective legislation of 1842. But to ascribe the prosperity of the country to that legislation, or to its mitigation in 1846; to connect the monetary crisis of 1837 or 1857 with the preceding relaxation of protection—such contentions show a want of inductive logic and commonsense. Continuing his history down to the present time, the writer shows that the "war tariff" forms the basis of the present protective system. "The necessity of the case, the critical state of the country, the urgent need of revenue," may have justified the crude and hasty legislation of 1864. But that the fiscal system then improvised should be not only maintained but aggravated is inexcusable.

Vital Statistics. By A. Newsholme. (Son-nenschein.) This compendious volume forms a useful introduction to the study of statistics in general, and of Dr. Farr's writings in particular. To the medical practitioner the chapters on the registration of sickness, and on the mortality from different diseases, will be specially useful. All may derive benefit from Dr. Newsholme's enumeration and illustration of statistical fallacies. With regard to one of these we must join issue with the author when he says that "the degree of approximation to the truth of a varying number of observations can be estimated by means of Poisson's formula." Now it is evident to those who have studied the writings of Prof. Lexis or Dr. Venn on the theory of errors that the formula in question is applicable only to the ideal case of games of chance, and is a very inadequate test of accuracy in all concrete instances. In connexion with this subject, we may express a doubt whether the proper logical tests have been applied to the following statements: "The proportion of males is greater in large than in small families; it is greater also among the earlier born than the later born children in a family." Here and elsewhere it may be suspected that the author has sacrificed exactness to brevity. But the great value of the volume as an educational text-book is not affected by these little scruples.

The Standard of Value. By William Leighton Jordan. Fifth Edition. (Longmans.) This is a difficult book to get into. The very approach is rendered deterrent by the advertisement of another work by the same author. The contents of the New Principles of Natural Philosophy, which are given at length in the advertisement, betray, what is stated more explicitly elsewhere, that the author has "incurred the hostility of the professional philosophers" by "having become the discoverer of the action of astral gravitation," and "having by means of that discovery corrected the fundamental error which pervades what they have, for two centuries, been teaching as the 'Laws of Motion.'" If the reader's curiosity survives this startling announcement, he will then have to work his way through a triple palisade of prefaces—the preface to each successive edition bristling with answers to all the criticisms which may have been made upon the work. We ourselves will probably be pilloried in a preface to the sixth edition. About the middle of the book the first chapter begins, headed "Lord Liverpool's Oversight." To put now in a nutshell what the author has enclosed within so many hard rinds—he thinks it unjust that the National Debt, contracted before the year 1816, should be paid in a currency which has been appreciated in consequence of the monometallic legislation of that year. Accordingly, he holds it to be the duty of England, even without the concurrence of other nations, to re-adopt the principle of bi-metallism which was abolished by the British Parliament in 1816. This main thesis is supported by many other abstract reasons equally deserving of consideration.

Outlines of a New Science. By E. J. Donnell. (Putnam's.) In the days when Emerson's Law of Compensation was in vogue, it was the practice of a certain judicious critic whenever, in looking at any new work, he came to the word "polarity" at once to close the volume. We have been similarly affected by the law of action and reaction, which is propounded in the preface to the "New Science":

"On closer examination it will be found that all social science is one, having the same synthetic basis. Economics constitute one of the aspects of this new science; not, as heretofore supposed, a discrete department of it. This opens wide the door to a comprehensive study of the constitution of the human mind. Here it will be found that the law of sex prevails, and is as potent as elsewhere. It is known to science as positive and negative forces."

May we not say with the satirist "Post hoc Quid nisi lusus erit"? We have found nothing except such mirth as is to be derived from passages like that which has been quoted.

Zur Theorie des Preises. Von Dr. Zucherkanndl. (Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot.) Dr. Zucherkanndl is a contributor not only to the theory of value, but also the history of that theory. In the latter capacity only does he appear to us to deserve praise. He gives an exhaustive enumeration of doctrines which have been held in different ages and countries. The very names of some authors in his list will be unknown to many readers. He is more successful in indicating obscure than in criticising eminent writers. We are unable to follow him when he attributes to Prof. Alfred Marshall a "verkehrte Formulierung." "Instead of saying, the Final Utility (Grenznutzen) determines the price Marshall says, the price measures the Final Utility." Equally unintelligible to us are some of the criticisms on Jevons. We have derived little benefit from the theoretical part of the work. We fail to see that the writer adds to, or diminishes from, Prof. Menger, and his eminent follower Prof. Böhm-Bawerk.

NOTES AND NEWS.

We hear that the Marchioness of Dufferin's Indian Journal will be published almost immediately.

MR. JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS has been employed for three or four years past, while not otherwise engaged in the work of translation, upon a series of twenty essays, dealing with problems of criticism, art, and literature. These he has now nearly completed, and hopes soon to send to press. His last piece of translation—a version of Count Carlo Gozzi's rare and curious autobiography, accompanied by original treatises upon the development of Italian comedy, the history of the "Commedia dell'Arte," and the Venetian painter Pietro Longhi—will be published this autumn by Mr. John O. Nimmo, in two volumes, with appropriate illustrations by French artists.

The Critical Philosophy of Immanuel Kant, by Prof. Edward Caird, will be published in a few days by Messrs. MacLehose & Sons, of Glasgow. This work, which has been for a number of years in preparation, treats of the three Critiques, and of their relation to one another and to the other works of Kant.

LUCAS MALET, the author of "Colonel Enderby's Wife," has almost finished a three-volume novel dealing, in a very outspoken way, with a somewhat delicate problem of modern society: namely, the effects produced in after years by the youthful weakness and wrongdoing of its hero. The book is entitled "The Wages of Sin"; and the first instalment of it will be published in the Universal Review for October 15.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish in October The Melbourne Papers, being a selection from documents in the possession of the Earl Cowper, edited by Lloyd C. Sanders. The volume will contain a large number of letters from Lord Melbourne, from the time when he was a student at Glasgow in 1800 to that of his death in 1848, besides a portion of a diary kept by him soon after his entry into Parliament, and some brief extracts from a commonplace book containing a record of his studies. It will also include a full correspondence with William IV. and many of the prime minister's colleagues—Earl Grey, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Holland, Lord Althorp, Lord John Russell, and Lord Palmerston; besides letters from Archbishop Whateley, Mrs. Norton, B. R. Haydon, John Allen, and other persons of note. Lord Cowper will contribute a short preface.

MESSRS. GEORGE PHILIP & SON—the well-known geographical publishers—announce a new series, entitled "The World's Great Explorers and Explorations," edited by Mr. J. Scott Keltie, librarian to the Royal Geographical Society, Mr. H. J. Mackinder, reader in geography at Oxford, and Mr. E. G. Ravenstein. Each volume will, so far as the ground covered admits, deal mainly with one prominent name associated with some particular region, and will tell the story of his life and the work of geographical discovery which he accomplished. It will also be furnished with specially prepared maps, portraits, and other original illustrations. The two first volumes of the series will be John Davis: Arctic Explorer and early India Navigator, by Mr. Clements R. Markham, to be published on October 1; and Palestine, by Major C. B. Conder, to be published in December. Other volumes already arranged for are: John Franklin and the North-West Passage, by Capt. Albert Markham; Magellan and the Pacific, by Dr. H. H. Guillemard; Saussure and the Alps, by Mr. Douglas W. Freshfield; Mungo Park and the Niger, by Mr. Joseph Thomson; The Himalaya, by Gen. Richard Strachey; Livingstone and Central Africa, by Mr. H. H. Johnstone; Ross and the Antarctic, by Mr. H. J. Mackinder; Bruce and the Nile, by Mr. J. Scott Keltie; and Vasco da Gama and the Ocean Highway to India, by Mr. E. G. Ravenstein.

MESSRS. G. BELL & SONS will shortly publish a new volume by Mr. Samuel Waddington, entitled A Century of Sonnets.

THE biography of the late Henry Richard will be published in a few weeks by Messrs. Cassell & Co. In the preparation of the work Mr. Charles S. Miall has had the use of the letters, diaries, &c., of the deceased, which were placed at his disposal by Mrs. Richard. These documents throw much light on Henry Richard's public services, as the director of the peace movement, the leader of his Welsh countrymen, and the representative of Nonconformists in the House of Commons.

DR. FURNIVALL has been helping Mr. John Saunders with the new edition of his book on Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," which was first issued in three of Charles Knight's "Weekly Volumes." The late Daniel Macmillan admired the book, and made all his pupil-customers buy it. They all did as they were told, Dr. Furnivall among them. Mr. Macmillan's house takes 500 copies of the new edition for America; and it ought to be popular there as well as here, for, as it puts its extracts into modern spelling, accents all the extra syllables which are to be pronounced, and carries on the story of every tale by prose bits between the extracts, it is as easy to read as a modern novel. Moreover, Mr. Saunders's account of the characters in the Prologue is so good, and gives such a capital sketch of the different classes of English society in Chaucer's time, that Mr. Churton Collins said he must have it for his many students at his Extension Lectures. He asked why some publisher did not reprint so excellent a book, assuming that its writer had been long dead. Whereupon Mr. Saunders asserted that he was alive and well, and would re-edit his book himself. An enlightened publisher, Mr. Dent, who had attended Mr. Churton Collins's lectures, undertook the publication. Dr. Furnivall got the Chaucer Society to allow its Ellesmere MS. cuts of the Tale-tellers to be used in the book, and has himself read its proofs and revises with Mr. Saunders, and posted it up to the latest date on certain points. The new edition is dedicated to him. The book will be welcome to all students of the immortal "Canterbury Tales."

THE Cambridge University Press will shortly publish the Septuagint Version of the Book of Psalms, being a separate issue of a part of vol. ii. of the Cambridge Manual Edition of the Septuagint, edited by the Rev. Dr. H. B. Swete.

MESSRS. HIRSCHFELD BROTHERS will shortly publish a German Reader, arranged on a new plan by Dr. N. Heinemann, teacher of German literature at the Crystal Palace. The work bears the title of Shining Lights of Modern Germany: a collection of letters of the most eminent Germans of both sexes from 1800 to our time, with short biographical notices, and brief literary, historical, and other notes.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a reprint of the late Walter Bagehot's Practical Plan for assimilating the English and American Money, as a Step towards Universal Money, which originally appeared in the Economist, and afterwards in book form (1869).

Elocution, Voice, and Gesture, by Mr. Rupert Garry, which has already gone through several editions, will in future be published by Messrs. Marcus Ward & Co.

WE understand that Mr. Robert Browning, the author of "Donald," has added his name to the list of patrons of the Shaftesbury Hospital, which will shortly be opened in London on anti-vivisection principles. An anonymous donor has promised £1000 to the fund; and five donations, each of £100, were promised within two days after the scheme was made known.

A MONUMENT to Walther von Vogelweide is to be inaugurated on September 15 at Bozen, in Tyrol, which claims to be the last of German towns. Walther already has a monument at Würzburg, where he died; and also a statue at Innsbruck.

WE have received, as a Separat-abdruck from the Jahrbuch of the German Shakspeare Society, a catalogue of the library of the society (Weimar: Wagner), compiled by the librarian, Dr. R. Köhler. As might be expected, it does not contain any great rarities, such as the folios or quartos, but it forms a good practical collection of editions and criticism. The catalogue is divided into five sections: (1) editions of collected and single works, including many facsimiles, but wanting the great Cambridge edition; (2) translations and acting copies, the German translations being, of course, very numerous, but the French by Charles Hugo and the Portuguese by the King of Portugal being absent—a Danish translation of "Hamlet" dates from 1777, which happens to be also the year of the earliest German translation of that play; (3) Shaksperiana—the most valuable portion of the collection, comprising the Transactions of the New Shakspeare Society, but not of its forerunner; (4) the history of the English drama, with special reference to the predecessors and contemporaries of Shakspeare; (5) dictionaries—both these last sections are weak.

TRANSLATION.

SONNET OF MICHAEL ANGELO ON DANTE.

He sank from earth to the abysses blind,
And saw both hells, and lived, and made ascent
To God, led by his thought magnificent,
Whose light of truth he poured on us mankind.
That lordly star of price in our night shined Revealing the Eternal; ere it went
This muddy world such wages on it spent
As to our choicest souls is still assigned.
Ill greeted by his people's thanklessness
Were Dante's labours, Dante's high desire;
Only the just man these forbear to bless.
Were but such birthright mine! might I aspire
To his sharp exile, to his righteousness,
No man's estate on earth were lifted higher.

O. ELTON.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for September opens with a graphic study on Judas Iscariot by that graceful writer, the Dean of Armagh; an essay on The Christian Secret (Phil. iv. 11-13), by Prof. Beet; a fresh portion of Prof. Bruce's exposition of Hebrews (chap. vii. 11-28); a study on the Sixteenth Psalm (assuming a post-exile date), with a view to harmonising the exegesis of the pulpit with that of the study, by Prof. Cheyne; Exegetical Notes on the Epistle of St. James, by Prof. J. B. Mayor (in chap. ii. 1, "the glory" taken as an appellation of Christ; chap. i. 17, iii. 6, examples of the genitive of quality); "St. Paul's Method of Quotation," by Dr. E. G. King (on 1 Cor. xiv. 21, against Mr. Bartlett's Bampton Lectures, p. 59); and a notice of Dr. Kennedy's Introduction to Biblical Hebrew, by Prof. Elmslie.

THE September number of the Theological Monthly (Nisbet) opens with a notable article on "The Bible and Egyptology," by M. Edouard Naville, in which that eminent explorer summarises the results of his discoveries in Egypt, so far as relates to the arrival of Abraham, the rise of Joseph, the stay of the Israelites, and the circumstances of the Exodus. He inclines to the view of M. Lesepp, that the actual "passage of the Red Sea" took place north of the Bitter Lakes, near the present Serapeum. We may also mention a scholarly paper, by the Rev. W. J. Deane, on "Jewish Pseudepigraphic Writings."

WE understand that the essay in the September number of Temple Bar on "Charles Whitehead; an all but forgotten Novelist of Fifty Years ago," is by Mr. Hall Caine.

SOME THEATRICAL LAWSUITS: A SUPPLEMENT TO CIBBER'S "APOLOGY."

II.

THE pleadings in the cross action brought by Wilks, Doggett, and Cibber against Swiney contain little that is fresh. (Chancery Pleadings, Mitford iv. B & A, bef. 1714, No. DOXXI.) From the plaintiffs' bill, dated February 10, 1710[-11], it appears that by the articles of agreement between them and Swiney, which have been already described, all questions which arose were to be decided by the majority, Swiney's voice counting only as one, and in case of equality by the casting of lots.

Swiney (the bill proceeds), designing to prevent his co-partners reaping any profit, in confederacy with John Hall and others as yet unknown, took upon himself, without the consent of the others, to employ such persons as he thought fit in the management of the playhouse—which he ought to have managed himself—and paid what he thought fit, and made unnecessary and useless alterations in the playhouse and scenes and clothes, and thereby put the plaintiffs to great expense, the whole profit being swallowed up; and Swiney and Hall positively refused to show the accounts and vouchers. Wilks and the others expressly charged Swiney with charging them for alterations made before the partnership began; with giving away or disposing of several benefits, plays, and operas, without their consent; with shutting up the theatre without their consent and stopping all acting from October 7, 1710, to November 4; with charging them for casual expenses for money pretended to be advanced by him, without giving them any account of what it was for; with charging them, in the general account, double the proper value of clothes and goods; and with refusing to pay bills signed by Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett, contrary to the said articles. After the new licence of the November 6, 1710, was granted, Swiney altogether absented himself from attending to any of the affairs of the playhouse, and threatened to bring suits to compel the plaintiffs to comply with his unreasonable demands. The plaintiffs therefore asked that, in order that Swiney should discover why he disbursed money without the consent of his partners, and should give a just account of the profits, a writ or writs of subpoena should be granted to Swiney and his confederates commanding them to appear before the Court.

Swiney's answer to this bill, dated February 24, 1710[-11], is very long, and is now partly illegible. In it, Swiney stated that by the agreement with Collier, the opera might be performed twice in the week, and not oftener, viz., on Wednesdays and Saturdays, and comedy every day, Wednesdays excepted. If they should at any time be turned out of possession, the comedians under the Queen's licence should have leave to act four days in the week at the Haymarket Theatre, paying the rent and charges of the house for those days, the rent not to exceed £3 per diem. Lastly, Collier should deliver up possession of Drury Lane Theatre within fourteen days. Swiney also stated that Wilks absented himself from duty from July 10 to about September 10 following, being in Ireland or elsewhere abroad; and that the other plaintiffs did not attend to their agreement. Swiney denied that he refused a consultation with them, and denied unlawful confederacy.

The orders and decrees in these two actions may be taken together (Chancery Decrees, 1710 B. 144, 155, 171, 172, 276, 283, 360, 365; 1711 B. 33, 55, 227, 240. Masters' Reports, May 17, 1711, Jan. 22, 1711-12).

On February 1, 1710-11, Swiney's action came before the Lord Keeper, when Mr. Sergeant Powis, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Norris, Swiney's counsel, offered divers reasons why the profits of the theatre should be paid to Swiney by the receiver or receivers that now did, or hereafter should be appointed to receive, the same; and that an injunction should be awarded to enjoin the defendants from wasting and disposing thereof, and of the plaintiffs' stock. But, after hearing the defendants' counsel, his lordship did not think fit to grant an injunction; but ordered that Swiney should produce and leave all the books, papers, and writings of account which he had relating to the theatre with Mr. Hiccocks within three days, and that the defendants should within a fortnight after the said books should be left with the said Master, put in their answer to the plaintiffs' bill, or in default thereof, that the said master should appoint a receiver to receive the profits of the theatre. On February 17 leave was given to Swiney to amend his bill in several particulars, on payment of 20s. costs; and on the 24th Swiney's counsel applied that his books and papers might be returned to him, and that he might be restored to the profits of the theatre. The defendants had now put in their answer, and admitted that the articles were as they were set forth in Swiney's bill, and that he received the profits until June 10. The Lord Keeper made an order accordingly, subject, however, to the order which should be made upon the hearing of the cause; and, in the meantime, Swiney was to apply the profits received by him according to the articles.

On March 9 leave was given to Wilks, &c., plaintiffs in the second suit, to amend their bill by making John Hall a party thereto, and a subpoena was issued to compel Hall to appear to answer the said bill. On March 14, it was alleged by the counsel for Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett (the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Vernon, and Mr. Mead) that the order of February 24 was grounded upon a supposition that the articles in question were still in force, whereby Swiney was obliged to pay the rent of the Haymarket Theatre, and salaries and wages, and all other incidental charges; whereas the said articles were long since determined, the licence therein mentioned being revoked, and a new licence granted. Collier now paid the rent of the Haymarket; and the defendants were now equally engaged to pay the actors, and Swiney was not under engagement to pay more than in joint contract with them. It was therefore prayed that so much of the order of February 24 as directed that Swiney should be restored to the receipt of the profits of the theatre be discharged. But Swiney's counsel insisted that Swiney was the only receiver appointed by the articles, which were still in force, and that by those articles Swiney's power extended to any places where theatrical entertainments should be performed, and that the new licence did not destroy the said articles; and that the defendants having got into their hands the sum of £2744 9s. 4d. of the profits of acting in the several theatres since November 4 last, the same ought to be paid to Swiney to be applied to the benefit of the partnership according to the articles. Whereupon his lordship ordered that so much of the order of February 24 as related to Swiney being restored to the receipt of the profits of the theatre be discharged, and that a person be appointed as receiver of the profits of the said theatre in Drury Lane; and for that purpose it was referred to Mr. Pitt to allow of such a receiver, and both sides were to attend the Master, and to propose persons to be receiver, and the person the Master approved of was to give security, and be himself responsible for what he received, and was to be allowed a salary. And it was further ordered that both parties were to come to an account before the Master for the moneys by them or their order or orders respectively received of the profits from the theatre since the commencement of this suit, allowance being made thereout for what had been paid to defray necessary charges and expenses about the theatre according to the articles. The money remaining was to be paid to the receiver, who from time to time, out of such money as he received, was to pay to the actors and persons belonging to the theatre their salaries, and the other necessary charges of the theatre; but the dividends of the profits claimed by the plaintiff and defendants were to be paid into, and to remain in the receiver's hands to be paid as the court should direct upon hearing of the causes; unless the parties should otherwise consent to make a division thereof between themselves.

A week later, on March 21, 1710-11, the cross action came before the Master of the Rolls, upon an application by the defendants, Swiney and Hall, that the defendants in the original cause be obliged to answer the original bill before the defendant Hall answered the cross bill. His Honour ordered accordingly. Swiney had obtained leave to amend his original bill by making Mr. Peter Champelon and Mr. John Vanbrugh parties thereto, and they had appeared and obtained an order dated March 16 for a fortnight's time to answer; and Wilks, &c., plaintiffs in the cross action, had obtained leave to amend their bill by making John Hall a party thereto, and he had appeared to the subpoena served upon him. But the time for answering was not yet out, and the order was asked for because the amended cross bill had been but lately delivered to Hall's clerk in court to take a copy of the same.

On April 30, 1711, the plaintiffs alleged that Swiney's answer to their bill was very impertinent; and it was ordered that the answer be referred to Mr. Rogers to certify whether it was impertinent or not.

On May 17 the Master reported that portions of Swiney's answer were impertinent; and on July 4 it was ordered that the Master's report, and all matters and things therein contained, stand ratified and confirmed by the authority and decree of the court to be observed and performed by all parties thereto according to the tenour and true meaning thereof, unless Swiney and Hall should within eight days after they received notice thereof show good cause to the court to the contrary. On November 24 it was proved that due notice was given to Swiney and Hall of the above order, and that no cause had been shown to the contrary. It was therefore ordered that the order of July 4 be made absolute; and it was referred back to Mr. Rogers to expunge the impertinent matter out of Swiney and Hall's answer, and to tax the plaintiffs' costs in respect thereof.

On December 10 Swiney's counsel alleged that about Easter term last an agreement was concluded between the parties that all proceedings between them should be dismissed the court without costs on either side, and that an instrument in writing for that purpose was signed by all the parties; but that, notwithstanding this agreement, the plaintiffs had since proceeded with the cause. It was therefore prayed that the order of November 24, obtained since this agreement had been entered into, should be discharged. The court ordered that the said order be referred to Mr. Hiccocks to certify whether any such agreement had been entered into.

On January 22, 1711-12, the Master reported that he found that whereas by consent of all parties the written articles of agreement, dated March 10, 1708, had been cancelled and delivered up, but there was still an account depending relating to the profits of the theatres from July 1, 1709, to June 10, 1710, the parties, on or about May 19 last, entered into a bond of arbitration of the penalty of £4000 to stand to the award of James Craggs and Henry Brett, Esquires, touching the said account; and subsequently there was an agreement entered into by the parties in both causes, on May 29, that a recognisance taken by and before Mr. Pitt, one of the Masters of this court, entered into by Richard Castleman, of the Inner Temple, gent., Thomas Perrin, of Mark Lane, merchant, and Paul Jarvis, citizen and goldsmith, dated about March 31 last, of the penalty of £4000, be vacated and cancelled, and that all such books, writings, &c., as had been brought before the Master be returned and delivered up. This agreement had, on June 1, been made an order of the court.

By an order of February 12, 1711-12, it was, by consent, agreed that the matters in dispute be referred to Mr. Hiccocks to end and determine the same; the Master was to examine all parties, and make a report by April 29, or the parties were to be at liberty to proceed as advised. Accordingly, on that day the counsel for Wilks, &c., defendants in the original suit, came and alleged that Swiney had used several delays to prevent the said reference taking place, and had put in an examination which the defendants were advised was insufficient; that Swiney was upon a fair account indebted to the defendants in upwards of £1000, and that he was prepared to go beyond seas, as appeared by an affidavit made. It was therefore prayed that a ne exeat regno be issued against Swiney. Swiney's counsel replied that Swiney was anxious for the reference to proceed, and prayed that the time for the Master to make his report be enlarged. Whereupon it was ordered that a writ of ne exeat regno should issue against Swiney, endorsed £500 in words at length; and it was referred to the Master to certify whether Swiney's examination was sufficient or not; and it was further ordered that upon Swiney's giving security, to be allowed by the Master, to abide the event of the account, and to perform the award to be made, the time for the Master to make his report be enlarged by one month.

On May 8, Mr. Cowper and Sir Thomas Powis, Swiney's counsel, alleged that it appeared by the books of the theatre that the defendants were indebted to Swiney; yet they, upon suggestion that the balance of the accounts was upon their side, had obtained an order for a ne exeat regno against Swiney. It was, therefore, prayed that the defendants should give security to abide the event of the accounts, and that the ne exeat regno be discharged. The court ordered, by consent, that both sides should in a week give security in £1000 to abide the event of the account, and to perform the award to be made, and that upon Swiney giving such security, the said writ be superseded, and the order discharged; and the time for the Master to make his report was enlarged to the first day of Michaelmas term, the parties, and any others that the Master thought fit, being examined by him; and if Hall would not agree to abide by the Master's award, then Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett were to be at liberty to proceed against him as they should be advised. This is the last we hear of the case; for, as Cibber says, Swiney found the receipts of the opera (in the sinking condition Collier had left it) so far short of the expenses that "he was driven to attend his fortune in some more favourable climate, where he remained twenty years an exile." CORRESPONDENCE.

DAMPIER.

Bromley, Kent: August 31, 1839.

Permit me to say somewhat for my fascinating old acquaintance, Dampier. When I read in the ACADEMY (August 31) that his life had no more importance than that of a dozen pitiful scoundrels—that he was brave as a burglar—not less cruel than a slaughtering ruffian—and that his sole distinction among arrant knaves was his power of description—I can but rub my eyes, and wonder if that can be the man whose every word I have read and re-read with delight. I confess that to my untutored mind he seemed a prince of observers, worthy to lead in the line of those discoverers who do honour to this country.

Did each of the other "dozen of the mercenary, ruffianly, sea-going adventurers of his day" write a treatise of 112 pp. "Of the Trade-winds, Breezes, Storms, Seasons of the Year, Tides, and Currents of the Torrid Zone"? If it is a "ruffianly lust of slaughter" to pity as Dampier pitied the monkeys, how many sportsmen of the present day must be honoured with such a character? Here is the ruffian speaking out: "After I have shot at one and broke a leg or an arm, I have pitied the poor creature to see it look and handle the wounded limb." Is it the bravery of a burglar to go up a barbarous country alone, and on foot, "being desirous to see as much of it as I could"? On that expedition he "hired a Tongquese for about a dollar to be my guide. This, tho' but a small matter was a great deal out of my pocket, who had not above two dollars in all, which I had gotten on board by teaching some of our young seamen plain sailing."

Is this the "mercenary" man? Moreover he set out, thus halving his fortune, and with but a dollar in his pocket,

"forced to make short journeys every day by reason of my weakness; yet I was not discouraged from the journey, being weary of lying still, and impatient of seeing somewhat that might further gratify my curiosity, tho' the weakness of my body did now require better accommodation."

And what was this ruffian's first care in a boat wreck? "I had nothing of value but my Journal and some drafts of land of my own taking, which I much prized, and which I had hitherto carefully preserved."

I appeal to any impartial reader if Dampier's own narrative can show any trace of the cruelty of those who "shed the blood of innocent men, women, and children," &c., &c. The careful, thorough, scientific spirit of observation, the discussion of his sailing observations, the indomitable energy in unpaying research, as well as the lucid, genial manner of his record, will ever place Dampier as an honourable forerunner of the geographers, anthropologists, and naturalists of later times. All honour to his memory!

"CLEO," "CLEVE," "CLEEVE,"

Oxford: August 31, 1888.

In the Old English Miscellany (a collection, be it noted, of Middle English pieces), edited for the Early English Text Society by Rev. Dr. Morris, the poem entitled, "A Luue Ron" from the Jesus MS. I. Arch. i. 29, contains the stanza, l. 65-72:

"Hwer is paris and heleyne, bat weren so bright and feyre on bleo?
Amades, tristrum, and dideyne, ysende, and alle þeo?
Ector wiþ his scharpe meyne, and cesar riche of wordes feo?
Heo beoþ iglyden ut of þe reyne,
so þe schef is of þe cleo."

The editor glosses the last two lines in the margin—"They have passed away as a shaft from the bowstring," explaining cleo in the Glossary as—"clew, hank, bowstring"; and in accordance with this he prints "sche[t]" in the text. But the rimes bleo, leo, feo = blee, thee, fee, show that cleo = clée cannot be "clew"; and the history of clew shows that it never meant "string" or "thread," until modern times when people had used clew or clue in a figurative sense so often that they had forgotten its literal meaning of "ball" of yarn. What then is cleo? "The Moral Ode," printed from the same MS. in the same volume had already supplied the answer; l. 343 says:

"þeos gob vnnþa ayen þa cleo, ayeyn þa heye hulle, these go with difficulty against the steep, against the high hill," where the other MS. read "clue." Cleo is for cleof, cleove, the modern "cleve," or "cleave." This word is an ancient doublet of "cliff," which in O.E. had originally nom. sing. clif, pl. (with u-fracture) cleofu, whence, by levelling came two forms, clif, cliff, pl. clives, cliffs, and cleof, cleve, pl. cleoves, cleves. In earlier literature the word is common in all the senses of "cliff," e.g., "called Albion of the white rocks and cleves whiche appere upon the sea costes" (Harrison's Exhort. to Scottes, 1547). But in the south west of England, where it is still a living word, it means not merely (nor indeed chiefly) a sea-cliff, but a steep slope, or hill-side = Scotch brae. The cleves of Dartmoor are well known to all visitors of that district; but the word is equally common in Somersetshire, where it gives its name to the parish of Old Cleve, to Huish Cleve, Bitter Cleve, Clevedon, Cleveland, and numberless place-names in different counties. See a good explanation in that great thesaurus of South-Western English, Mr. Elworthy's West Somerset Word-Book, where he mentions that any steep field is a "cleave," just as in London any acclivity is a "hill."

The passage in the "Luue Ron" is thus: "They have glidden (slipped) out of the rain, as the sheaf has from the slope." The idea might be that of a sheaf literally gliding down a cliff or steep; but more probably, that all these olden lovers have passed away as completely as the sheaves of other years have disappeared from the hillsides. "Glide" is a favourite word of the author, and we need not press "out of the rain," though sheaves are really taken out of the rain. Cleo seems also to be the first element in Cleobury Mortimer, the birthplace of the author of Piers Plowman.

The "cleves" of Dartmoor have figured a good deal in the newspapers and tourists' books of late years under the erroneous spelling "cleave." This is etymologically wrong, since ea is not the legitimate offspring of the older eo, ee; but it might be endured if it did not lend itself to an entire misunderstanding of the word on the part of those who, seeing it so spelt, straightway connect it with the verb to "cleave," and think of it as a cloven or cleft place, a gorge, chasm, or cleugh. I have numerous quotations from clever holiday articles in London papers in which it is so treated. Even that delightful observer of nature, the late Richard Jefferies, wrote in Red Deer, x. 199: "The corresponding terms to knep and knowl for rising ground are coombe and cleve for hollows"; which, so far as the last word is concerned, is a simple error. One cannot doubt that the writer hearing "cleve" applied probably to the steep side of a coombe, misunderstood its meaning, and associating it by instinctive "folk-etymology" with the notion of cleaving, misapplied it to a cleft or hollow between heights. He ought here to have written "coombe or bottom."

Of the two good spellings cleve and cleave, the former is, I think, preferable. It has been used by Blackmore and other modern writers, it coincides with the M.E., it agrees with eve, and it is quite unambiguous.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "CLOUGH."

Oxford: August 31, 1889.

In my letter to the ACADEMY last week I suggested the possibility of connecting our English "clough" with the old German word "clingo," supporting the etymology by phonological analogies, and by the very significant fact that the two words have precisely the same meaning.

It is quite possible that some may find a difficulty in accepting this etymology on the ground that the phonology of the O.H.G. clingo is not quite clear on the hypothesis of its being in ablaut relation with O.E. clōh*. It may be said that apparently in the ablaut series of verbs with nasal consonant, grammatical change from nx(nh) to ng only occurs regularly in the weak or zero grade, the vocalisation of which grade is ung not ing; as, for example, in contrast with O.E. ðēon (= ðihan), O.H.G. ðihan, Goth. beihan, primitive Germanic binx*, benx of the medium grade, we find in the weak grade the O.E. ðungen (past participle), from Germanic stem bung-. We should expect therefore (some may say) the form clungo instead of clingo. Well, is this to be held a valid objection to the assumption that O.E. clōh* is connected with O.H.G. clingo? I think not, as it seems to me analogous cases can be produced.

The etymological connexion of our "reel" with "ring" apparently involves an ablaut relation precisely analogous to that between clōh* and clingo. Mod. Eng. "reel," O.E. hrēol is a contraction for hrēhil*, which is an umlaut form of hrōhil* = hrōxil-, from Germanic hranx-, the strong grade of hrenx-*, whence with grammatical change may be derived O.E. and O.H.G. hring, the modern ring (so Prof. Kluge in Englische Studien, xi. 512).

In connexion with this point the relation between Goth. breihan, "to press," and O.E. ðringan may be brought forward. In this case we find on the one hand Goth. breihan = brihan*, from brinx*, brinx, and, on the other hand, O.E. ðringan from bring*, bring. That is to say, although the Gothic and O.E. forms belong to the same medium grade, one form is affected by grammatical change, the other is not. A good example of grammatical change occurring not in the weak but in the strong grade is to be found in O.E. hengest, "horse," as compared with Joel. hestr. For hestr = hihistoz* = hinxistoz*, from Germanic hinx*, henx* of the medium grade, whereas O.E. hengest = hangistoz* of the strong grade (see Noreen, Altisländische Grammatik, § 264).

Settrington Rectory: September 2, 1889.

Mr. Mayhew, in his eagerness to catch others tripping, often trips himself. He begins by misrepresenting what I have said.

I have not, as he asserts, attempted an explanation of the "English" word clough or cleugh, "a ravine." My brief note referred to another word of similar sound, the Celtic clach, a "stone," which in its Anglicised form of clough or clagh occurs in more than 400 names of Irish townlands. As an instance, I give the common name Cloghan, "the stones," found in all parts of Ireland, and denoting, according to Dr. Joyce, "a row of stepping-stones across a ford on a river" (Joyce, Irish Names, i. pp. 363, 412). Mr. Mayhew is therefore in error when, in the contemptuous style which he habitually adopts towards other writers, he asserts that "as clough does not mean a stone, we may dismiss this guess without the slightest hesitation." "Clough" does mean a stone in more than 400 names; and my explanation is not a "guess," but the etymology accepted by all Celtic scholars.

We have this word also in Wales and Scotland. As for England, I have only given one example—the Yorkshire Cloughton. Here, if anywhere, we might expect to find a Celtic name, as Cloughton was the stronghold and refuge of the Celts. The circular pits on Cloughton Moor, defended by entrenchments, and surrounded by numerous barrows, mark the site of a British town. I know of no ravine which would make it possible to explain the name from the English cleugh, "a cleft"; but, on the other hand, we have the remains of two megalithic monuments, called on the Ordnance map "druidical circles." Cloughton was the Yorkshire Stonehenge; and as clough is a regular Anglicised form of the Celtic clach, "a stone," and is used, as in the case of the huge dolmen called Clough Togal, to denote megalithic monuments, I venture to think that in the name of Cloughton we have a reference to the great standing stones or cloughs which formed the "druidical circles," and that this "guess" cannot be dismissed "without the slightest hesitation." Moreover, the Domesday forms Cloc-tune and Cloc-tone are phonetically nearer to the Celtic clach, "a stone," which has given us the word clock, and possibly clog, than to the imaginary Old English clōh which Mr. Mayhew has evolved from his internal consciousness.

ISAAC TAYLOR.

London: August 29, 1889.

I am inclined to think that herut beg is not (as is assumed by Prof. Napier in the ACADEMY of August 24) a scribal error for herutbergac, but a synonym of that word. The O.E. beg, a berry, is a well-authenticated word: the plural beger, begir, occurs in the Epinal, Corpus, and subsequent Glossaries, while the compound beigbeam is used to render the rubus of the Vulgate in Luke xx. 37.

In the absence of any better explanation of the obscure word brondegur, it is perhaps permissible to suggest that the second element may be an eccentric spelling of cher, cher < ahur*, ear of corn. The compound brond-cher might very well denote "smut" in wheat (cf. German brandkorn) even though brond alone had no other meaning than "burning"; and it is worth remarking that the exact etymological equivalent exists in the Swedish brandax. The use of g for h under such conditions is certainly a difficulty; but (as Prof. Napier remarks with reference to the supposed corrupt form herut beg) the MS. was written by an Irishman; and, besides, it is conceivable that the surd spirant became sonant before it disappeared altogether, as in the West-Saxon form ear. The mark of abbreviation over the final r of brondegur might, I suppose, represent any inflexional syllable; in this case it would be either the e of the dative sing. or the -um of the dative plural.

HENRY BRADLEY.

PROF. DE LAGARDE AND GIORDANO BRUNO.

East Anstey Rectory, Dulverton: Sept. 2, 1889.

May I correct an unfortunate slip in my review of Prof. de Lagarde's edition of Bruno's Italian works in the last number of the ACADEMY? Instead of a "consistent Romanist" I should have classed the editor as a consistent Protestant of the traditional school. I was misled by a catalogue of his works among a number of Romanist writers without any distinguishing mark to show that he was a Protestant, and also by his pitting Romanist writings against those of Bruno. I have to beg his pardon, and also that of your readers, for the mistake.

Perhaps, however, I may be permitted to add with reference to the animus which he seems to manifest against Bruno, that the chasm between a consistent Romanist and a Protestant of the traditional school is not unbridgeable.

JOHN OWEN.

SHAKSPERE'S "MAKE ROPE 'S IN SUCH A SCARER."—"ALL'S WELL," iv. ii. 38-9.

Lichfield: August 31, 1889.

Dr. Leon Kellner sends me a reference to another instance of this construction with "make," in The Four Sonnes of Aymon (about A.D. 1489), Early-English Text Society (1884), i. 129, l. 7:

"And when they were well clene, the good lady made bryng linnen and other clothes for to chaunge, and to eche of theym a mantelle of fyne scarlet furred with hermyne."

Made bryng = caused to be brought. Perhaps some reader of the ACADEMY knows examples of this usage between Oaxton and Shakspeare.

In a paragraph about the Lichfield MS. 18 in to-day's ACADEMY the Early-English 3 is misprinted y. That MS. often writes "got3," "hat3," &c., for "goeth," "hath," &c.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

SCIENCE.

MATHEMATICAL BOOKS.

American Journal of Mathematics. Vol. XI. No. 4. (Baltimore.) In this number (pp. 293-306) Prof. Cayley resumes and finishes his memoir "On the Surfaces with Plane or Spherical Curves of Curvature." Mr. F. Morley (pp. 307-316), in a note "On the Geometry of a Nodal Circular Cubic," takes the case of a circular cubic, with double focus on itself, which has been discussed by Schröter and Durège in Crelle (Bd. v.), with the additional feature that the curve is nodal. This is an interesting bit of geometrical work, and is illustrated with several figures. "On the Functions defined by Differential Equations, with an Extension of the Puiseux Polygon Construction to these Equations" (pp. 317-328), by Mr. H. B. Fine, gives a simple determination of possible groups of terms, left undetermined by Briot and Bouquet in their memoir "Propriétés des Fonctions définies par des Equations différentielles." M. E. Goursat contributes a memoir (pp. 329-372), "Sur les Solutions Singulières des Equations Différentielles Simultanées," in which he establishes, by direct processes, results most of which are given in M. Darboux's classic paper, "Sur les Solutions singulières des Equations aux Dérivées partielles." "Electro-magnetic Waves and Oscillations at the Surface of Conductors" (pp. 373-387), by Mr. H. A. Rowland, is likely to be very useful. In it the author works out some cases of electro-magnetic waves and the oscillations of electricity on a conducting body. The volume closes with a short note by Mr. J. C. Fields, entitled "The Expression of any Differential Coefficient of a Function of any number of Variables by aid of the corresponding Differential Coefficients of any n Powers of the Function, where n is the order of the Differential Coefficient" (pp. 388-396).

Treatise on Trigonometry. By W. E. Johnson. (Macmillan.) It will be noticed that this is not an elementary treatise, and so is not intended to introduce schoolboys to trigonometrical studies; but it "is intended first for students who are beginning the subject, but are hoping to proceed to more advanced mathematics [thereby many of our school friends are excluded], and secondly for those who are wishing to revive their study of trigonometry, and to extend it beyond the limits of an ordinary elementary text-book."

The author, in our opinion, has well carried out his second intention. The work before us is the largest one on the subject we know; this arises from the fact that

"with the purpose of bringing out clearly the train of reasoning required to establish and expound [certain] principles, it has been thought desirable to make short digressions into geometry, algebra, and the theory of equations."

Much space is devoted to the modern circles, and many interesting proofs and exercises connected therewith are given. In the algebraical division the hyperbolic functions are well treated. Space is devoted to interpolation, and the last two chapters on imaginary and complex quantities and the geometrical interpretation of imaginaries are especially well done. The book can be confidently recommended as supplying to more advanced students much that they would have to look for in many different works, and school teachers will find much suggestive matter in the earlier chapters. Answers are given, except to some few of the miscellaneous exercises at the end.

Statics for Beginners. By J. Greaves. (Macmillan.) The Elementary Statics is too hard a book for the generality of schoolboys; the work before us is thoroughly suited to introduce them to the subject and to lead them some way into it. The whole of the text is well within the reach of intelligent pupils, and is tersely and clearly expressed. In chap. ii. the parallelogram of forces is deduced from the laws of motion, and in chap. iii. Duchayla's proof is offered as an alternative. The ordinary subjects of an elementary text-book are discussed, and in addition there is a short account furnished of the principle of Work, from which the author deduces the condition of equilibrium of the screw. As in the more advanced treatise, several important examples are carefully worked out. In the solution of exercise ii., p. 46, there is a confusion of letters, and the answers to cap. v. ex. 7, cap. vi. ex. i., appear to be incorrect. We have not detected any other mistakes.

An Elementary Treatise on Mechanics, for the use of Schools and Students in Universities. By Rev. L. Warren. (Longmans.) This is a handy book for junior students. It is the first part only of a work on mechanics, and frequent reference is made to Part ii., which will treat of dynamics. A distinguishing feature is the great number of exercises and the collection of Dublin examination papers which contain examples in dynamics as well as statics. An experimental proof only is given of the parallelogram of forces. For other proofs, the reader is referred to Appendix i., Part 2. When the work is issued in a complete form, of course, there will be no objection to such reference, but at present it is somewhat tantalising. A note at the end discusses, with reference to a paper by the Rev. T. K. Abbott in the Philosophical Magazine for January, 1887, "To what order of Lever does the Oar belong?" Students reading for Dublin examinations will find this little book very useful, and others will find matters of interest to repay perusal.

The Students' Plane Trigonometry. By Thomas Roney. (W. H. Allen.) The feature which distinguishes this work from its many rivals is foreshadowed in its further descriptive title, "a Comprehensive Manual for the use of Schools, Colleges, and Private Students, with upwards of 1500 Exercises, specially adapted to the present system of Examinations." There are 571 pages, thus distributed: 397 are taken up with what is usually called the practical part of the subject, treated in seventeen chapters; chap. xviii. discusses Demoivre's theorem, with some of its applications; pages 435 to the end contain the answers with a good deal of helpful detail. The type is large, and, on the whole, clear; the figures are a little shady, but this is the fault of the paper and not of the author. The whole work gives evidence of great painstaking on the part of the writer, and any student who cannot get up the elementary portions of the subject required for entrance and other examinations from it cannot blame Mr. Roney for lack of fulness and clearness of exposition. The only fault we have to find is that school life is too short for all our elementary treatises to be thus fully written. The student has the remedy in his own hands, and must select or have selected for him, a limited course of reading, and carefully work the examples, which are in the main taken from examination papers. None, the author says, have been taken, to his knowledge, from other text-books.

Elementary Algebra, with numerous Examples and Exercises. By R. Graham. (Longmans.) This work covers the usual ground of an elementary treatise. The distinguishing feature of it is the full and admirable treatment of factors, the chapters on which subject we have read with interest and profit. The book is a good practical résumé, well adapted for school use. The numerous examples have been taken from Dublin, Woolwich, Sandhurst, and other examination papers; and answers are given.

A Course of Examples in Elementary Arithmetic, for the use of the Lower Forms at Eton. By J. P. Carter and R. C. Radcliffe. (Eton: Drake.) A well printed and carefully graduated collection of examples, many of which are intended for oral practice, suitable for use in junior forms. Answers to the more difficult exercises are given. In addition, there are 700 miscellaneous questions for out-of-school practice. Such tables as are required are furnished at the commencement.

Solutions of the Examples in Higher Algebra. By H. S. Hall and S. R. Knight. (Macmillan.) This is the fitting complement of the text-book. The modern practice of accompanying the collections of "conundrums" which find a place in our modern Algebras is an admirable one, especially with reference to the "increasing class of students who read mathematics without the assistance of a teacher." We wish the authors of our text-books on Dynamics and other branches of Applied Mathematics would follow in the same track. We have read a great number of these solutions, and have found them to be well suited to their purpose, as they are concisely put, and yet no necessary steps are suppressed. The two works taken together will enable an intending candidate for a scholarship to prepare for, and get a good idea of what he may look to get in, an "Algebra" paper.

Woolwich Mathematical Papers. Edited by E. J. Brooksmith. (Macmillan.) This is a simple collection of the papers "for admission into the Royal Military Academy for the years 1880-1888," nineteen sets in all, which will be very useful to teachers and pupils. The editor has supplied answers to most of the questions. In some of these we have found a few clerical errors, which, however, are readily corrected.

The Uses and Triumphs of Mathematics. By V. E. Johnson. (Griffith, Farran & Co.) This is a defence of mathematicians from a charge, brought by a lady against the race, of being "wet blankets" in society, and of spending their time in trying to "square the circle"; wherein, of mathematics, "its beauties and attractions [are] popularly treated in the language of everyday life." The subject is handled under the various heads: the uses, the triumphs, the limits, the beauty, the attractions, the poetry, of mathematics, with a chapter on metaphysical or spiritualistic mathematics, and an appendix on the "squaring of the circle." The statements are of a very general character, and are supported by numerous quotations from the "orbs of heaven," and the writings of Emerson, Tyndall, Liebig (in one place), Whewell, Bacon, Proctor, and others. The essay is fairly interesting; but we doubt if it will convince any who need convincing, for the praise is too vague, and there are some statements which are—"not to put too fine a point upon it"—questionable. A few misspelt names and grammatical slips seem to show that the "proofs" were hastily read. No harm will be done by a perusal of the book; and, perchance, the lady objector in question may have seen the error of her ways and be now willing to admit a mathematician within the circle of her acquaintance.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MESSRS. BLACKIE & SON will publish immediately a translation of the well-known Organische Chemie of Prof. Berthsen, of Heidelberg. The translator is Dr. George McGowan, of University College, Bangor; and the original text has been specially brought up to date for this edition by the author, who has throughout shown keen practical interest in the perfecting of the English edition.

PROF. MCKENDRICK'S Special Physiology, including nutrition, innervation, and reproduction, will be published in a few days by Messrs. MacLehose & Sons, of Glasgow. This volume will complete Dr. McKendrick's "Text-Book of Physiology," of which the first portion, including General Physiology, was published last year.

PROF. J. L. LOBLEY'S illustrated work on Mount Vesuvius—dedicated by special permission to the King of Italy—will be issued during this month by Messrs. Roper & Drowley.

A NEW volume, by the author of "The Treasures of the Earth," entitled Glimpses of Animal Life, is announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MR. CREIL CARUS-WILSON has published in pamphlet form (Poole: Woodford) a paper read by him before the Bournemouth Society of Natural Science on "Musical Sand." It contains the results of his own observations and experiments on the sands of Studland Bay, where he was the first to notice the phenomenon, similar to that recorded by Hugh Miller in 1850 in the Isle of Eigg. We believe that the subject is now being scientifically investigated in America.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE forthcoming number of the Babylonian and Oriental Record—which is now published by Messrs. Trübner & Co. as well as by Mr. David Nutt—will contain the following articles: "Western Origin of the Early Chinese Civilisation," by Prof. T. de Lacouperie; "A Discourse of King Chosroes, the Immortal-Souled," by Dr. L. O. Casartelli; "A Buddhist Repertory," by Prof. Ch. de Harlez; "Early Semitic Names in Babylonian Contracts," by Mr. W. St. Chad. Boscawen; "Avestic Studies," by Dr. W. Bang.

AFTER the interval of little more than a year, Prof. Eggeling has been able to issue the second part of his elaborate catalogue of the Sanskrit MSS. in the Library of the India Office. The first part dealt with Vedic literature, and enumerated 566 MSS. This second part makes a beginning of the immense field of scientific and technical literature, comprising grammar, lexicography, prosody, and music. The total number of MSS. catalogued is 561, almost identical with the number in the first part; and again the vast majority are due to the untiring industry of H. T. Colebrooke's collectors. Prof. Eggeling's full description of the several MSS., and notes upon their contents, &c., show the pains he has devoted to a comparatively thankless task.

PART III. of Epigraphia Indica: the Record of the Archaeological Survey of India (London: Trübner) contains a facsimile of the famous twelfth edict of Asoka at Shahbazgarhi, in the Punjab, reproduced by photozincography from the impression recently taken by Dr. Burgess. Of Sanskrit inscriptions, edited with translation and introduction, there are three sets in this part. Prof. Bühler, of Vienna—in continuation of what has appeared in a former part—gives a Jain inscription from Kangra, in the Northern Punjab, which shows that Gujarati merchants were settled there in the thirteenth century. Then follow some eight inscriptions from Bundelkhand, edited by Prof. Kielhorn, of Göttingen, most of which relate to the Chandela dynasty of the tenth century, subordinate to the paramount Rajas of Kanauj. Lastly, Dr. Hultzsch, of Bangalore, gives two inscriptions from Gwalior, of the ninth century, which likewise refer to paramount Rajas of Kanauj. Several of these inscriptions had previously been published by Sir A. Cunningham; but they are now edited from more accurate impressions supplied by Dr. Burgess, and the editors have also availed themselves of the great advances recently made in Indian epigraphy. It would hardly be too much to say that the dark period of Hindu history before the arrival of the Mohammedans is now being continually illuminated from coins and inscriptions. Epigraphia Indica, we may add, is printed by the superintendent of government printing at Calcutta, to whom subscribers should address themselves. Four quarterly parts, each of about 56 pages super-royal quarto, besides plates, are given for an annual subscription of 18s.

THE second December part of the Indian Antiquary—which we have only just received—besides containing a very copious index for the year's volume, also gives a notable paper by Mr. J. F. Fleet, entitled "Summary of Results regarding the Epoch and Origin of the Gupta Era." Mr. Fleet here recapitulates the cumulative evidence which confirms the indirect statement of Alberuni that the Gupta era dates from A.D. 319-320, and further that this date must be regarded as that of their rise to power, and not as that of their downfall. He also shows that the computation of years in the Gupta era must be referred to "current" and not to "expired" years, thus differing from the system of the Saka era, which refers to "expired" years. Finally, with regard to the reason why the Gupta kings fixed on A.D. 319-320 for the commencement of their era, he is disposed to find the explanation in their connexion with the Lichchhavi family of Nepal. This last argument, however, is entirely hypothetical, resting upon a different foundation from the other ones.

FINE ART.

THE ART MAGAZINES.

THE Portfolio contains two plates of more than average quality. One is a brilliant etching by Mr. Edward Sloucombe, of La Rue du Vicomte, Rouen, full of well-drawn figures, skillfully introduced; the other is an exquisite little engraving by Mr. E. P. Brandard, after R. P. Bonington. The original of the latter is a small drawing in the South Kensington Museum, called "A Heath traversed by a Winding Road." The text of the number is unusually varied. Mr. Loftie, on Westminster Abbey; Mr. A. H. Palmer, on that excellent, but to this generation comparatively unknown, animal draughtsman, Mr. Joseph Wolf; Mr. Walter Armstrong, on the Paris Exhibition; Mr. Hamerton, on the Eiffel Tower; and Prof. A. H. Church, on Japanese Sword Guards, are all worth reading.

THERE is much in Mr. J. Aldam Heaton's hints on "Beauty in Colour and Form," in the Art Journal for September, which is worth attention from those who have not studied the subject. Temperance and gradation are not, however, all that is requisite to produce fine colour; and without some taste in arrangement it is not so easy to make flowers "go with" one another as the reader might suppose from Mr. Heaton's teaching. The number is a little overweighted with local architectural articles, though Mr. Eustace Balfour on Hadlington Abbey, Mr. William Lethaby on Northamptonshire Steeples, and Mr. Loftie on Hampton Court are all interesting. Mr. Briton Riviere's clever picture of "Pallas Athene and the Herdsman's Dogs" is well reproduced in photogravure.

MISS "FRANCESCA" ALEXANDER's beautiful work in pen and ink is known to so few except by Mr. Ruskin's praise that we welcome the reproduction of one of her drawings in the Magazine of Art. It cannot, however, be said to be successful. Not only is the delicacy of her lines lost, but the plate is poor and dull in texture and tone. A lively article by the editor on the Kernoozers' Club, illustrated by Mr. Harry Furniss; some fine woodcuts by Jonnard of some pieces of the "Sculpture of the Year"; and Mr. Hodgson's reminiscences of Frederick Walker, contained in a paper called "An Artist's Holidays," are the most notable things in a very interesting number.

IN the pages of L'Art for August, the importance of the Retrospective Exhibition of French Art now at the Trocadéro is, we are glad to see, receiving due recognition. Most of the magazine is, indeed, occupied by a series of articles by M. Jules Mannheim, illustrated by numerous blocks of the most interesting objects in this collection.

THE last part of the Jahrbuch der Königlich Preussischen Kunstsammlungen embodies as usual a vast amount of careful research. Dr. Justi's investigations into the work of Hieronymus Bosch in Spain bear fruit in the first article, which is illustrated by a woodcut of an impressive picture of the mocking of Christ, now in the Escorial. The head of Christ, surrounded by those of his brutal tormentors, is singularly noble in its patient endurance. The art of the Van Eycks forms the subject of two articles—one by Otto Seak on the altarpiece at Ghent, and another by Hugo V. Tschudi on the "Madonna mit dem Karthauser" and other pictures recently attributed to Jan. An admirable etching by A. Krüger of the portrait (supposed to be of Arnolfini) at Berlin accompanies this article.

ASSYRIOLOGY IN THE NORTH.

Stockholm: Sept. 1, 1889.

I HOPE next week to send the ACADEMY some account of the Oriental Congress which is at present assembled in Stockholm. By way of preface I will now say something about the Oriental collections of Berlin and St. Petersburg, which I have visited on the way. I must first, however, express my acknowledgment of the very great kindness and courtesy I have experienced in both places, where every facility has been afforded me for examining the monuments and copying texts.

At Berlin the new museum of antiquities and casts from Western Asia was opened to the public last July. Though not large, it contains a number of unique treasures, chiefly derived from the expeditions of Messrs Humann and Puchstein. Foremost among them are the Hittite sculptures of Sinjirli and the casts of the Hittite reliefs at Boghaz Keui. A whole room is devoted to these, and their importance for the study of Hittite art can hardly be exaggerated. From Sinjirli has also come a colossal baserelief of Esar-haddon, representing the king with the same symbols beside him as are found upon his monument at the Nahr el-Kelb. In front of the king are two prisoners, one of them being a Syrian and the other the Ethiopian prince Tirhakah, who is depicted as a negro. The inscription which is engraved on both sides of the stele states that Tirhakah had been smitten from Iakhupri to Memphis, "a distance of fifteen days' journey." Even more remarkable than this stele is another of equally colossal proportions from the same locality. This has a long inscription carved upon it in relief, in Aramaic characters and the Aramaic language, stating that it was erected by his son to Panammu, king of Samahla, the contemporary of Tiglath-pileser. The monument is the most important yet discovered in the domain of Semitic epigraphy, not excepting the Moabite Stone and the Siloam Inscription; and the light it throws on the character of early Aramaic will be a surprise to most scholars. I hope that Profs. Sachau and Schrader will soon be able to make its contents known to the world.

The rich collection of cuneiform tablets from Tel el-Amarna rivals in interest the objects from Sinjirli. Among them are two letters in the unknown languages of Mitanni and the neighbouring Hittite region, the longest of which has just been published by Drs. Abel and Winckler. A very curious object is a bronze bowl from Toprak Kaleh, near Van, on the inside of the rim of which are four Hittite characters. From the same place have come a silver bracelet terminating in the heads of serpents; iron weapons, including a double axe-head; an enamelled bronze statuette, and bronze shields, like those in the British Museum, bearing the name of Rusas, who reigned at Van 650 B.C.

Among the Babylonian antiquities I may mention a contract-tablet dated at Sippara in the second year of Sin-sar-iskun, one of the last kings of Assyria, whose name has been misread Bel-sum-iskun; and the fragment of a tablet inscribed with Babylonian cuneiform on one side and with Greek characters in an unknown language on the other side. Similar fragments exist in the British Museum.

Those who wish to know more about this remarkable collection must consult the Verzeichniss der Vorderasiatischen Altertümer und Gipsabgüsse (Berlin: Spemann), which has been issued by the directors of the museum at the moderate price of sixpence. It is the best catalogue I have ever come across, and as instructive to the scholar as to the ordinary visitor to the museum.

The Hermitage at St. Petersburg, rich as it is in other collections, contains little that has come from Assyria and Babylonia. A few Babylonian cylinders, in fact, represent all that it possesses in this department of study. One of these cylinders, however, is interesting on account of its inscription, which consists of five lines of Accadian. It gives us the name of a new patesi or "High-Priest," Khunnini, and of a new district over which he ruled. This was the land of Kimas, from which in early times the Babylonians obtained their copper. Khunnini also gives himself the title of sakkanakku, the oldest example of the title yet discovered. On another cylinder mention is made of the Canaanitish goddess Asratu or Asherah—mis-translated "grove" in the Authorised Version—who is associated with the hitherto unknown god Ratanu.

In the Oriental Library of the Imperial Academy of Sciences a very curious clay tablet is preserved which was found in the ruins of Babylon, and purchased by an Armenian gentleman at Bagdad in 1810, according to the certificate of the consular agent of "his Imperial Majesty, Napoleon the Great." The tablet is of considerable size, and in excellent condition. I copied the inscription upon it, and found that it was a contract, dated in the eighteenth year of Darius, for the sale of 200 sheep for 15 manehs of silver. The sheep were to be brought into Babylon, and two days were specified upon which the money could be paid. If it were not paid on the second day, interest was to be charged upon the sale-price, at the rate of one shekel per month for each maneh. If, however, the public collections of St. Petersburg offer little to the Assyriologist, they are amply supplemented by the magnificent private collection of Mr. Golénisheff. Mr. Golénisheff possesses more than twenty of the mysterious "Kappadokian" cuneiform tablets, first brought to light by Mr. Pinches, most of them in a very perfect condition. They have enabled their owner and myself to solve the last problem of cuneiform research which still awaited solution.

By comparing his tablets together, Mr. Golénisheff had succeeded in determining the true values of several characters which had been misread, or not read at all, by Mr. Pinches and myself. He had also detected the presence of a large number of proper names, most of them of a specifically Assyrian character, like Asur-rabu, Akhi-Asur, and Asur-malik. Starting from this foundation, I soon found that the language of the tablets was Assyrian, but Assyrian which displayed the same curious peculiarities as that of the Tel el-Amarna tablets from Northern Syria. Thus Kaph becomes Gimel, as in dubbi-ga, "thy tablet," and iliga, "he went," just as it does in the letters of the King of Mitanni to the Egyptian monarchs. Moreover, similar formulae and phrases to those of the Tel el-Amarna letters occur in the Kappadokian documents; and since the forms of the characters used in both are much alike, while the grammar shows the same stage of development, I conclude that the library from which the Kappadokian tablets have come belongs to the age of the eighteenth Egyptian dynasty. It seems to have been established in a temple named Zuasazu. The evidence of the proper names tends to prove that an Assyrian colony was settled there, whose dialect was tinged with local peculiarities. As was natural, the dialect appears to have incorporated a certain number of non-Semitic nouns, probably borrowed from the native languages of the country. The tablets relate to trading transactions and the like. Here, for example, is the provisional translation of one of them: "Deposit 18 shekels of silver on account. Asur-malik the son of Ena-Zuim, the son of Zugania, has the goods. He shall pay for them at the end of four months, but if he has not paid, Qa(?)zalli, the limmu, and Asur-miekhi the sailor shall (exact?) the interest for each month after the four months. Witnessed by Ena-Asur, the son of Eradi and Garia, the son of Subesi." Other tablets begin with the formula: "Say thus to" such and such persons.

At Helsingfors I visited the very interesting museum of Finnish antiquities which has been formed there, and examined the squeezes of the still undeciphered inscriptions and rock-sculptures which have just been brought back by a scientific expedition from Minussinsk and the banks of the Yenisei. The inscriptions are in the same characters as those published by Klaproth some years ago in the Journal Asiatique. The excavations undertaken by the expedition have resulted in the discovery of a large number of objects of bronze and iron, many of which are of a most peculiar shape. They resemble a flat diamond, from one of the points of which issues a short spit. What their use could have been I cannot conjecture.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE Prince of Wales and other members of the royal family have consented to act as patrons of the exhibition of works of art illustrative of sport, to be held during the coming winter at the Grosvenor Gallery, and also to lend contributions from their own collections.

MR. RUSKIN'S museum at Walkley has been handed over to the Sheffield Corporation on loan for twenty years. A document, ratifying the loan and giving the corporation immediate possession of Mr. Ruskin's art treasures, was signed on Tuesday last by the trustees of St. George's Guild. The museum is to be removed to Meersbrook Hall, which was purchased by the corporation a few years ago.

AN amusing story comes from Paris of the sale of a picture by Meissonier at the Hôtel Drouot for a hundred francs. It was knocked down at this price to one of a fraternity of dealers bound not to bid against one another, and none of them appears to have discovered that a prize had been secured till it was submitted to an expert. We have no reason to laugh at such ignorance on the part of our neighbours. We have our "Christies" and our "knock outs," and our masterpieces which sell for "a song" under the noses of "connoisseurs."

THE STAGE.

"THE MIDDLE-MAN."

A HURRIED visit to the theatre, paid between two long railway journeys, may not be the best occasion for gauging very critically the merits of an exciting four-act play; but I must decline to attribute altogether to a month's sojourn in the hills the enthusiasm—for it was nothing less—with which, on Friday in last week, "The Middleman" inspired me. Mr. Jones has done, I am convinced, a very remarkable thing. He has produced the play which his earlier work, good as it was, gave us no actual right to exact from him, but of which it did unquestionably afford the promise. And now the promise is fulfilled. Three dramatic pieces stand out—in my mind at least—as the true dramatic events of the last couple of years. One of them is "Sweet Lavender," the obvious comedy of which the town has understood from the very first, while its pathetic suggestiveness has been recognised more scantily. The second is "The Little Lord Fauntleroy," which, like "Sweet Lavender," has been as exquisite in the interpretation of the principal characters as in the writing. And the third is Mr. Jones's "The Middleman"—a piece not without faults, the precise like of which I do not perceive in the other pieces I have praised, but eminently dramatic, vigorous, fresh, full of the exhibition of human emotion, and of very pungent comedy besides.

Mr. Jones's principal character, one Cyrus Blenkarn—played by Mr. Willard in a way that sets at rest for ever the question as to whether in emotional parts this actor finds his real vocation—this Cyrus Blenkarn is a Bernard Palissy of our time: a potter, doublé d'un artiste: an enthusiast, that is to say, and a genius, who forgets the days of the week and the recurrence of meal-times; who loves his children passionately, but thinks they must wait for his discoveries; who hankers after a certain glaze, the glaze of a bygone period—as the violin maker may hanker after the master's varnish, the amber varnish of Stradivarius. Blenkarn, indeed, is an artist—an artist from head to foot—doomed by his temperament to be engaged in the battle which is to be fought for ever between Art and the Philistine. And such a character Mr. Jones has most sympathetically conceived, most skilfully executed, as regards each literary touch—each evidence of insight and style. And such a character Mr. Willard has embodied with the greatest skill he has ever, as yet, displayed; and what is particularly noticeable in his performance, where so much is noticeable, is that his tenderness is even greater than his imprecation.

Around this figure of Cyrus Blenkarn, and affecting his fortunes for evil or for good, are a group of worthy and unworthy people. No one ridiculously faultless—for the more delightful and poetic of his daughters has been betrayed into a sin of Love—but one or two, I think, a little unnecessarily bad, if truth to typical human character is what is now in debate. Though if the purpose or machinery of the play has alone to be considered, I allow that it is necessary for Joseph Chandler to be not only the narrow -thoughted employer of labour and the conventionally-minded person that we should expect him to be, but mean, pretentious, deceitful to boot: an employer of labour wholly selfish, egotistic, and grasping—the dream of the Socialist, not quite the reality of our manufacturing districts. But Mr. Jones required no doubt to take just the strongest instance he could lay his hands upon. His Mr. Chandler is not a type; but he is a permissible exception. His managing man, Batty Todd, is just as mean, though one does not find any fault with him for not being perfectly content to do nothing but “share in the glory that attaches to the name of Joseph Chandler.” Those who are, in the main, virtuous and admirable—Jesse Pegg, Captain Chandler, Mary, Nancy, and one or two others—are virtuous and admirable in more typical, in less exceptional, fashions. Jesse Pegg is fidelity itself; and nothing is funnier, and very little is prettier, in the play than his love affair with the practical Nancy. Nancy is true to the life, and as true in the acting of Miss Annie Hughes—piquant and sensible and helpful—as in the conception of the author. The two other people with whom we are mainly concerned are Captain Chandler and Mary. Captain Chandler has committed a fault which, when one looks at Mary, it is really difficult to believe of him—it would be about as easy and as natural, one thinks, to a gentleman to approach Mary with roughness as it would be to him to plough a brutal line across the daintiest and dreamiest of Whistler etchings or to smash a delicate figure from Dresden or from Chelsea. But, let that be—

Captain Chandler has committed the fault, and desires to make atonement. We live in a world in which the only atonement is marriage. Mary, herself—with the words Mr. Jones has given her, with the tones and looks Miss Millett bestows on her—is, notwithstanding that which has happened, ingénue to the core. And that, no doubt, was why it did happen—a Mildred Tresham of Mr. Browning, put into prose, but into prose that is never prosaic. She is, at bottom, the worthy daughter of a man who is essentially artist—in both are characters of a profound simplicity, characters of infinite feeling.

One must mention that Mr. Chandler is played with discretion and force by Mr. Macintosh: not with subtlety and pomposity; that Mr. Esmond is to the full as sympathetic as he ought to be as Captain Julian Chandler; that Mr. Garden is homely and natural as Jesse Pegg; that Mr. H. Cane is really excellent and original as Batty Todd; that Mrs. Brooke is good in one very small part, and Miss Eva Moore elegant and engaging in another. And then one must pass on to consider in a little more detail that performance of Mr. Willard's, which, taken in conjunction with the strong purpose of the play, and with its very remarkable execution, guarantees to “The Middleman,” I am convinced, one of the longest runs of the year. Mr. Jones's moral, Mr. Jones's purpose, has apparently something in common with that of the promoters of the “Arts and Crafts”; but while, as what are called “practical people,” it is the duty of these promoters to hold their annual show, it is Mr. Jones's business as an artist to preach his moral only through his art; and, though he has scarcely, in the present instance, adopted art's usual way—that of “telling a truth obliquely”—though he has indeed been for an artist unusually direct and outspoken—yet his purpose, as I conceive it, is thoroughly accomplished. He has said his say with remarkable vigour, with emotion, and with charm. He has shown us, not what a middle-man must, but what a middle-man may be.

And now to Mr. Willard. I have mentioned already by implication that Mr. Willard's tenderness is even more noteworthy than his force. When he wants “revenge”—in a spirit that is, no doubt, as dramatically effective as it is detestably un-Christian—he is not a whit more really forcible and convincing than when he is giving vent to the pent-up love he has cherished for both of his children. Mr. Willard, then, is moving; and Mr. Willard is, of course, energetic and decisive; but he is admirable not chiefly after all because he is these, but because he has understood, down to the very ground, the character Mr. Jones has invented, or has not so much invented as had the penetration to perceive. From the very moment of his entry Mr. Willard gets your attention and holds it. His Cyrus Blenkarn comes in, exquisitely naïve and visionary; dreamy and unkempt; profoundly sensitive and a little lost. Later on—not to speak, of course, of the force and eagerness and excitement, which can escape no dullard's observation, which have no need to be pointed out—later on, his Cyrus Blenkarn shows the actor's quiet humour, and his sense of courtesy, combined. Nothing in this matter is better than his scene with the busybodies who interrupt the potter at his work.

Never in our time has there been shown so well upon the stage the absorption, the frenzy almost, of high artistic labour, yet the capacity for gentleness of the man who pursues it. There was wanted real imagination to convey these, and Mr. Willard has had the imagination. Let me add, though it is but a small matter in comparison, that the actor has had the good sense to perform accurately as they really are—and not loosely so that only the ignorant can believe in them—the operations of the potter with his clay and his furnace. The man's mind and the man's work—Mr. Willard has understood both; and he presents with extraordinary vividness, with delicacy, and yet somehow always with characteristic breadth, the record of Cyrus Blenkarn's fortunes.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Review of the New York Musical Season, 1888-1889. By H. E. Krehbiel. (Novello.) The special object of this compilation is to give a complete record of music performed at New York, but the well-known critic of the Tribune newspaper has added thereto many interesting and instructive critical comments. Dvorák's clever Symphonic Variations he aptly describes as “the creation of a musician in whom are combined in an almost equal degree the capacity to originate interesting ideas and present them in a fascinating manner.” There is a thoughtful article on Wagner's “Rheingold.” Mr. Krehbiel appears to us to look at it in the right light—as a preparation for the more complex trilogy. In poetical and musical beauty it is naturally inferior to these, for it is the exposition of matter which is afterwards fully developed. In speaking of Grieg's “Peer Gynt” music as “not strongly imaginative but undeniably pretty,” he seems scarcely to do it justice. We venture to think it highly imaginative and more than pretty. In the list of operas given at the Metropolitan Opera House we find that “La Juive” of Halevy drew larger audiences than either “Faust” or “Aida.” Why is it never given in London? The season consisted of sixty-eight performances, of which no less than thirty-three were devoted to Wagner. His works brought into the exchequer of the Opera House an average of 16,540 dollars each, while the nine operas by other composers yielded an average of 10,421 dollars. Facts, as Mr. Krehbiel truly remarks, are stubborn things. There is a long and interesting article on readings of movements of Beethoven's seventh and eighth Symphonies. The volume has a capital index.

Historical Programmes. By J. J. Hughes-Hughes. (Arliss Andrews.) Here we have a set of forty-three programmes, drawn up so to show the development of music from Palestrina to Wagner. Some of the earlier numbers, such as the one on early French composers, or the one entitled “Predecessors of Bach and Handel,” are well arranged and present pleasing variety. Two and a half programmes devoted to Mendelssohn, with but a half and a quarter programme to Schumann and Chopin, show that the scheme is not a recent one. At the present day one would, at the very least, give to all three equal importance. There are other weak points in these panoramic programmes, but the idea is a good one. Mr. Hughes tells us in his preface that all the music was actually performed by a “little society of amateurs”—small, perhaps, in numbers, but certainly great in enterprise.

LITERATURE.

"MEN OF ACTION."—Wellington. By George Hooper. (Macmillan.)

MR. HOOPER has naturally been selected to sketch the life and career of Wellington for Messrs. Macmillan's series of "Men of Action." The Wellingtonian legend was once as strong in England as the Napoleonic in France; and Mr. Hooper is one of a class of writers who have maintained that the duke was unrivalled in war. He has sustained this position in a book on Waterloo, which simply shows either that he has no conception of the great principles of the military art, or that he takes care to keep them out of view when violated by a half-worshipped chief. He justifies, for instance, the delay at Brussels, and admires the double retreat on Wavre and Waterloo. A reaction against Wellington has set in of late: his great qualities as a soldier and statesman have been underrated by critics of this day; and we are not sorry to see an attempt made by an industrious student to redress the balance, even though he errs on the side of eulogy. Mr. Hooper's work is a well-filled account of the main incidents of Wellington's career. It describes his campaigns with abundant knowledge; and it contains personal stories and anecdotes of interest to the general reader. As an epitome of facts, it is, indeed, often excellent; it usually places events in true proportion—a great merit in a book of the kind; and its style is lucid and without pretension. But it is too often a mere encomium; it shows little knowledge of the science of war; its judgments want discernment and breadth; and it does not disengage the personality of the duke from masses of details which overload it, nor give us his living and most striking image. As might have been expected, its sketch of the campaign of 1815 is misleading and shallow.

Mr. Hooper tells us a good deal about Wellington's boyhood and early youth; but he does not notice the special circumstances which probably moulded, to some extent, the character of the future man. He was an Anglo-Irishman of a dominant caste ruling a subject, but a reluctant, race; and in his case, as in that of other worthies, this position gave him the habit of command and the indifference to the common herd of men, which were among his distinctive qualities. The duke was not brilliant at Eton or Angers: indeed, he never was what could be called brilliant; and we do not agree with Mr. Hooper that he had the gift of "imagination" as a military chief, for it was precisely in this that he was most deficient. But from his first manhood he showed that he possessed strong sense, a singularly sound judgment, and especially thoroughness in doing his work; and, though his promotion at first was due to favour, he was soon recognised as a regimental officer of conspicuous parts, and of the highest promise. These qualities, and the special powers which made him a real genius in defensive war—tenacity, insight, and unerring tact in adapting means to well-considered ends—were first seen in the campaign of 1794; and it was then, too, that the future commander perceived the faults of the system of war which had made revolutionary France victorious, and the immense shortcomings of the continental armies led by men like Coburg, Brunswick, and Beaulieu. Wellington was given his opportunity by his renowned brother; and the "Sepoy general," long contemned by Napoleon, exhibited in India many of the great faculties which ere long attracted the notice of Europe. As a military administrator he showed peculiar excellence. He proved that he could be extremely bold when the occasion required, and he obtained an extraordinary ascendancy over the officers he led, and over chiefs of inferior races. Yet, though Assaye was a great feat of arms, it was faulty as a strategic effort. We see here, at an early period, the weak point of Wellington in war; and, like Talavera and other instances, it seemed to justify Napoleon's remark that this master of defence could at times be imprudent and ignorant of the rules of the art. It deserves special notice that Wellington's genius in India was even more distinctly seen in civil than in military affairs. He grasped the political situation of the Peninsula, as a whole, with a sagacity which has been never surpassed; and, unlike his more adventurous brother, his councils were always on the side of peace, of economy, of prudence, of national good faith.

Wellington was sent to Portugal in 1808; and—omitting an absence of a few months—he returned to England in 1814, having liberated Spain from the yoke of Napoleon, and thrown a decisive weight into the scales of fortune, when France was invaded after Leipzig. His fame, as a warrior, in the main depends on what he accomplished in this great contest, and, assuredly, it will be splendid and lasting. The vulgar English notion that he proved himself to be an infallible and unrivalled chief, and that his army could always defeat its enemy is, we need not say, a silly delusion; and traditions like these should have no place in history. Enormous as were the difficulties in his way and the odds he had more than once to contend with, the duke had some advantages on his side. The disadvantages of the French were many; and this should be steadily borne in mind in an impartial review of the Peninsular War. The English general had the vast power given by the sea as a movable base, he was supported by a furious national movement, of prodigious strength in a country like Spain. The French chiefs were bound down to long strategic lines almost impossible to guard or to secure, and were isolated in the midst of a universal rising; and, while Wellington held an undivided command, Napoleon's lieutenants were far from each other and were often divided by unseemly discords. Yet, when all reasonable allowances have been made, the achievements of Wellington in the Peninsula give him no doubtful place among great commanders. As a strategist, indeed, he did not excel. His advance up the Tagus in 1809 would have probably led to his utter ruin had Napoleon directed the French armies. His march to Vittoria ought to have accomplished more. Even his operations against Soult in 1813-14 were not strikingly grand or decisive. His sieges, too, are not models of the art. Like all generals, he made grave mistakes, and was, more than once, in imminent peril; and though he could admirably form and train an army, he had not the genius which inspires soldiers with enthusiasm, and is the best pledge of victory—a fault doubtless due to the spirit of caste and of exclusiveness which were parts of his nature. Yet Wellington was a chief of extraordinary powers within somewhat contracted limits, and the Peninsula was a perfect theatre for them. He showed genius in defence in the highest degree: this was illustrated in a hundred instances; and if he was not a general of great combinations, he displayed wonderful skill in offensive battles, for example the Douro, Salamanca, Toulouse. Yet his most conspicuous gifts were his profound judgment, which, as if by intuition, gauged the strength of his own forces and those of his foe, and decided for the best at a given moment; and, above all, his inflexible constancy—the finest example of moral courage exhibited by any warrior of the time. Alone, of all the captains of the day, he perceived the peccant part in the methods of war which grew out of the French revolution; alone he did not cover at the name of Napoleon, or believe that the emperor was invincible.

The qualities, in truth, which have gained for Wellington enduring renown in the Peninsular War were not mainly those of even a great soldier. Daun might have made the lines of Torres Vedras, might have retired and held them after Busaco; but Wellington, alone of the men of his day, had the sagacity to perceive that Napoleonic conquest could be permanently stayed by this obstacle, and that the successful defence of Portugal might lead to the emancipation of Europe. Frederick probably would have made Salamanca and Vittoria yield more ample results. Napoleon, in Wellington's place, would have struck the divided French marshals right and left, and have repeatedly crushed them by his dazzling strategy. But neither Frederick nor Napoleon would have clung to a rock, all but deprived of resources for war, confronting the power of embattled Europe, and yet calmly confident of success at last; and neither would, out of the smallest beginnings, have extended their power over vast regions through perseverance and the power of endurance. It is this wonderful prescience and firmness—the gift of the greatest statesmen as well as of warriors—which raises Wellington to grandeur in Spain. In this respect he far surpasses Napoleon, not to speak of other captains of the age; and he bears a strong resemblance to Caesar—supreme in politics far more than in war. Except, too, that he never possessed the faculty of winning the hearts of men, Wellington showed in Spain that he could be a great ruler and an administrator of the highest order. He managed the jealous and reluctant Cortes, bowed the envious Spanish generals to his will, maintained his sway over whole provinces; and he made a proud, suspicious, and almost hostile people feel that his commanding influence was always on the side of honesty, justice, and really good government. Nor should we forget how these great faculties told powerfully on the invasion of France. They made the presence of the British army welcome, and detached thousands from the cause of Napoleon.

This great soldier, and still greater man, was destined in 1815 to meet the most famous master of modern war. Without imagination, or strategic genius, Wellington did not foresee the grand project which sent the French army to the verge of Belgium to strike an isolated part of the hosts of Europe. He could not comprehend the marvellous skill with which the movement was made in secrecy; and the allied chiefs were utterly baffled on June 14, 15, and 16. Mr. Hooper's sketch of this mighty contest is decidedly the worst part of his book, and the true student of war will turn away from it. With an army very inferior in numbers, Napoleon all but brought to destruction an enemy nearly two-fold in strength; and, in fact, but for his lieutenant's errors, he would have annihilated Blücher on the field of Ligny, and would, almost certainly, have gained Waterloo. The duke was not blind to his errors in the campaign; they are, in truth, palpable and beyond dispute; and it is simply absurd to compare his generalship with that of Napoleon in the sphere of strategy. His constancy, however, and his genius in defence were grandly displayed on the great day of Waterloo; and this was his one merit in this memorable strife.

We must pass lightly over the later parts of Wellington's glorious and honoured career. Like most soldiers, he did not understand the play of constitutional and popular forces: he did not comprehend the great movement which agitated Europe after the peace; and he took the wrong side on important questions of politics whether abroad or at home. But his sagacity and all but perfect judgment kept him free from extravagant Tory errors; he ridiculed the Holy Alliance and its creed; he conceded, if the concession was late, the just demands of Catholic Ireland; he knew when to yield on such grave issues as the Corn Laws and Reform in Parliament. As age advanced he became the mentor of ministries, whether Whig or Tory; his wisdom in council was thought supreme; he was an admirable adviser on all subjects of diplomacy, of Indian and of foreign politics. Moderation, good faith, international right, and the love of peace were his cardinal principles; but he was not blind to the dangers of England, due to false economy and democratic folly; and he inaugurated the demand for national defence which at last has made itself decisively felt. The nation mourned him, when he passed away, as its foremost and most illustrious citizen; and history will confirm the verdict. Great as a soldier, but greater as a servant of the state, in war Wellington has been surpassed; but he was a captain of extraordinary prudence and judgment. He did not attain the first rank in politics, but England has never had a better counsellor; and his career justifies the poet's epitaph:

"Oh, tower full square to all the winds that blew!"

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

The Song of the Bell, and Other Translations.

By Sir Theodore Martin. (Blackwood.)

ABOUT half of this volume consists of translations of Schiller's minor poems; the rest is made up of versions from Goethe, Uhland, and other German poets; three from the Romaic, including the beautiful "Charon and the Souls"; one from Petrarch; three sonnets from Ariosto; a version and an imitation—the weakest thing in the book—of Horace's Ode to Pyrrha; lastly, two poems, "The Jovial Priest's Confession" and "The Monk's Dream," the former based, I think, upon a Latin original ascribed to Walter de Maupais.

The latter poem is one of great—I had almost said awful—power. How much of this is due to the poem to which Sir Theodore Martin refers (p. 284) as existing in the Auchinleck MS. in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, I regret that I am ignorant; but in any case our gratitude is due to Sir Theodore Martin for making "current coin" of such powerful poetry. If it be from his own mint, so much greater is the obligation. The poem is a "disputation between the Body and the Soul," newly parted and casting mutual reproaches at each other for the doleful prospect of damnation. (I am writing without the opportunity of reference—am I wrong in thinking that there is a poem of Villon's much resembling this in tenour?) How grimly impressive is the controversy!

"Soul! Soul! thou wrong'st me," cried the Body, "so
To charge thy fall from heaven's delights on me!

What'er I did or said, for weal or woe,
Thou know'st full well was ever seen by thee.
Where'er I went, I bore thee with me; we
Were loving co-mates then, blythe was my cheer,
I lacked for nought, and time went merrily.
O woful time! since thou hast left me here,
A dull unmoving clod, upon my joyless bier."

"'Tis true that thou did'st bear me," said the Soul,
'With thee at all times, as thou wert my steed.

So was I helpless bound in thy control,
I could not else but stoop to thee, as need
Must he whose fate is to his hand decreed.

I saw thee fair and goodly to the view,
And on thee all my love I cast. Methought
Thou could'st not err; and so thy passions grew Headstrong and fierce, nor would not e'er be taught.

It had been vain, that with thee I had fought.
Greed, envy, hatred, pride, that did defy
E'en God, possessed thy heart; thou didst besot

Thyself in lust and gluttony: and I Must fast in fires for this. Well may I wail and cry."

There seems to be a superfluous negative in the sixth line from the end; the rhymes, too, are a little jejune. But there is a tragic gravity and directness in the thought which outweighs little defects, and makes one regret that we have not more original verse from the same hand.

It is almost superfluous to say that the translations are full of grace and vigour. If I say that they are a little disappointing, it is from the point of view of one who greatly admires the translator's version of Faust, and particularly that of Part I. It seems to me that Sir Theodore Martin shows a stronger wing in a longer flight than in these flittings from tree to tree in the stately forest of Schiller. I can imagine a person reading the version of Faust without discovering that it was a translation; I find it hard to imagine the same illusion about the present volume. The delightfully spirited version of the "Song of the Bell," for instance, bewrays itself as a translation constantly by the divorce between the rhyme and the emphasis. Once only, but then most effectively, does the translator quite rise above this defect. It is in the final consecration of the bell (p. 24).

"With heaven's blue canopy above her,
High o'er our toils and struggles here,
Shall she, the thunder's neighbour, hover,
And border on the starry sphere;
A voice she shall be from above,
Even like the shining starry throng,
That, moving, praise their Maker's love,
And lead the circling year along.
To solemn things, and only such,
Let her metallic music chime,
And let her, swiftly swinging, touch,
Each hour, the flying skirts of time!
Let her to fate an utterance lend,
Herself without a heart to feel,
And on life's change and chance attend
With evermore recurring peal."

Like the original, it is more attractive than really great, as poetry; but as a translation it has the two great merits—it is thoroughly natural and vigorous English, into which the feeling of the original has been thoroughly transfused.

English lovers of Schiller will, I think, especially at this epoch, regret the omission of "Die unüberwindliche Flotte" from those selected here for translation; the "Klage der Ceres," too, can ill be spared—it is the most pathetic and profound of the minor poems. "Die Götter Griechenlands" is hackneyed, and may possibly have been omitted for that reason—yet age cannot wither, nor custom stale, some of its stanzas; and its wistful classical memories should have commended it, one thinks, to the translator of Catullus and Horace. But "The Cranes of Ibycus" (pp. 83-91) is here, and is, I think, the finest translation in the book—witness, e.g., the appearance of the chorus (p. 87):

"Who, grave and stern, with measured, slow
And solemn stride, that boded woe,
From the far scene advancing, wound
The theatre's wide circuit round.
So never this earth's women strode,
No mortal home such beings bred;
Their limbs in bulk gigantic howed
High over every human head.
A black robe round their loins was flung;
Aloft in fleshless hands they swung
Torches that flashed with lurid glare;
Their cheeks, no blood was circling there;
And where round mortal temples curl
The locks that wind with winning charm,
There snakes are seen to writhe and twirl,
And adders, puffed with venom, swarm."

It is not perfect: the antithesis of the Furies' limbs being seen high over human heads is awkward, and has no place in the original. But the general effect is certainly very fine, and the metre and rhyming are excellently reproduced. Not less effective is the blank verse rendering of "Das verschleierte Bild zu Sais," an extract from which will be welcome (p. 126):

"Here now he halts, and, standing there alone,
The lifeless hush clings round him like a pall,
A hush unbroke, save that his tread awakes
A hollow echo in the mystic vaults."

Down through an opening in the arching dome
The moonlight streams, a pale and silvery blue,
And, awe-inspiring, like some present god,
Through the dark shadows of the vaulted shrine
In its long drooping veil the statue gleams."

There is something too much of monotony here; yet it is extraordinarily like the original in tone and effect.

A certain hardihood in rhyming is visible, here and there, throughout these translations—e.g., in Cassandra's lament (p. 121) "so blest" and "noblest" strike one's ear as more ingenious than pathetic; on p. 19, the subject being serious, "from its" and "vomits" form a discord. "The Diver" (pp. 24-33) is not so attractively rendered as it was by Lord Lytton; neither translator has reproduced the effect so powerfully achieved by Schiller by a simple variation of the metre in the last line:

"Den Jüngling bringt keines wieder."

Of the other translations, the one that seems written with most fire and force is the version (pp. 246-9) of Freiligrath's "Hurrah, Germania!"; the most touching is the fragment from the Romaic, called "Iotis Dying" (p. 225); the most popular, perhaps, will be "Napoleon's Midnight Review" from the original of Zedlitz. The selections from the "Roman Elegies" of Goethe (pp. 197-203) are beautifully rendered; but one hexameter on p. 198 seems to limp:

"In the thronged festival Hero's eyes met Leander's, and straightway," &c.;

and, on p. 203, should we not read "Orcus" for "Oreus"?

The book, on the whole, is worthy of one who has deserved well of the Muse of translation, if there be such a Muse.

E. D. A. MORSHEAD.

Chronicon Galfridi le Baker de Swynebroke.

Edited, with Notes, by Edward Maunde Thompson. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

The publication of any of our mediæval historians with a full apparatus of notes is a matter for congratulation, and we therefore gladly welcome Mr. Thompson's edition of the Chronicles of Geoffrey le Baker of Swinbrook.

In his introduction Mr. Thompson has given us a sufficient account of Baker and of the only MS. which contains the complete Chronicle. Perhaps a fuller discussion of the author's credibility might have been of service. The notes and illustrations are, on the whole, of the most copious character, and we have not noticed many deficiencies. There is, however, a somewhat lengthy gap from pp. 36 to 40, and in these pages there are a few points which seem to deserve notice. For instance, on p. 38 occurs the following passage:

"Alexander Scotorum rex habuit tres filias sine masculo, quarum primam maritavit Johanni de Bayliol, alteram [Johanni] de Comyn et terciam Roberto le Bruyns predicto" (i.e., King Robert I. of Scotland).

Even though Baker is not here writing as a contemporary, it was surely worth while to point out this remarkable series of blunders. Obvious though they may be, attention should be drawn to whatever may serve to throw light on the author's knowledge of what we may call the Prolegomena to his history.

Baker has of course gone hopelessly wrong. The family of Alexander III., who had no son, was extinct, and his grandfather, David, Earl of Huntingdon, had, besides the three daughters referred to, a son, viz., Alexander II. Of the husbands, moreover, Robert Brus is alone correctly named, and he is confused with his great-grandson, King Robert I. What, again, is the origin of the story (on p. 39) of how Joan of Navarre proved the legitimacy of her birth by exposing herself to hungry lions? Further on, Edward's appointment as Vicar of the Empire, and the cancelling of the appointment, are both mentioned, and both passed without comment in the notes. The omissions are not, however, very noteworthy; and all important matters receive abundant illustration.

Stowe, in his Annales, adopted Baker's Chronicle as his leading authority, as a rule simply translating him with more or less accuracy. Mr. Thompson has therefore wisely given the parallel passages in his notes. Another authority of which much use has been made is the Brute Chronicle (Harley MS. 2279), the extracts from which are often of interest. Illustrations from and references to other authorities, as the Foedera, Murimuth, the Monk of Malmesbury, the Annales Paulini, the Chronicle of Lanercost, Jehan le Bel, Froissart, &c., are given freely. While on this point we may express a wish that the editions referred to were always stated, e.g., of Murimuth, which, to judge from the references, is not that of the English Historical Society, and no other is now accessible to the writer. This perhaps explains Mr. Thompson's statement on p. 235 that Murimuth gives September 29 as the date of the capture of the five ships off Sluys in 1339. It is not so given in our text. Two especially useful notes are those on the march to Crecy, and on the raid of the Black Prince, both of them illustrated by maps. There is also a plan of the Battle of Poitiers; but why is there none of Crecy? A map to illustrate the march of the Black Prince to Poitiers—although Baker is not so full here—might also have been a useful addition. Finally, there is an index which, so far as we have tested it, is both copious and accurate. We need only add that, since the volume both as regards type and paper is worthy of the Clarendon Press, it is pleasant to use; and Mr. Thompson's editing, despite our criticism of minor points, is such as to make his edition of the most real service. We can only wish that more of our historians had met with like treatment.

To turn from the edition to the author, we know scarcely anything of Geoffrey le Baker except what he himself tells in his Chronicle, which is a very meagre record of events from the Creation, occupying less than twenty pages in this edition. In the colophon to this little work he says:

"Memorandum quod die Veneris, in festo sancte Margarete virginis, apud Oseneye, anno Domini M.CC.C.xlviii., et anno regni regis Edwardi tercii a conquesto xxi., Galfridus le Baker de Swynebroke, clericus, ad rogatum domini Thome de la More, militis, scripsit istud croniculum."

Although Baker calls himself "clericus," he does not seem to have been a canon of Osney, since he makes little or no reference to the affairs of that house. Swinbrook is a village in Oxfordshire, about two miles east of Burford, and eleven miles from Northmoor, formerly Mora or Moor, to which place Baker's patron, Sir Thomas de la More, appears to have belonged. Owing to a mistaken interpretation of a passage in the Chronicon—the longer of the two works here published—it has been held that this chronicle was in part merely a translation of a French work by Sir Thomas de la More. This portion was popular during the sixteenth century in transcripts, under the title, "Vita et Mors Edwardi secundi, Gallice conscripta a generosissimo milite, Thoma de la Moore," and was edited by Camden in 1603, and has been re-edited in the Rolls Series (Chronicles of the Reigns of Edward I. and Edward II., edited by William Stubbs). The Bishop of Oxford has faith in the existence of the French Life; but we are inclined to agree with Mr. Thompson that the passage on which this theory of authorship is founded simply means that Baker's patron wrote out for him a narrative of Edward II.'s resignation of the crown—a scene of which he had been a spectator.

With regard to authorities, Baker has down to 1341 adopted Murimuth as the basis of his own history, often transcribing him with little or no variation, but from time to time adding additional information of real interest. The system on which he worked may be clearly seen by comparing Baker's and Murimuth's accounts of the Battle of Sluys. It is, perhaps, a pity that Mr. Thompson did not adopt some arrangement which would have shown clearly what Baker has merely borrowed from Murimuth. Baker himself felt a special interest in the great wars of his time; and "his descriptions of campaigns and battles are certainly founded upon informations imparted by persons who had had a share in them, and in many particulars bear the stamp of unusual accuracy." These form the principal events for which the chronicle is of special value; and the domestic incidents of Edward III.'s reign receive little notice except for an interesting passage on the Black Death. Many details, however, regarding the deposition of Edward II., and the pathetic story of that king's cruel sufferings, have come down to us through Stowe from Baker, who had obtained his information from Sir Thomas de la More, and from William Bishop, one of the dethroned monarch's keepers.

Baker lived till 1358, and was at work on his chronicle up to that time. Thus he had seen the glory of the early part of the reign of Edward III., without witnessing the shadows amid which it closed; so he is full of admiration for his "gloriosus rex Anglie" and of hatred for the "tirannus Francorum," as he calls Philip of Valois. Similarly John II. is always "coronatus," and not "rex." With his admiration for Edward III. there went, not unnaturally, warm sympathy for his father, whom he calls "rex piissimus." For Isabel, Mortimer, and Bishop Orleton, he does not attempt to conceal his dislike, while Thomas of Lancaster is in his eyes a traitor. This will suffice to indicate what is the colouring of Baker's chronicle, and it is not such as to materially detract from his trustworthiness. He is most useful for the Scotch and French campaigns of Edward III.; and here, as already remarked, he seems to have had peculiarly good information. With regard to the history of the captivity of Edward II, it must be remembered that it was, by Baker's own statement, written down more than twenty years after the event, and should, therefore, be received with caution. But, despite the insertion of some curious stories, as on the death of Charles of Valois (p. 36), Baker is in the main trustworthy. His weakest point is chronology. He not only adopts the unfortunate system of Murimuth, but makes a variety of blunders of his own, apparently due to the fact that he did not write from year to year. Probably he did not commence his work much before 1350, and certainly revised it as late as 1358 (cf. pp. 58, 76, and 155). The chronicle ends somewhat abruptly in 1356; but, from a phrase on p. 139—"annali proximo dicendis"—it would apparently have been continued, but for the author's death.

The only known MSS. are Bodley 761 and Cotton Appendix LII. The latter contains only the reign of Edward III., from which we may conjecture that the histories of the two reigns were transcribed separately—hence the mistake as to More. The former, which, in addition to the Chronicle, contains the short Chroniculum already referred to, is fully described by Mr. Thompson, who has found the probable original owner in one Thomas de Walmesford, a contemporary of Baker, and a dependent of the Bohuns—a family with which Baker himself was apparently connected.

C. L. KINGSFORD.

The Lambeth Conferences of 1867, 1878, and 1888. Edited by Randall T. Davidson. (S.P.C.K.)

THE Lambeth Conference of Bishops of the Anglican Communion under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury has not in the past been regarded with much seriousness by the British public. Even Churchmen have failed to appreciate its importance or to find its proceedings worth their notice. But a glance at this excellently edited summary of the proceedings of the three conferences will convince every intelligent reader that his indifference has been foolish, and leave him with the conviction that the conference may very possibly be of immense importance in the future history of the English Church, and is certainly an experiment to be watched by thoughtful Englishmen with careful interest.

In the politics of the future no question will be more anxiously canvassed than the possibility and the means of holding together in some sort of union not merely nominal the numerous members of the British empire. The expansion of England as soon as it is realised compels us to plan some provision against the disintegration which continually threatens unwieldy bodies; and an effort to unite for any object the English-speaking communities and secure from them united action challenges the attention of all good citizens. The Lambeth Conference is such an effort. It is a conference in which all churches of the Anglican Communion are or may be represented; and its object is to enable those churches to maintain and to realise their unity, and to prevent them from drifting apart either in discipline, doctrine, or ritual.

The necessity of such a convention is proved clearly by the list of subjects reported upon by the first meeting in 1867. The functions and relations of synods—general, provincial, and diocesan—the nature and powers of courts of metropolitans, the method of electing a bishop, are not matters which can be left undecided, if the Anglican churches are to remain in vital union with each other. Bishop Selwyn, to whom especially the calling of the first conference was due, learned the importance of these questions of organisation in his vast diocese of New Zealand; and the reading of the records of the conference enables us to realise how unregulated in their relations to each other the different provinces are, and how many serious questions of ecclesiastical politics have arisen in colonial and missionary dioceses, which must be settled by some central authority, if they are to be settled at all. The personal question of the position of Bishop Colenso was undoubtedly a main cause of the calling of the first conference, and it is clear that the conference was regarded by many as directed expressly against him. A desire to find some engine whereby he might be crushed plainly occasioned the demand in 1867 for some "voluntary spiritual tribunal," consisting of archbishops and bishops, to judge heresy in high places. In 1878 the report on "voluntary boards of arbitration" declares that a "Provincial Court of Appeal" is all that is required, and the idea is no longer in the air that the conference should seek to exert any disciplinary power. Besides the disturbing question of the alleged heresy of Colenso, the first conference was hampered by mistaken methods of procedure, which experience has enabled it successfully to avoid.

The conferences of 1867 and 1878 are taken up almost entirely with the discussion of questions of ecclesiastical organisation, all of them of great importance, but not of absorbing interest to the general reader. In 1888 the subjects discussed are less technical and more popular. Four out of twelve reports are on "Intemperance," "Purity," "Observance of Sunday," and "Socialism." It is apparent that the conference is becoming not only a court for the arrangement of the mutual relations of dioceses and provinces, but also an occasion upon which bishops can discover how far they are agreed upon social matters of urgent interest, and can give expression to their agreement when arrived at. The discussions, in fact, show a tendency to divide into the three heads of doctrinal, political, and ethical or social. We can make only a very few notes on the reports, confining ourselves to those of 1888 on social matters.

The report on "Purity" is the finest in the book. It is the best and strongest declaration of Christian teaching on the subject with which we are acquainted. That the Church should feel the necessity and duty of holding a clear creed on the matter is a most healthy sign.

The report on "Intemperance" will probably dissatisfy some readers. It is the only report issued by the conference which can be said to take up an extreme view on the subject it treats of. Its uncompromising tone is perhaps due to the influence of the Bishop of London, who signs it on behalf of the committee. It insists that "total abstainers live longer than other men," and emphatically recommends total abstinence as "the main weapon" in the warfare against drunkenness. "The burden of the work must be borne by those who are willing to abstain entirely." While the "fanaticism" of some teetotalers is reprehended, total abstinence is yet recommended to clergymen generally wherever intemperance has to be resisted. With the practical wisdom of this we heartily agree; but the conference found themselves unable to unanimously endorse the report, and merely "commended" it to "the consideration of the Church." They also added a resolution that "unfermented juice of the grape in the administration of the cup is unwarranted by the example of Our Lord, and is an unauthorised departure from the custom of the Catholic Church." This resolution we regret. The British workman will never believe that Christ insisted on the alcohol which was doubtless present in the cup at the first institution. The expression "juice of the grape" might surely be allowed to reconcile difficulties.

The report on Socialism will surprise many. It is clearly declared, after the quotation of several standard definitions of Socialism, that "between Socialism as thus defined and Christianity there is obviously no necessary contradiction," and also that "government can do much to protect the class known as proletarians from the evil effects of unchecked competition." Although the proposals of land and capital nationalists are criticised severely they are yet treated with respect. Throughout the report the writers, while stating their own views honestly and clearly, fully admit the lofty morality of the Socialist ideals, and recognise that they are inspired by an honourable desire to mitigate or abolish grievous and obvious evils.

In the Encyclical Letter of 1888, there is a sentence on inspiration which we will quote:

"The dangers arising from the hostile or sceptical temper and attitude are increased by the difficulty of determining how far our teaching and the popular acceptance of it can be harmonised with a due consideration for the views on inspiration, and especially on the character of the discipline of the Old Testament dispensation, which, although they have never received definite sanction in the Church, have been long and widely prevalent."

It is fortunate that the conference has usually expressed itself more clearly than in this very obscure and cautious sentence; but if we understand it rightly, it is a sharp criticism of the orthodox theory of the inspiration of the Scriptures, and as such it is welcome.

We have no space for further comment, but a word must be said on the praiseworthy and successful efforts made by the writers of the reports to be brief and clear. Expressions of opinion from such a body as the Lambeth Conference can only fail to impress if they become too long or too intricate. The temptation to tediousness has often proved too strong for assemblies of divines, and the world has consequently ignored their proceedings; but so far the Lambeth Conference has not hidden its doings in a cloud of words or under a mountain of documents. Even those who find the resolutions arrived at by such a large and responsible body of men too cautious, and are disposed to complain of them as occasionally reactionary and illiberal, must respect the solid and grave distinctness with which they are expressed. While the English Church can speak with a voice so clear, so brief, and so earnest, she will always get a hearing from Englishmen.

We have said nothing on the vision of the Anglican Church of the future, which rises in our mind's eye as we read the records of the conferences. The Church of England may become in another century a larger and more imposing organisation than even the Church of Rome can ever claim to have been, and the Lambeth Conference may prove to have been the first step towards this consummation. But Rome has fallen because of her organisation. It is worth noticing that the English prelates seem fully aware that the principle of their organisation must be freedom, and properly fearful of any proceedings which might interfere with the liberty of national churches.

The Dean of Windsor deserves the highest praise for his careful and judicious editing. His narrative tells in thirty-four pages just what we want to know of the calling and history of the conferences without any superfluous comment or criticism. The arrangement of the volume is excellent.

RONALD BAYNE.

An Aberdeenshire Village Propaganda Forty Years Ago. By Robert Harvey Smith. (Edinburgh: David Douglas.)

THIS little volume (especially the introduction to it, which is written by the author of Johnny Gib of Gushetneuk) is of much value because of the glimpses it gives of a man who, chiefly through the medium of the press, was not many years ago a considerable intellectual force in Aberdeen and that district of Scotland of which Aberdeen is the capital. Mr. Harvey Smith speaks with pardonable, but yet rather provincial if not parochial, enthusiasm of "the great intellectual wave—popularly known as 'The Mutual Instruction Movement'—which swept across the north-eastern counties of Scotland, rising to its highest level perhaps in 1852, and leaving behind it many permanent and far-reaching results."

The honorary president of the Mutual Instruction Union, which sprung out of this movement, was Mr. William McCombie, who, as farmer and philosopher, journalist and religious teacher, was, within the memory of men of middle age, a notable personality in the North. A combination of layman and ecclesiastic, at once prejudiced and tolerant, orthodox and heterodox, fond of new "views" of certain kinds, yet disinclined even to entertain others, he was from first to last an earnest student rather than a clear or convincing thinker. But he was interesting to young men, and took an interest in them. He was capable of inspiring them with his own ardour of feeling, although as a rule they did not long remain in the leading-strings of his somewhat confused ethico-religious thought. If not positively deserving of a full biography—although he is quite as deserving as many a Scotchman who has recently been accorded this dubious honour—Mr. McCombie certainly merits all that has been said of him by Mr. Harvey Smith and Mr. Alexander.

The Aberdeenshire village of Rhynie, in which the mutual instruction movement began, is situated in the well-known Gordon country, and in the valley at the foot of that remarkable conical mountain Tap o' Noth. Its inhabitants were and are mainly steady well-to-do Seceder tradesmen and crofters. In such a community there is always a sprinkling of students; and so when, in 1846, the author of this volume, then about twenty years of age and preparing for a curriculum in the university of Aberdeen, set about starting a literary society of a somewhat different type from any previously existing, he found eleven kindred spirits to join him in forming "The Rhynie Mutual Instruction Class." "Mutual instruction" consisted chiefly in the reading of essays on non-religious topics; and it proved so contagious that, by the help of a Corresponding Committee, branch societies were established in the villages in the vicinity of Rhynie. Female instruction classes were also formed. Finally the various societies were federated, after a fashion, into a Mutual Instruction Union, with a monthly organ of its own styled The Rural Echo. The success of this propaganda, which seems to have held its own for about a generation, may be judged by such facts as the increase of the first Rhynie class from 12 members to 586 in a few years, the delivering of 126 lectures, and the issue of 10,260 copies of periodicals and pamphlets written entirely by members of the classes and published by the societies or the union. In all quarters of Scotland village literary societies of one kind or another have flourished fitfully, but it may be doubted if any have been animated by such enthusiasm and sustained purpose as those which took origin in Rhynie more than thirty years ago.

Mr. Harvey Smith devotes a very considerable portion of his book to those alumni of the original Rhynie class who, after leaving it, gained distinction of one kind or another in life. It is here that Mr. Smith's enthusiasm for his subject becomes somewhat too pronounced, as when he notes that "one of the future leader-writers of The Thunderer and one of the coming conductors of old Blackwood's Magazine sat side by side as members of the Rhynie class." The late Mr. James Macdonell—most brilliant of Aberdonians—and Mr. Alexander Allardyce, the author of The City of Sunshins and the editor of Ramsay of Ochertyne, and Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, deserve most honourable mention in a book of this kind; but such a sentence as I have quoted suggests too much

"The divinely gifted man Whose life in low estate began."

One of the best chapters in this book is, to all intents and purposes, written by Mr. Allardyce. It is a sketch of Peter Smith, one of the "fathers" of Rhynie—a shrewd old Scotchman, who took an interest both in the work of the Mutual Instruction class and in the welfare of individual members.

Mr. Harvey Smith means well, and, on the whole, has done well. His book ought to help in stimulating a love of literature and of discussion in rural Scotland.

NEW NOVELS.

The Story of a Marriage. By I. Baldwin. In 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

Tumbledown Farm. By Alan Muir. In 2 vols. (Spencer Blackett.)

Both of this Parish. By Algernon Gissing. In 2 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

A Romance of Posilipo. By Mrs. Woollaston White. (Eglinton.)

A Little Fool. By John Strange Winter. (White.)

Minnie Harford; or, Others, not Self. By Mrs. Von Kranichfeld - Gardner. (Trübner.)

It is not often that we get a good story descriptive of a mésalliance deliberately contracted as a social experiment, in pursuance of certain philanthropic and philosophical principles. Mr. Walter Besant all but did it for us some years ago in his Monks of Thelema; and it is scarcely possible that the author of The Story of a Marriage can be unaware that up to a certain point he is making his hero tread with singular exactness in the steps of Alan Dunlop. The last-mentioned gentleman was, however, saved at the eleventh hour from the consequences of his infatuation through the kind offices of some sensibly disposed friends, who conveyed the intended bride away and married her to the gamekeeper. Mr. Baldwin has had the courage to carry out Laurence Temple's courtship to the bitter end, and to lay before us the twelve months' married experiences of a highly cultured enthusiast united to a woman who is not only exceptionally selfish and stupid, such as women in any rank of life might be, but is too hopelessly plebeian in tastes and aspirations and too soulless in character to understand in the faintest degree her husband's ideals or to share any taste with him in common. Notwithstanding the comparison which the author has invited between his own work and that of one of the masters of modern fiction, it must be acknowledged that in certain respects Mr. Baldwin survives the ordeal remarkably well. Though seldom brilliant, he is never for a moment dull or guilty of penning a line that is beside the main purpose of his narrative; and his writing displays a well-digested observation of the habits and conversational peculiarities of the lower classes, the recognition of which ought to serve him as a passport to considerable success as a novelist.

Tumbledown Farm professes to be written by "Dr." Book, village chemist of a small town in North Devon, with revisions and corrections by Miss Millicent Hervey, daughter of the local squire. This divided authorship is announced in an introductory chapter, in order to account for the appearance throughout the work of poetical imagery and sentiment side by side with certain homely and pithy views of life from the plebeian side, reminding us—si parva licet, &c.—of one of the many attractive features of Mr. Blackmore's Lorna Doone. Mr. Alan Muir is a spirited writer; and the present novel is by no means deficient either in sensational incident or in pathos, while the plot possesses some distinct elements of originality. The central idea is a contrast between Bohemianism, as represented in the person of a girl of healthy instincts brought up amid dissolute surroundings, and respectability, as embodied in a feeble-souled young man, who first wins her heart, and then transfers his allegiance, from prudential motives, to a village maiden whose antecedents and conventionality are less impeachable. The tale, though rather awkwardly broken up into two distinct parts, maintains its interest throughout, and ends in a manner satisfactory, not only to the reader, but even to the village apothecary, whose sympathies and prejudices have from the first been enlisted on the side of respectability and against the Bohemian heroine.

As stated on its title page, Both of this Parish is "a story of the byways," the action being entirely confined to the dull seclusion of a country village. It mainly concerns Hector Trammere, rector of Wancote, in Gloucestershire, an unpopular and unamiable man of rather questionable morals, whose life is embittered by a guilty secret, which finally comes to light at the end of the second volume. His only son, having been supplanted in his father's affections by a young man named Ordway, abandons his home for some years, and returns to find his mother just dead, and Ordway on the point of marrying Esther, the woman for whom he had himself long entertained an affection. The marriage takes place, and turns out an unhappy one; and Ordway, having accomplished the pecuniary ruin of the rector, meets his death at the hands of the latter in a struggle which proves fatal to them both. On the whole the story can scarcely be pronounced a lively one. It may prove interesting to those who find pleasure in tales of country life, and can peruse without impatience any amount of village gossip carefully, and to all appearance correctly, recorded in provincial vernacular. But none of the characters are particularly interesting; and the dialogue, though no doubt a faithful enough representation of possible conversations, seldom displays the humour and piquancy which alone render such representations enjoyable.

In the absence of any statement to the contrary, it is only due to the author of A Romanes of Posilipo to assume the complete originality of her work. She may be credited, therefore, with having thoroughly imbibed the sentimental atmosphere of Italian fiction, and with having reproduced in a marvellously faithful manner the turns of expression familiar to readers of that class of literature. The fortunes of governesses or companions, of dubious parentage but of exceptional personal attractions, are a stock theme with novelists; and so far the subject of Mrs. Woollaston White's romance can scarcely be said to possess any uncommon features. Nevertheless, it may safely be conjectured that the mishaps of the heroine will excite all the sympathy which beauty in distress is warranted to create; while her parentage, which is eventually discovered to connect her by blood with a noble English family, ought presumably to set at rest every doubt as to her being a suitable match for the Marchese di Castello, a nobleman of surpassing wealth and prestige, who, to secure an affection uninfluenced by mercenary considerations, has wooed her under the disguise of a professor of language and the violin. The novel must not, however, be understood to be a mere record of sensational adventure. The writing is of a decidedly high class throughout, and bears witness to artistic refinement and vigorous descriptive power on the part of the author.

It would scarcely be possible to write a more charming novelette than A Little Fool, by the author of Booile's Baby. That the scene should be laid in a garrison town, and that the interest should centre in "the military" and its love affairs, is a thing only to be expected of the author "to whom," Mr. Ruskin declares, "we owe the most finished and faithful rendering ever yet given of the character of the British soldier." However, in the story under notice we have less of the soldier himself and more of the ladies whose rôle it is to captivate his heart. Mrs. Darrell, a widow of slender means, has three daughters, the eldest, Violet, being all that a heroine should be; and the youngest, Madge, an impetuous, outspoken, and handsome girl, who will probably commend herself as favourably as her sister to the reader; while Georgie, the "little fool" of the title-page, is the emptiest-headed of flirts, and unites in herself an inordinate love of admiration and mischievous disregard for truth which cause the principal complications of the tale. Every page in the book is entertaining; and the final turn of events which enables the self-absorbed little coquette to point to her sisters as the really mercenary members of the family, while she herself poses as a spectacle of true disinterestedness, has about it a subtle touch of irony worthy to be classed among the author's best effects in fiction.

It is a misfortune for the Sunday story book, or moral tale for the young, when it falls into the hands of the novel reviewer. It is the latter's business to pass judgment on various qualities of strong meat served up to a public which requires something more piquant than records of passive innocence or self-abnegating humility to whet its appetite; and the task has to be undertaken from a worldly, if not positively cynical, standpoint, which leaves little room for the tender appreciation which well-meant exhortations to virtue deserve. Mrs. von Kranichfeld-Gardner's Minnie Hartford is dedicated by the author to her young pupils at Stuttgart, in grateful recognition of the love and sympathy shown to her during eighteen years' tuition among them. Both title and dedication sufficiently indicate the nature of the contents. Minnie Hartford is a girl who suffers a school friend to take away from under her eyes the man upon whom she herself had set her heart, and consents, when pressed, to assist in smoothing the way for a marriage between the young couple. It would be a cruel and unworthy act to lay much stress on the fact that, side by side with its pictures of the beauty of unselfishness, the book also shows how one of the opposite developments, known as "an eye to the main chance," often succeeds in getting a tolerably good time of it in this world; also that the heroine—if such she may be called—whatever may have been her other amiable qualifications, certainly failed to make herself attractive to young men. None but the most ill-natured of cavillers would willingly condemn a story written with so praiseworthy an intention, and overflowing from end to end with such pure-minded sentiment. At the same time, no amount of commendable purpose on the part of the author can of itself justify either the carelessness with which the work has been executed, or certain colloquial solecisms occurring here and there in its pages, which might have been avoided, had the proofs been submitted for correction to some competent acquaintance, who had not, like the author, been absent eighteen years from English soil. The habit, for instance, of using such a phrase as "the old gent" or "the good old gent" (pp. 123, 165), ought to be more honoured in the breach than in the observance; while the orthographical and typographical errors of the book are beyond enumeration. JOHN BARROW ALLEN.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.

It is Thyself. By Mark André Raffalovich. (Walter Scott.) Mr. Raffalovich puts a pleasant legend on his title-page, which the reader fondly imagines may help him to understand the book. It certainly throws some light upon the title.

"One knocked at the Beloved's Door"—saith this legend—"and a Voice asked from within, 'Who is there?' and he answered 'It is I.' Then the Voice said, 'This house will not hold Me and Thee.' And the Door was not opened. Then went the Lover into the Desert, and fasted, and prayed in solitude. And after a year he returned and knocked again at the Door. And again the Voice asked, 'Who is there?' and he said 'It is Thyself!' and the Door was opened to him."

The legend is suggestive enough. Perfect love involves a complete surrender. The lover loses himself to find all that he would possess and be in the object of his love. But no lover in his senses would do this unless the object were worthy of such unselfish devotion, and the "beloved" apostrophised in this curious medley of verses is by no means so. Her poet is a creature of whims and passions, whose moods vary with the weather, but she is inconstancy itself. Perhaps she does not relish the candour of some of his addresses—as this, for instance:

"Your frank and foolish beauty is my pain,
Because I do not love you for your fairness.
Your colour as mere colour I disdain;
Ere time's unpainting I behold its bareness."

A young beauty addressed in this fashion would do scant justice to her charms if she did not tease her poet in return. In spite, however, of the pangs she causes him, he has moments of pleasant satisfaction, when the verses he indites to her are as pretty as she could wish. Here are a couple that ought to have carried persuasion with them:

"Give me a little that I may Believe that much is mine;
Give me a moment of each day,
Or write to me a line.

"A bird that tips a drop of dew
Looks up and sees the sky,
And after anything of you,
O dearest, so do I."

If her heart was touched by this sweet appeal, the flutter of joy or pity she felt could only have been a passing sensation. She must soon have relapsed into her old coquettishness; for her foolish lover shortly afterwards complains that he is shivering in the sun, burning in the cold winds, and that the darkness wears his eyes like a flame. Perhaps that is the way of sonnetting lovers. A day came—or a night—that ought to have satisfied these young persons that neither was a fit mate for the other. The incident is thus described:

"The night was dark and scented sweet,
I left behind me fear and doubt,
And through the darkness at our feet,
We heard the water slowly meet
The pleasant shore, and we looked out,
And quenching fears and poor regrets
For ever, in me still affection
Rose which most surely never sets.
I said: 'Look down, a star's reflection.'
You said: 'O no, a cigarette's.'"

And the unromantic reader will no doubt say she was right. She was content with the prose of life, and, after all, who could wonder?

Battle and After. By R. St. John Tyrwhitt. (Macmillan.) Mr. Tyrwhitt's verse is graceful and scholarly, but the chief piece in the present volume suffers as a poem from a tendency to preaching. Serjeant Thomas Atkins—better known as "Tommy Atkins"—is shot down at Abou Klea, and the poet tells his experience after death. His soul is accosted by its guide, who prepares it for the Vale of Tears, through which it must pass before it can attain to the delights of heaven. But we cannot fancy the poor soul, in the first surprise of its new sensations, listening with much intelligent understanding to such a speech as this:

"Mark thou—as Force and Matter upon earth
Are His, His Hand and working and effect,
So Love is Force in this His spirit-world,
And sways all Being with a steadfast Law
And searches out all Spirit, and pervades
And permeates every willing soul with joy;
'Tis our Attraction and our Atmosphere:
Those, then, who loved not, neither sought His love,
It finds them here—they feel it otherwise.
For like the centre on a falling stone
It bears coercive on the loveless soul."

When Mr. Tyrwhitt keeps clear of theology and metaphysics he writes with much better effect. As, for instance, in his description of the battle:

"The Wells, the Wells in an hour—their masses were closing fast.
Long we had waited, and thirsted, but all comes round at last;
Water and battle—O sweeter than voices of loves and dears
Was the word to form up square: and we marched on the Desert spears.

"Their long-range bullets came plashing among us
now and then,
Chance shots of the coward, they always pick out the bravest men—
Stewart, Darcy, Earle—not a moment now for words or tears;
They were on us, hammer and tongs, the herds of the Desert spears.

"They were on us, the plucky blackguards, in even-rushing form;
With no more notion of stopping than rooks
before the storm;
We were deadly thirsty, and didn't run much to British cheers;
But we all held straight and low, and down went the Desert spears.

"And the volleys cut them in lanes; and the file-fire rolled and peeled:
There were ten of 'em speared the Colonel: 'twas his and their last field,
Two I shot—and—a pang, and a crash, and a blindness gray—
And heaven and earth—and the battle—the whole of it sailed away."

Poems. By Horace Smith. (Macmillan.) If it were not that the production of good verse is now so frequent as to make the accomplishment seem an ordinary one, Mr. Smith might take some rank among minor poets. There is matter in this volume that would have made a reputation a hundred years ago; now, it will represent only a graceful addition to the writer's other claims to regard. But such a little gem as the following poem deserves better treatment than to be read and forgotten:

"Under the porch!—
Gleamed her white dress in shade
Through the half-opened door;
Then came her little face
Nearer my own,
Under the porch.

"Under the trees!—
Shadow and sunlight played
Over the grassy floor,
Over the rosy face,
Close to my own,
Under the trees.

"Under the stars!—
Oh the wild love we made!
Oh the fond vows we swore!
Oh the pale tender face!—
My own, my own!
Under the stars!"

Mr. Smith's blank verse, though now and then a little prolix, is pleasant to read. Here is a happy illustration, which we take from "A Sketch," the subject of the sketch being the gentle parish priest:

"There are lights
Whose flame is glorious as the stars of heaven,
And like the stars they vanish in the clouds;
But his was as a beacon on the shore
Shining through calm and storm."

The Children, and other Verses. By Charles M. Dickinson. (Sampson Low.) The first of these poems, "The Children," has enjoyed a well-deserved reputation in this country for many years, and it has been commonly attributed to Charles Dickens. This mistake probably arose from the resemblance of Mr. Dickinson's name to Dickens's; but the tenderly pathetic character of the poem might well have caused it to be ascribed to the author of David Copperfield and Dombey. The poem, however, is American, as its author also is; and it reminds us of another American poem, Longfellow's "The Children's Hour," though it is possible that Mr. Dickinson's poem was written before Longfellow's. Some of the verses have a charm that is due in part only to the poet, and for the rest to the children who, as we read them, seem to inspire them:

"When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And the school for the day is dismissed,
The little ones gather around me,
To bid me good night and be kissed;
Oh, the little white arms that encircle
My neck in their tender embrace!
Oh, the smiles that are halos of heaven,
Shedding sunshine of love on my face!"

"The twig is so easily bended,
I have banished the rule and the rod;
I have taught them the goodness of knowledge,
They have taught me the goodness of God;
My heart is the dungeon of darkness
Where I shut them for breaking a rule;
My frown is sufficient correction;
My love is the law of the school."

The same tenderness and happiness of fancy that are observable in this poem are to be found also in nearly every other in the volume. We can only make one more quotation, but the melody and pleasant imagery of the following lines are to us irresistible:

"IN THE GARDEN
When the night comes down
Over field and town,
And hides all the flowers and meadow daisies,
I turn my eyes to the blossoming skies,
To the far-off gardens of Paradise,
The mistletoe boughs in the starry mazes,
The daisy borders, white and dense,
And the nebulous meadows of innocence;
To the radiant spots
Of forget-me-nots,

The jasmine Harp; and twinkling down,
The anemones in the Northern Crown;
To the tiger-lily that nods and glows
In the crescent bed of the larger Lion,
The stars of Bethlehem and Sharon's rose,
And the great white river that heavenward goes,
And waters each plant and flower, then flows
Right on to the beautiful city of Zion;
And my heart is so filled with the wondrous view,
That it overflows in reverent praises,
And mourns no more for the violets blue,
For the roses sweet and the meadow daisies."

Day Dreams in a Devon Valley. By Nelson Rich Tyerman. (Torquay: Andrew Iredale.) Much day-dreaming, and perhaps also the luxuriance of his Devon valleys, have induced in Mr. Tyerman a habit of fantastic phraseology which he would do well to throw off. No amount of "starry silences," or skies of "dumb azure," or "flower dust," or "angel smiles," or "song burthens"—or the like imaginable things—will furnish a writer with the materials of a poet. But though Mr. Tyerman's stock-in-trade is too largely of this character, he can write pleasant verses, as witness these:

"LOST LOVE."

"Poor Love hath lost his way
In the merry month of May!
Wrapt in a world of dreams,
Blinded with his own beams,
Poor Love hath lost his way!"

"And he strays like a helpless child
Deep, deep in his woodlands wild;
Though born Spring's sceptre to wield
O'er river and forest and field,
Love wanders, a hapless child.

"And the merry month of May Laughs to see Love astray;
Pelts him with showers and flowers
Till like a small bird Love cowers, Afraid of his own month May!"

"And he sobs amid May's sweet song
For all her loving wrong;
Till the fond earth turns to hear
The chime of Love's tear on tear
From the music of May's best song.

"Then the fearful month of May
Hastens Love's tears to stay;
Drinks with her sunbeams those showers,
And lights Love's way with her flowers
To the warm rose-heart of May."

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN announce for the autumn season a new volume of poems by Lord Tennyson. Mr. Browning's new volume will also, we believe, be published in October. From Mr. Swinburne we had a series of poems and ballads only last spring; but we understand that his next book will be a collection of critical essays upon Ben Jonson, part at least of which has already appeared in the Fortnightly.

A NEW revised edition of that valuable and learned historical work, Elton's Origins of English History, is in the printer's hands, and will be ready by Christmas.

WE are glad to hear that Messrs. Macmillan intend to follow up their cheap series of Charles Kingsley's popular works with a similar edition of the works of Tom Hughes (it is impossible to call him by his proper title, His Honour Judge Hughes). Tom Brown's School-Days will be published in October; Tom Brown at Oxford (which has stood the wear of time less well) in the following month; and The Scouring of the White Horse, with The Ashen Fagot in the same volume, later on. All will have the original illustrations by Richard Doyle, A. Hughes, and S. P. Hall.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a memoir of the late Bishop McDougall, of Labuan, who already possesses a niche in literature by the lines of his friend, Charles Kingsley:

"Never with McDougall
Bagged a brace of apes."

A COLLECTION of Slavonic Folk-Tales from various sources, collected and translated by the Rev. A. H. Wratislaw, is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock. The volume will contain, besides a general preface, a short introduction to each group of tales according to its nationality.

MR. W. CLARK RUSSELL's new story, Marooned, will be issued next week, in three vols., by Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

THE first part of an illustrated serial edition of Dr. Cunningham Geikie's Holy Land and the Bible will be published on September 26, by Messrs. Cassell & Co. The designs for the illustrations have been prepared by Mr. Henry A. Harper, of the Palestine Exploration Fund, who has spent several years in the East preparing drawings for the work.

MESSRS. SKEFFINGTON will shortly issue Stories Jolly, Stories New, Stories Strange, and Stories True, a series of tales for boys and girls. The writers include the following: H. C. Adams, R. M. Ballantyne, S. Baring Gould, Alice Corkran, G. Manville Fenn, Agnes Gibberne, G. A. Henty, Katharine S. Macquoid, Mrs. Molesworth, and O. M. Yonge. The same firm will also publish a story for children by Mrs. Macquoid, entitled Peppin, the Dancing Bear, with illustrations by Percy Macquoid.

THE next volume in the series of "Canterbury Poets" will be Poems of Leigh Hunt and Thomas Hood, edited by Mr. Julian Harwood.

THE Theosophical Publishing Company announce the following works: The Key to Theosophy and The Voice of the Silence, by H. P. Blavatsky; The Astral Light, by Nizida; Can it be Love? by W. C. Eldon Sergeant; Gossip about the Rosicrucians, by Franz Hartmann.

THE Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company announce: A Manchester Shirtmaker: a Realistic Story of To-day, by John Law; After Shipwreck, by J. Owen; A Tale of the Franco-German War, by A. T. Story; Ruby, a novel, by Amye Reade, &c.

THE library committee of the corporation of London have been empowered by the court of common council to devote a sum not exceeding £1000 to the production of a new work in two volumes, illustrating, so far as may be from the city's own archives, the history of the city of London from the earliest times. The object of the work is to show the pre-eminent position occupied by the city of London, and the important function it has exercised in the shaping and making of England, the distinctive feature of the history being a record of the lives and deeds of those remarkable men who have filled in succession through seven centuries the highest civic office to which it is possible to attain, and an illustration of the influence of London and its lord mayors at many of the most critical periods of our history.

MR. T. C. SMITH, of Longridge, near Preston, will shortly issue by subscription a History of Ribchester. The chapter dealing with the Roman antiquities has been contributed by the Rev. Jonathan Shortt, vicar of Hoghton. Among other special features will be an account of the parish church library, which was formed in 1684 and disappeared only a few years ago; extracts from the account books of "the gentlemen and four-and-twenty" of the parish, which go back for more than two centuries; and information about early lords of the manor, from the Townley MSS. and other sources. The book will be illustrated with a large-scale map, a plan of Roman Ribchester, and several full-page engravings.

MR. WILLIAM ANDREWS of Hull will contribute to the next volume of Smith's Old Yorkshire a paper entitled "A Nobleman's Household in Tudor Times."

THE Chaucer Society's plan goes on of giving, under the editorship of Prof. Zupitza, a sample "Pardoner's Prologue and Tale" from every unprinted MS. of the Canterbury Tales, with a sketch of the contents of the MS. The society's copier, Mr. Thomas Austin, has done all the Cambridge, Oxford, and Cheltenham MSS., and Lord Leicester's at Holkham. The British Museum MSS. will come next, and then the outlying ones at Lincoln, &c. Dr. Furnivall has done the Lichfield and Haistwell MSS., the latter of which (Tyrwhitt's Askew 2) has since been bought by the Museum at the Perkins sale. A friend of Prof. Zupitza will do the Naples MS. and the fragment at Paris. The late Henry Bradshaw had often promised Dr. Furnivall to let the Chaucer Society print his "contents" of all the Tales' MSS.; but repeated application for these sketches since his death has failed to get them, and so the work has all to be done over again.

DR. FURNIVALL has sent to press the first section of the Ordinances of the Guild of St. Mary at Lichfield, in the English of Henry VIII.'s time. Collation with the Latin of Richard II. shows that the translator often misunderstood or purposely improved, his original. The latter, for instance, ordered that the Gild tenants should do their accustomed services due to the chief lord of the fee, and then pay their rent to the Gild. The worthy master thought this was not pious enough, and so turned the performance of the feudal services into "Do honour to godd." Who else could be capitalis dominus?

MR. JESSE QUAIL has resigned the editorship of the Northern Daily Telegraph, which was established at Blackburn three years ago.

THE public library at Berlin has recently acquired two MSS., one of Remigius Super Matheum, of the tenth to the eleventh century, and the other containing the Commentaries of Eustathios and others on the Nikomachean Ethics of Aristotle. The first MS. is of special importance, since only one copy of the work, written in the sixteenth century, has hitherto been known, and even this is now lost. The second MS., which is of the fifteenth century, will be of service for the edition of the Commentators on Aristotle which is being prepared by the Berlin Academy. The two MSS. come from the collection of Carlo Morbio, which was lately offered for sale at Leipzig. The University of Halle secured 400 parchment MSS. for its library from this sale, some of them belonging to the tenth century, and containing much material for the history of Germany and Austria. A number of Italian MSS. in the collection, which possess a special interest for the historians of German law, have been purchased for the Jurists' Library at Leipzig.

AMERICAN JOTTINGS.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have made arrangements to supplement their "Epochs of Modern History," by a short series of books treating of the history of America, which will be published—in England and the United States—under the general title "Epochs of American History." The series will be under the editorship of Dr. Albert Bushnell Hart, assistant professor of history in Harvard College. Each volume will contain about 250 pages, with full marginal analysis, working bibliographies, maps, introductions, and index. The volumes in preparation are: The Colonies (1492-1763), by Reuben Gold Thwaites, Secretary of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin; Formation of the Union (1763-1829), by the editor of the series; Division and Re-union (1829-1889), by Woodrow Wilson, professor of history and political economy in Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut.

DR. HORACE HOWARD FURNESS has been giving his holidays to work at his "Variorum" edition of As You Like It. When that is done he means to try and clear another play in a year, and then rest altogether, as he says he is growing old and tired. But he writes of Rosalind in a strain which makes one believe that he is only eighteen. Let us hope that she will inspire him to live and work till his "Variorum" edition has included all Shakspeare's works.

FROM a letter in the New York Nation, of August 29, from Prof. C. E. Norton, we learn that the American Archaeological Institute have by no means abandoned their intention to excavate the site of Delphi, provided that they can obtain the funds necessary to pay for the expropriation of the inhabitants of Castrì.

MR. PAUL LEICESTER FORD, of Brooklyn, announces two bibliographical works for immediate publication: American Bibliography: a check-list of bibliographies, catalogues, reference lists, and lists of authorities of American books and subjects. The book will contain 1070 titles, arranged according to subjects under 19 divisions and 150 subdivisions, with a classification of contents and an authors' index. Franklin Bibliography: a list of books written by or relating to Benjamin Franklin. The total number of titles and references given will be 1500, the list of works written wholly or in part by Franklin amounting to 600, and his pseudonyms being 60.

THE September number of the Political Science Quarterly Review (issued in this country by Mr. Henry Frowde, of the Oxford University Press Warehouse) contains the following articles: "James E. Thorold Rogers," by Prof. W. J. Ashley, of Toronto, formerly of Lincoln College, Oxford; a first paper on "English Legal History," by Prof. F. W. Maitland, of Trinity College, Cambridge; "Town Rule in Connecticut," by Mr. Clarence Deming; "Farm Mortgages," by Mr. W. F. Mappin; "The Railroad Indemnity Lands," by Mr. F. P. Powers; "Italian Immigration," by Mr. Eugene Schuyler.

WE have received a copy of Caspar's Directory of the American Book, News and Stationery Trade (Milwaukee), which may be obtained in this country from Mr. B. F. Stevens. For frontispiece there is a steel engraving of a portrait of the late Frederick Leypoldt, founder of the New York Publishers' Weekly. The directory proper consists of no less than 1261 pages, arranged under five different headings. Then follows a long list of works of various kinds useful for bibliographers and librarians, classified according to countries; and, finally, a vocabulary of technical terms in English, French, German, Italian, Dutch, Latin, Greek, &c. Altogether, the work is a monument of much well-directed and intelligent labour.

THE eighth annual report has reached us of the (American) Dante Society (Cambridge, U.S.). Besides recording the publication of Prof. Fay's Concordance of the "Divina Commedia," reviewed in the ACADEMY of February 23, it announces that some members of Harvard University have undertaken the compilation, by a system of co-operation, of a Concordance of the Vita Nuova and the Canzoniere, which the society may hereafter publish. Mr. W. C. Lane, assistant librarian of Harvard, furnishes his usual Dante bibliography for the year 1888. A new feature is the printing in full of a prize essay, by Mr. G. R. Carpenter, on "The Episode of the Donna Pietosa," in which he attempts to reconcile the statements in the Vita Nuova and the Convito concerning Dante's life in the years after the death of Beatrice, and before the beginning of the Divina Commedia. His conclusions—as opposed to the theories of Scartazzini and Carducci—are that the "donna pietosa" was a symbol for Dante's love for and study of philosophy; that the Convito, written after Dante went into exile, is completely to be trusted so far as its testimony to Dante's life goes; and that the Vita Nuova, being written not long after the episode of the "donna pietosa," is an imaginative work, to be used with caution in regard to dates and facts. We notice that the number of English members of the society has now increased to four; it ought to be much larger, for there is nothing local in the work of the society, apart from its library.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A MINIATURE.

Yas, he was a seaman true,
With his coat of British blue,
And his buttons bright as gold;
And he worshipped at the shrine
Of a great-great-aunt of mine,
As became a sailor bold.

And he pleaded not in vain,
For she gave him love again;
And thought that through her life,
Her strength and stay should be
This hero of the sea,
Who wooed her for his wife.

But he—his grave is deep;
The Baltic billows sweep
And surge above his breast;
And she—when grey and old,
In quiet English mould
They laid her to her rest.

O yes, a simple tale
For you who love of frail
And faulty vows to sing;
And it happened long ago,
But hearts were hearts, you know,
When George the Third was king.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE September part of the Antiquary contains an excellent paper on the recent meeting of the Archaeological Association at Lincoln, by Mr. Roach-Smith. That on "Ancient Trackways in England," by Mr. Houghton Spencer, if expanded into a volume, might be worthy of careful consideration; at present it suffers from being contracted into too small a space.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for September contains the conclusion of Leenderz's discussion of Rauwenhoff's philosophy of religion in its relation to Kant; Chavannes on the ideal religion; Oort on Ezekiel xix., xxi. 18, 19, 20, 24, 25. Also reviews of books on philosophy, folklore, and early Christian literature. Van Manen's criticisms of Baumgärtner's prize essay on the unity of the Shepherd of Hermas may be specially mentioned. Notices of Nowack's edition of Hupfoid on the Psalms, Strack's Piske Aboth, Schwab's completed French translation of the Talmud of Jerusalem, Armstrong's What do we know of God? in its Dutch translation, and Kingsley as a Comforter (a Dutch version of the book of extracts called De Profundis) by Oort, complete the number. Kingsley seems, in fact, to be extending his popularity on the Continent, in spite of what Dr. Oort calls his Anglican dogmatic theology.

SOME THEATRICAL LAWSUITS: A SUPPLEMENT TO CIBBER'S "APOLOGY."

III.

CIBBER has given a full account of Doggett's quarrel with the other managers in chap. xiv. of his Apology; and it is, therefore, only necessary to supplement what he says by a brief notice of the official records of the action which Doggett brought against Wilks, Cibber, Booth, Castleman, Steele, and Collier, and of the cross action brought by Wilks and Cibber against Doggett. Booth was taken into partnership in November, 1713, and Doggett thereupon withdrew from the theatre. The new licence to Collier, Wilks, Cibber, Doggett, and Booth was dated November 11. Upon the accession of George I. a new licence had to be obtained, and on October 18, 1714, a licence was granted in favour of Steele, Wilks, Cibber, Doggett and Booth. On January 19, 1715, letters patent were granted to Steele. On November 3, 1714, Wilks and Cibber petitioned that Doggett should be ordered to act all his usual parts, in which case they would gladly admit him to an equal share in the licence (Lord Chamberlain's Records, Old Theatrical Papers, No. 55). Doggett then appealed, and the Vice-Chamberlain ordered that he should be paid his full share. Cibber and Wilks remonstrated, and in the end Doggett was left to the law for relief.

Doggett's two bills in his action against Wilks, &c., are dated December 17, 1714; the first one being amended on January 27, 1714(-5). (Chancery Pleadings, Sewall 1714-58, No. 6.) Wilks is described as of King Street, and Cibber as of Southampton Street, in the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden.

Doggett said that after the agreement with Swiney he laid out £500 in clothes, scenes, &c., and that the clothes, &c., bought by him and his co-partners cost at least £1400. When Swiney, Wilks, Cibber, and himself went to Drury Lane in November, 1710, Collier allowed Christopher Rich, since dead, with others, to carry off all the scenes and clothes, and through this the co-partners had to spend £1000 in new scenes, &c. In April, 1712, Swiney, in consideration of £350, gave up his share in the clothes, profits, &c. Besides the agreement made by Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett with Collier in April, 1712, Doggett made an agreement with Wilks and Cibber, by which he was appointed treasurer; but this was not in writing, the matter being so simple. Doggett now complained that the defendants had taken upon themselves the whole management of affairs, and had had plays acted, engaged servants, and paid authors without his consent. They had also taken Booth into partnership, and sold him a fourth part of the scenes, &c., for £800 or some such inconsiderable sum, the real value of the scenes, &c., according to their own computation, being £3350. Steele, Booth, Wilks, and Cibber divided the profits between them, to the exclusion of Doggett; and since December 11, 1713, Castleman had been cashier, and refused to account to Doggett, who now appealed to a Court of Equity because there was no remedy for him by the strict rules of Common Law.

Wilks, Cibber, Booth and Castleman, in their answer, dated January 19, 1714(-5), admitted the truth of what Doggett said as to the sums of money spent on scenery, &c., but denied that they had come to any agreement with him beyond the original agreement. They also denied that they had acted without consulting him. He was present when Gay's "Wife of Bath" was read, and approved of it. It was acted only twice, and Gay got the profits of the second night. Taverner's "Female Advocates" was acted only once, and in consideration thereof the profits of "The Humours of the Navy" were given to Taverner; and to this Doggett afterwards assented in the accounts. Knapton, a relative of Wilks, only had 18s. a week, and was a very necessary and useful person in taking the number of the auditors every night to prevent fraud by the doorkeepers. The licence of November 11, 1713, received on the 21st, revoked the old licence, but Doggett refused to have anything to do with the new licence. The defendants believed the £600 paid by Booth to be the full value of the fourth part of the scenes, &c.; but the clothes, scenes, &c., had not been particularly appraised. Castleman was appointed treasurer in April, 1711, and had always acted as ordered by the majority. When Doggett left the house he had in his hands of the clear profits about £233, and this he refused to divide. In a second answer, dated February 25, 1714(-5), Wilks said that he did, with Cibber's approval, write a remonstrance dated November 12, 1714. There was provision for admitting Doggett to a share under the letters patent of January, 1715. In a third answer, dated April 8, 1715, the defendants said that no agreement had been entered into since that of January 19, 1715.

Steele's answer is dated May 20, 1715. He said he was a stranger to, and was unconcerned in, all matters antecedent to the granting of the licence to him, and prayed that the case should be dismissed with costs. On January 19 he had entered into an agreement with Wilks, Cibber, and Booth, assigning to each of them, and to Doggett, an equal fifth part in the Letters Patent; but Doggett had never executed this agreement. Collier, in his answer of June 17, 1715, said that on December 6, 1712, he entered into an agreement with Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett, promising to assign over to them the whole term he held of the lease of the theatre as soon as the lessors should renew their lease, on consideration that Wilks, Cibber, and Doggett paid him £800 a year for his share in the present licence, liable to the following abatements: (1) £100 out of the £800 was to be paid to Swiney for the support of operas, by order of the Lord Chamberlain, until the Lord Chamberlain ordered it to be paid to Collier; (2) when acting was forbidden a proportionable abatement was to be made. And if the licence was recalled or destroyed this agreement was to cease. Collier was thus paid until October last, when the licence determined.

In March, 1715, Wilks and Cibber commenced a cross action against Doggett (Chancery Pleadings, Reynardson, 1714-58, No. 2342). Their bill, dated March 1, 1714(-5), stated that it was agreed that Doggett should receive the profits, in order to divide them equally, and Wilks and Cibber gave a note to Castleman, the treasurer, to that effect. Since November 21, 1713, Doggett had refused to attend the theatre, or to pay Wilks and Cibber more than £200 due to them, alleging, among other things, that Wilks and Cibber had caused plays—"The Female Advocates," and "The Wanton Wife of Bath"—to be acted without his consent, had given the profits of the second instead of the third night's acting to the authors, had contracted debts, and promised to employ at large salaries persons—especially Mr. Knapton—without his consent, and had given tickets for the pit, &c., without bringing them to account. He pretended that by all this he had suffered great loss, and must keep the money he held to indemnify himself; all which Wilks and Cibber denied. Doggett agreed to, or afterwards passed, all the money expended. Moreover, Wilks and Cibber, being the majority, had a right to do all that Doggett alleged. Doggett also complained that Booth was admitted into the partnership, without his consent, and contended that he was still entitled to a third of the profits. But he knew that Wilks and Cibber opposed with all their force the superseding of the licence; but, as it was revocable at pleasure, they could not help taking in Booth, when it was revoked, though against their will. Wilks offered to show Doggett the new licence; but he turned away, and refused to have anything to do with it.

In his answer, dated April 23, 1715, Doggett said that he, Wilks and Cibber, agreed to give Swiney £600 a year, without any share in the profits, and that when Swiney and Collier agreed to exchange theatres, Collier got the £600 at Drury Lane; but the £600 was afterwards raised to £700. By verbal agreement with Wilks and Cibber it was arranged that Doggett should act as treasurer; that no sum exceeding 40s. should be spent, or any bill paid, without unanimous consent; and no servant engaged or dismissed. On June 15 Doggett paid Wilks and Cibber £150 each, in full settlement up to the 13th, for which they gave full receipts, written on one paper. Only £233 14s. 5d. remained now in Doggett's hands.

Doggett believed the Lord Chamberlain never ordered Booth's admittance, except on condition that he paid one-fourth of the value of the scenes, &c. Doggett had not acted since; but he did not desert. He acquainted the Vice-Chamberlain with his determination, and was told he need not act until Wilks and Cibber recompensed him. He was always willing to come to an account. He denied that he was present at the reading of "The Wanton Wife of Bath." He could not remember whether he passed any of the accounts which he now disputed, until he could examine those accounts. He had given tickets to friends, but not for profit. He thought he was entitled to one-third of the profits since November 23, 1713, and therefore retained the complainants' two-thirds of the £233 14s. 5d. now in his hands, in which action he hoped the court would uphold him.

Cibber tells us that they had the advantage over Doggett that they had three pockets to support their expenses, while he had only one. Cibber's first instruction to their solicitor was, therefore, "to use all possible delay that the law would admit of," by which means "we hung up our plaintiff about two years in Chancery." We are not, therefore, surprised to find that the actions were frequently before the court (Chancery Decrees, 1714 A, 95, 180, 343, 373, 381, 401, 449, 473; 1714 B, 217; 1715 A, 131, 180, 212, 354, 393, 415, 416, 455; 1715 B, 19; 1716 A, 20, 200, 226. Masters' Reports, June 27, October 4, and Nov. 7 and 27, 1716).

On December 18, 1714, there was an application to compel Wilks, &c., to put in their answer. On January 27, 1714-15, Doggett got leave to amend his bill, in consequence of the answers put in by some of the defendants, upon payment of 20s. costs to such defendants. On March 24 a fortnight was given to Doggett to put in his answer in the cross action. On May 30, June 17, and July 1, 1715, the case was adjourned upon the plaintiff's application. On July 14 leave was given to Doggett to examine Castleman—who was, Doggett said, a material witness on his side—but saving to the other side all just exceptions; and on the 19th leave was similarly given to Doggett to examine Collier. On August 8 the case was put off till the first day of the next term, upon the application of the defendants, and leave was given them to examine Steele, a material witness for them. Castleman objected to being put to the trouble and expense of being examined respecting accounts in which he was not concerned, and prayed that his expenses might be taxed. It was ordered that he should put in his examination in a week, and should then be at liberty to move as to his costs as he might be advised.

On November 2, the action brought by Wilks and Cibber against Doggett being before the court, it was ordered, counsel on both sides agreeing, that publication should forthwith pass in this cause, and that the cause should come on to be heard at the same time as the original cause.

On January 24, 1715-16, leave was given to Doggett to produce witnesses to be examined viva voce to prove an agreement signed by Wilks, Cibber, and Booth for converting the licence into letters patent to Sir Richard Steele, and a copy of Steele's petition to the king to grant him the patent, with other documents, was put in.

On February 6 it was ordered that the settlement of the account in dispute should be referred to a Master for settlement; that Doggett, if the agreement made was reasonable, should act, and receive one-fifth of the profits of the playhouse; and that he should pay Steele and Castleman 40s. apiece for their costs in the cause wherein they were defendants.

On March 8 it was ordered that Doggett should have an account of the profits of Drury Lane Theatre from the time he ceased to act, and that Cibber and Wilks should have an allowance for their extraordinary care and for the damage occasioned them by Doggett's inaction, which damages were to be ascertained either by Sir Thos. Gory, Knight, or by a trial at law, as Doggett might elect; but having regard to the difficulty of ascertaining such allowances, his lordship proposed that Doggett should take his share of the stock as it was when he ceased to act, with interest, and waive an account of the profits.

On March 22, however, Doggett elected to have an account of the profits, and to have the said damages, if any, ascertained by the Master.

On June 14, 1716, Wilks, &c., who had not produced their books as they had been ordered, for the Master's information, were ordered to do so in four days after notice was served to their counsel, on pain of being committed to the Fleet Prison; but on the 27th the Master, Sir Thos. Gory, reported that in pursuance of the order of February 6, he had examined into the matters referred to him, and that Wilks, &c., had left with him two boxes of papers which they swore contained, to the best of their belief, all the books, &c., relating to the matters in question in these causes since Doggett left the theatre.

On July 11 another order was granted against Wilks and the rest, because they had not attended before the Master. On the 17th a week's time was given them to answer; on the 20th Doggett petitioned against the delay; but on August 4 it was ordered that all proceedings under the order of July 20 should cease until Sir T. Gory returned to London, and that the defendants should have a week's time after the Master reported to put in their answer.

On October 4 Sir T. Gory reported that he had considered the matters referred to him, and that having, for the examination of Wilks, &c., settled and allowed of the interrogatories exhibited for that purpose by Doggett, he had caused the same to be engrossed on parchment, and in testimony of his allowance and approbation had thereto set his name.

On November 7 Sir T. Gory reported that, in obedience to an order of October 19, Castleman attended on October 25, and was examined upon Doggett's interrogatories, and that Doggett had made no objection or exception to that examination. He also reported that, in pursuance to an order of November 3, he had looked into the interrogatories exhibited by Wilks, Cibber and Booth, and the answer put in by Doggett, and that he found the answer insufficient because Doggett did not set forth whether he ever intended to act again with Wilks, &c., or not.

On November 27 the Master reported that, in pursuance of an order of November 8, he had, in Doggett's presence, considered Castleman's bill of costs, amounting to £19 8s. 8d., and had moderated and taxed it at £13 2s. 2d., which sum Doggett was to pay Castleman.

The case was again before the court on February 13 and 21, 1716-7, with reference to Doggett's petition to the Lord Chancellor making exceptions to two reports of Sir T. Gory, dated December 17 last; and on March 6, 1716-7, the Lord Chancellor finally pronounced judgment. His lordship was satisfied that Wilks, &c., lost through Doggett not acting, and as his absence was not due to ill-health or any similar cause, there was no reason why Doggett should share in the profits made since he ceased to act. But Doggett had a right to a fourth part of the scenes and clothes, which were worth £600. Doggett was given fourteen days to decide whether he would return to act, signing the articles of agreement which had been concluded between Steele, Wilks, Cibber, and Booth, and when he decided that he would not, it was decreed that Doggett should have £600 and £15 per cent. per annum as interest from November 23, 1713, when Doggett left the theatre. Doggett would then be excluded from any share in the playhouse or in the scenes or clothes; and out of the £230 found to be due from Wilks and Cibber to Doggett for his share of the £600 paid by Booth, the £153 5s. 1d. reported due from Doggett to Cibber and Wilks was to be deducted, and the residue paid to Doggett. Each side was to pay its own costs. "By this decree," says Cibber, "Doggett, when his lawyer's bill was paid, scarce got one year's purchase of what we had offered him without law, which (as he survived but seven years after it) would have been an annuity of five hundred pounds, and a sinecure for life." What Doggett had been offered, as a sinecure, was half a share in the profits, but he insisted on a whole share.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DAMPIER.

London: Sept. 9, 1889.

I am sorry that in my capacity of critic I have been compelled to disparage the person whom Mr. Petrie calls his "fascinating old acquaintance, Dampier"—the more sorry in that I myself once fondly believed that the old navigator and his ruffianly buccaneer confederates were of an heroic race. A closer study of human nature and of history has destroyed this illusion, with many others.

Mr. Petrie does not correctly quote my remarks upon Dampier, and therefore it is not incumbent on me to defend my charges against him in any detail. In regard to Dampier's powers of observation, faculty of expression, and charm of narrative, I am glad to be in full accord with all that Mr. Petrie says; but when he asks if any proof of the ill-behaviour of the buccaneers can be found in Dampier's narrative, I answer, with all due deference to Mr. Petrie, that it is not in a man's skilfully constructed autobiography that evidence against his own and his accomplices' characters should be looked for.

OSWALD CRAWFORD.

OLD IRISH AND THE SPOKEN LANGUAGE.

Rathmines, Dublin: August 27, 1889.

Having been unavoidably absent from Dublin up to this, the proof of my communication to the ACADEMY did not reach me in time to enable me to correct an error contained therein. This error was caused by my having left my letter to be copied for the press by another hand who, through misapprehension, substituted "Royal Irish Academy" for the title of the ACADEMY in reference to the statement of Dr. McCarthy.

I forward to you now as many instances as time and the hurry of other avocations have permitted me this time to collect of mistakes made by persons with the reputation of good Irish scholars, but who do not know modern Irish, or know it only imperfectly. For the sake of the readers of my former communication, I send an additional line containing two errors, from the poem, "Find and the Phantoms," edited by Mr. Whitley Stokes.

Line 202 of the poem "Find and the Phantoms" runs thus:

"Tucsam aichne arar neolas [tucsam being equivalent to the modern thugamar]."

This is translated by Mr. Stokes, "We took our bearings and saw which way we had to go." Now, there is in the quoted line not a word about "bearings" or "taking bearings," the second clause of the translation fully expressing the whole original, viz., "We saw which way we had to go," or, more briefly, "We knew our way." Examples of this meaning of tucsam aichne are the following—Ro fhafrugh Fionn . . . an d-tugadar aithne air. Fionn asked . . . did they know him. This is the stereotyped formula in our romantic tales. The term eolus for eolus na slighe is equally well understood in the modern spoken and written language.

For instance: An ti bhíonn dall ní seas dó é conaire in a d-triallann d'easbhuidh eoluis (for want of knowing the way) Keating, tri biorgh-aithe an bháis. Again, An bh-fuil an t-eolus go B'athclaiath agat? "Do you know the way to Dublin?" is a common expression. An d-tugadar aithne air is an expression now antiquated, as far as my own experience goes, but it is met with in such works as Tórnigheacht Dhiarmada agus Ghráinne, &c.

Prof. Zimmer, like Mr. Whitley Stokes, deservedly holds a high place among Celtic scholars. Having some years since visited Dublin, he examined an Irish MS. in the Franciscan convent, Merchant's Quay, and subsequently in one of his works he described its contents, i.e., he gave the first lines with translations of the several pieces contained in it. Of these translations, Mr. St. H. O'Grady showed in the ACADEMY that three-fourths were incorrect, and Mr. O'Grady was certainly right in all the examples he cited. He quoted the professor's transcript of a stanza in the MS. in which the ancient scribe curses his pen for its badness, and adds that "the book itself is bad."

on account of the inferior quality of the pen. Prof. Zimmer makes the scribe curse Fionn—he being the subject of many of the pieces in the MS.—and the professor adds as a reason for the scribe's cursing him, that he was angry at being drawn away from his devotions in order to transcribe a bad book. Now, the fact is, that the monk wrote, Mo mhallacht ort a phinn; and this Dr. Zimmer changed to Mo mhallacht ort a Fhinn. I myself heard the professor at the time of his visit tell this anecdote of the poor monk's chagrin, and a laughable story he made of it. He quoted the first and last lines of the stanza only. Had he quoted the other two lines, I should have at once seen that there was some mistake; but, as told, I could not help being amused at the pique of the poor monk.

The travels of Sir John Mandeville, written more than five centuries ago, still form a popular work, having been lately re-edited and published in a cheap form. A century after the work was written, it was translated into Irish by Finghin O'Mahony, a chieftain of the south-west of Ireland. The MS. of this translation is at Rennes, where it was discovered by the late Dr. Todd, of Trinity College, Dublin, who believed his find to be the original MS. Mr. John Abercromby, who examined it a few years since, rightly conjectured that it is a transcript made at Kilcrea in the county of Cork. This conclusion Mr. Abercromby arrived at from a note or memorandum in the MS., which runs thus: Dar dein Mandala indiu agus ar comairci an fir do cuithas indiu damh agus a Cill Creidh damh. Mr. Abercromby translated this, "Maundy Thursday to-day, and (I am) under protection to-day of the man that eats an ox, and at Cill Crea an ox." This curious translation, made by a good Celtic scholar, was published in the Revue Celtique of January, 1886, in which it remains, I believe, to this day without any further explanation. The correct translation is simply, "This is Holy Thursday, and I put myself under the protection of the man [-God] whom I have received to-day, and in Kilcrea I am (or I reside)." In religious orders the Paschal communion is received on Maunday or Holy Thursday, and the transcriber of the manuscript merely made a note in the margin stating that he had done so. The expression, Air chormirc is still exceedingly common; as air chormirc Dú dhúina (We put) ourselves under God's protection. Damh is an old form for dam, to me, the spelling being the same as that of damh, an ox. Fear is very often still used in referring to the Deity, as Is maith an fear crí é Dá, "God is a good man of justice," i.e., a good and righteous judge. Damh in the sentence is equivalent to I am, I was, I reside; in fact, a kind of pronoun corresponding to the Latin ablative absolute with the verb to be understood. Thus Oidheche dham go doilg, dubhach, "I was one night, sad, dejected," literally, "a night to me sad," &c. Again Caisg dam a d-tigh Mhic Dhonnchadh, "At Easter I was in the house of Mao Donough. The former of these quotations is from the poet, John Collins, and the latter from Eógus O'Dally, "of the Satires." The idiom is very common in the spoken language. Cad as duit-se, a bhuachaill mhaith? "My good boy where are you from?" "O Charrainna Suiwe dhamsa, 'I am from Carrick-on-Suir."

Dr. Kuno Meyer, of University College, Liverpool, is universally looked up to as a ripe scholar. A few years since he edited one of our Irish tales, the "Battle of Ventry," supplying also a literal translation, notes, &c. On the editing of this tale he bestowed, more Germanico, great pains. He spared no trouble in hunting up authorities, living and dead, within his reach. Yet with all his learning, research, and industry, he wandered far wide of the mark in almost every idiomatic phrase he fell in with.

Of course, had he known the phrases were idiomatic it is probable he would have consulted Mr. W. M. Hennessy, or some other Irish scholar having a colloquial acquaintance with the language, as to their meaning—and in most of them any fair Irish-speaking scholar would have set him right; but he thought they were plain literal expressions, as all would be likely to think who do not possess a colloquial knowledge of the language. A champion in the tale is described as being deich fear dhuirn fíthead ina airde, i.e., "thirty fists of men in height." The rendering in the published tale is "ten times twenty fists of men." Not long since I asked a little girl of about thirteen years of age how many cows her father had. She replied, deich m-ba fíthead, "thirty cows"; and any Irish speaker from the Foyle to Cumar na d-trí n-uisge would give a similar answer. It is not necessary to give any other instances out of this book, so far as the editor is concerned, the work having been reviewed in the Gaelic Journal; but the great name of Prof. Rhys having been mentioned in connexion with a passage in it, this passage may be adduced in proof of my contention. At page 86, note 868, we find "Tangadar coera teineadh fon fhaitheche do'n bhuille sin (billi in the original.) Prof. Rhys has suggested the following translation of this: "There came berries of fire over the plain from that tree." The editor, however, translated the passage correctly: "And there went balls of fire over the plain from that blow." Bile is, indeed, a tree, but nothing in the text suggests either tree or shrub. There was, however, such a blow (buille) of an axe given "that the lip of the axe turned"; and, as in the above instance, any Irish speaker would call the caor a flash of lightning or a thunderbolt.

I find another number in the tale translated one thousand and twenty, the numeral being deich ced fíthead, "three thousand." And this reminds me that Mr. Whitley Stokes, in the vocabulary to the Festiolog, translated dha chead deag (1200) by "two hundred and ten." Nor does the mistake rest here, for the Rev. S. Malone, an Irish scholar, but not an Irish speaker, copying Mr. Stokes, copied his mistake likewise.

In O'Reilly's Dictionary we find foithne and fothnagan rendered "what is oldest and youngest in man." The expression is taken from Keating on Death, book ii., § 1., part 11, where it reads thus: An feithne agus an fochnagam, iodhon, an chuid is sine agus is óige do'n fhear, meaning "The oldest and youngest of the grass." Fear, a man, and fear, grass, are generally spelled alike, the latter taking an acute accent over the e, to show that the diphthong is long, while in the word fear, a man, the diphthong is short and without an accent. In O'Reilly's copy of Keating's work the accent must have been omitted—a not infrequent occurrence in manuscripts; hence his mistake. Had he a good knowledge of the spoken language this error could not have been committed, for immediately before the two words the cutting with a scythe had been expressed. But O'Reilly, though an industrious transcriber and hard student of Irish, never attained the power of speaking the language. Accordingly, some of the most singular mistakes of any were made by him, notwithstanding his great knowledge of the language, and the assistance to be had in his time from the numerous Irish scholars and speakers then in Dublin, as well as in every part of the country. However, O'Reilly's Dictionary is still a work of great value. For a number of years I have had to consult this work several times a day, and have always found it trustworthy and useful. In the more modern Irish works, especially the poetry of Munster, O'Reilly was not well versed, but in the writings of older periods his knowledge was very extensive; and in every instance where the meaning could not be fairly guessed from the context he omitted the word, unless he could learn its meaning from other sources. But there is a great difference between the consideration of single words in their ordinary sense, and the same words forming portions of idioms.

Before concluding it may not be out of place for the benefit of those taking an interest in the subject, and who are not Irish speakers, to state a few facts explanatory of the numerals:

(a) Deich is ten, while deag is teen. Thus sedéag, sixteen. Fíthead, twenty, has for its gen. sing. fíthead, and for its dat. sing. and nom. plur. fíthead.

(b) Deag and fíthead imply addition; fíthead, multiplication; se fir deag, sixteen men; trí ba fíthead, twenty-three cows; seacht bh-fíthead fear; 7×20, i.e., a hundred and forty men.

(c) If a number be substituted for the nouns, fir, ba, above, the rule still holds. Se ceud deag (6+10)×100=1600; trí míle fíthead (3+20)×1000=23,000; trí fíthead míle (3×20)×1000=60,000. Thus we see in the instance above how deich fear-dhuirn fíthead is thirty fists of man; deich g-cead fíthead equals three thousand; and dhá chead deag=1200, not 210. This latter error Mr. Stokes did not discover in the nine or ten years he had the Festiolog in hand. I may remark that the rule above as regards fíthead is general in respect of other multiples of ten in Old and Middle Irish.

These are only a few of the many instances which might be collected, were there not danger of wearying your readers, of the very remarkable errors fallen into by students of Celtic who have not had the advantage of a vernacular knowledge of modern Irish. So true it is that the spoken Irish of the present day is, with very slight changes, the same as the language of two thousand years ago; that its idioms, "the soul of language," are identical, and that it is the only sure key to the acquirement of the ancient language of our MSS. It appears to me, therefore, that men who aim at being Celtic scholars should value the modern language highly instead of affecting to despise or disregard it. Native Irish scholars who speak the language are so circumstanced that they find it next to impossible to make their special knowledge available in its preservation, while many of those Celtic scholars who cannot speak Irish have openly expressed their desire for the extinction of the modern spoken language. It is the consideration of these facts that has induced me to trouble you with these lengthy letters on a subject which, no doubt, must be distasteful to the mass of your readers; but I judged that you would place the interests of science and literature before all others.

JOHN FLEMING.

THE THIRD BASQUE BOOK.

Paris: Sept. 4, 1889.

According to M. Julien Vinson—author of an edition of the first Basque book, the poems of Bernard Dechepare (1545), which unhappily contains a great many more misprints than are acknowledged in the "corrections" at the end, which themselves contain one, and who is happily about to publish a much-needed Bibliography of the Basque language which he knows so well—only three copies exist of this small volume: his own, that of the Bibliothèque de l' Arsenal (3 Rue de Sully, Paris), and that which is now for sale at the publishers of the bibliography, M. Maisonneuve (25 Quai Voltaire, Paris). I have examined the latter two copies. Both are in a state of great perfection, and were entirely printed by Pierre Hautin, at La Rochelle, 1571.

This same publisher had, on the previous September 24 of the same year, finished the impression of the second Basque book, the New Testament, translated by Jean de Leicarraga, of Briscous, near Bayonne, accompanied by dedication, preface, and appendices, which include the first printed and the first Protestant Basque Catechism. Of this latter volume, M. Vinson tells me that only twenty-one copies are now known to exist. One is in the Bodleian, one in the British Museum, one belongs to the British and Foreign Bible Society (which refuses to gratify all Basque students by reprinting it, though the language is still fully "understood of the people"), and another which, having been sold as a duplicate by the University of Leyden, is now on sale by the above-mentioned publisher, and which the University of Cambridge would do well to obtain.

The little volume in question contains firstly: the first Basque Calendar (Kalendrera). And as it is interesting to note what saints it admits to the company of "Hus" and "Luther" in the commemorative column, and to compare this with that of the Book of Common Prayer of Queen Elizabeth, its contemporary, I will, sir, with your permission, send you a copy of this column, translating where necessary. Secondly: "A.B.C. edo Christinoen Instructionea," that is "A.B.C. or the Instruction of a Christian" (compare "edo" = "or" with Icelandic "eða": there is a good deal in Basque which shows resemblance to the language of the Gothic family, e.g., HAVZOKO = vicinus, from vicus, seems plausibly attributable to a Germanic source). Thirdly: the same Catechism, which I have already mentioned as generally bound up with the New Testament, and only differing from it by slight typographical details, and being smaller in form. The author of the Catechismes and the A.B.C., and presumably of the Kalendrera also, was "Ioannes Leicarraga, Berascoizcoac," himself a second Vilfas.

I trust, sir, that it may be convenient to you to give the hospitality of your pages to these imperfect remarks, as, to their own loss, the great majority of the English world of students ignore altogether one of the noblest and, except the really terrific verb, easiest languages of Europe, and also probably the oldest.

EDWARD SPENCER DODGSON.

N.B.—"Ioannes Leicarraga Berascoizcoac" is the author's own way of describing himself in the dedication, the last word meaning "of Briscous."

PAIGNTON, DEVON.

Wynfrid, Clevedon: September 9, 1889.

I observe a sentence of Dr. Karl Blind (ACADEMY, August 24, 1889, p. 121) "To speak of a cast-iron law of letter-change is, therefore, again 'inadmissible.'" I believe that this remark is worthy of more general application. I have myself, in several cases, already shown that where such "laws" have been cited as certainties, they have been found to have been erroneously used in pronouncing actual facts to be "impossible." I will now offer another to those that I formerly brought forward.

Some years ago I had occasion to examine one of the topographical clusters or constellations of the names which in Domesday end in "-worde," "-wrde," "-eorde," "-urde," &c., and to realise them in their present forms. Just in the district under my attention, I met with a seventeenth-century form, "Hene-verdon," as the name of a place now called Hemerdon; and, although I did not then find it in Domesday, I ventured to suggest it as one of the "-wrde" group. I was then greatly taken to task by a liegeman of the "Phonetic Laws" for thinking that "-verdon" could possibly be a member of the "-worde" group of Domesday. He said that the phonetics of that record had now become an exact science, and that guesses—as, of course, mine was considered—could no longer be allowed; and that this suggestion of mine was quite impossible. It was some time afterwards that I found the name in the Exeter Domesday as "Chemeun-orda," and in the Exchequer Domesday as "Chemeworde." The initial aspirate, having been exasperated by the prefixed letter "C," had baffled my reference by a far displacement in the indexes.

The names of places in Domesday were, no doubt, written down by the commissioners from the mouths of their assessors, the local jurats, and in this respect the Exeter Domesday may take precedence of the Exchequer digested copy. I remember once the late Mr. Ralph Barnes kindly turning over the leaves of the Exeter Domesday with me, and pointing out evidence that it consisted of the original separate sheets of the returns of the commissioners bound up into that volume.

The name of Paignton, Devon, has been thought to have been conferred by the Normans, the syllable "Paighn-" being considered a French form of Paganus. But the name was already there before the Conquest, being in the Exeter Domesday, as "Peintona," and as being already under Edward the Confessor, in the hands of Leofric, Bishop of Exeter, A.D. 1050-1072. In the Exchequer Domesday it is "Peintone." It was most likely among the alienated lands which Leofric had reclaimed for his see, being quite surrounded by those which are named as being so recovered: St. Mary-Church, Staverton-with-Sparkwell; and, if Brihtricestane is Brixham, Paignton is quite closed in all round by them. In both the Domesdays, "Bredricestane" is the next entry to Peinton, among Bishop Leofric's estates. Nothing is more common than the change of the descriptive suffix for another that is applicable, as from "to" to "ham" in this case. For example, Branscombe, Devon, is called by William Worcester Branston. It is a "town," but also in a "combe," of singular emphasis of that word, both in depth, extent, and beauty. Dawlish and Holcombe are among the bishop's own lands neighbouring to Paignton (Earle's Land Charters, p. 249, Cod. Dipl., No. 940).

But it is not necessary that Paighn- or Pein- should be a Norman form. If it had been, instead of -ton, it might have been expected to be followed by -ville changed to "-field," or -lieu changed to "ley," or the like. Our sense of "pagan" is only secondary; the primary meaning is rustic. The incumbent of a country benefice was often described as the "Paganus"; and "Paganum," in cartular language was equivalent to "Praedium," or country residence; and this, no doubt, is the sense in which it has become a part of the name Paignton. This was always a country residence of the bishops of Exeter, and the ruins of the castellated palace are still conspicuous above the houses. In lands that have been Church property the cartular style is what is apt to survive in the name. Here is another example alongside of the secular or popular name. The cartular name of "Æthelingeæn" is still latent in "Athelney," on the east end of which the monastery stood; but on the western end of the same height or island is the secular church of "Ling," the surviving accented syllable of the name preserved by rural tradition.

There seems to be a curious contrast in the name of the Paganum of the Bishop of Exeter and the "Deanery of Christianitie," by which the district of his home or cathedral residence is still known—a tradition of the early time when it was the missionary centre.

THOMAS KERSLAKE.

WELSH "VERCH" IN GENEALOGY.

Llochfield: Sept. 2, 1893.

An official in the Probate Registry here, Mr. Marston, asked me how I read a contraction, vz, with an over curl from the z's tail, in a will of 1605. I could only answer that it looked like the ordinary contraction for videlicet. He agreed, but said that it ought to mean verch, which he had found in other entries between a woman's Christian and surname; but what that meant he knew not. I referred the point to Prof. Rhys, and he kindly answered from the appropriately named "Perros Guirac" that vz does "stand for verch, and verch is the mutated form of merch, 'daughter.' Similarly in pedigrees ma, 'son,' becomes vab, and then drops its v, whence ab, as in D. ab Gwilyn, &c. Verch was also reduced to ach and 'eh in modern times in North Wales, as in Margred 'ch Ivan."

This will-maker, "Margaret ver3 Moris of Dudliston in the County of Sallop, Spinster," gives legacies

"vnto Katherine ver3 William, my neese, vj li. . . Deyly ver3 John, ij li. . . Jane ver3 Edward. . . xx s. . . and to the sonne of Katherine ver3 Moris, for his preferment into some occupation, xx s."

As to her aps, she gives legacies to the sons and grandsons of John Vaughan thus:

"vnto Thomas ap John Vaughan, xx s. . . amongst the childre of John ap John Vaughan xx s; to Robert ap John Vaughan, xx s."

All this is no doubt stale news to students of Welsh, but will be welcome to English readers of old documents who come across their old friend v3 (presumably videlicet) in a name like "Jane v3 Edward."

SHAKSPERE'S "MAKE ROPE'S IN SUCH A SCARRE."

3, St. George's Square, N.W.: Sept. 10, 1889.

Mr. Harrison has taken up earnestly the suggestion of the late Mr. Brae that scarre means "change," "exchange," because a later editor of Lingua (printed 1607), evidently not knowing what scarre in it meant, took the word "change" from a few lines above, and substituted that for it, since "change" gave an easily understood meaning to the line. In Lingua the five senses struggle for the mastery, or the robes and crown, which are the sign of it. Tactus or Touch sees them first, stumbles and breaks his shins as he seizes them and puts them on, and fancies he is a king:

"They lie that say complexions cannot change:
My blood's ennobled, and I am transform'd
Unto the sacred temper of a King . . .
How princely do I speak! how sharp I threaten!
Peasant's, I'll curb your headstrong impudence,
And make you tremble when the lion roars.
Ye earth-bred worms! O, for a looking-glass!
Poets will write whole volumes of this scarre."
Hazlitt's Dodley, ix. 348.

Now, the main element of the meaning of "this scarre" is evidently its astoundingness, its astonishingness; and surely this follows easily from the sense of scarre, as is seen in part of Cotgrave's definition of its equivalent "Espovente: f. astonishment, consternation, amazement," primarily from terror, which suits Tactus's threats to the peasants. Cotgrave also gives "Espoventement: m. as Espovente; or, a frightening, fraying, skaring, terrifying."

Mr. P. A. Daniel suggests another meaning for scarre above, namely scar, the scar, a wound on Tactus's shins when he broke them in stumbling at the king's robes and crown :

"Was ever man so fortunate as I,

To break his shins at such a stumbling-block?"

This meaning of "wound" is clearly that of "scarre" in "Cymbeline," v. v. 305, when Belisarius tells K. Cymbeline that Guiderius, who had cut off the fool Cloten's head, hath

"More of thee merited than a band of Clotens Had ever scarre for [were ever killed for]."

A band of fools' lives were worth but little, Guiderius much.

As the otherwise unknown meaning of "exchange" for scarre has thus still to be established, it must be treated at present as a guess, and the strongest reason for accepting the emendation of "hopes" for rope's = rope us, falls to the ground.

SCIENCE.

A Handbook of Cryptogamic Botany. By Alfred W. Bennett and George Murray. (Longmans.)

THE brief autumnal heyday of the fungus-hunters is close upon us; and it is pleasant to welcome such a volume as this, when our thoughts are most set upon some at least of the so-called flowerless plants which it describes. The flowers of our summer rambles are over and gone, and we gladly turn to those which in their lowliness are less attractive, but which have so momentous an influence upon human and all other life. We start afresh with the vestiges of creation, entering again at the vestibule from which we trace the evidences of the evolution of life. For, as our authors say (p. 303),

"all that we know of the relationships between the animal and vegetable kingdoms leads us to the conclusion that the appearance of animal life, both in fresh and in salt water, must have been preceded by that of aquatic vegetation; and it is almost certain that these primeval vegetable organisms must have had a structure and mode of life which would classify them under the head of Algae or Schizophyceae."

The ACADEMY of August 17 contained an obituary notice of the late Rev. M. J. Berkeley, the doyen of British cryptogamists. The years of his life were almost concurrent with those of the nineteenth century; and his writings fairly show how the study and knowledge of cryptogamic botany have advanced—not by leaps and bounds, it is true, but in steady geometrical progression. His classic treatise, Cryptogamic Botany, was issued in 1857. Since that date no similarly comprehensive book has been published in the English language until the appearance of the present Handbook. His work, and that under review, mark eras of achievement. The lapse of thirty-two years in itself shows that the accumulation of observations and hypotheses was so immense that no single author dared to undertake a résumé of knowledge which increased in such a ratio. Every year that the task was postponed its accomplishment seemed to grow more impossible. All honour then to those who have made the bold endeavour. Only workers in the same illimitable field can realise their difficulties.

In a carefully written introduction the authors refer to the revolution which has taken place in the department of cryptogamic botany. As an instance of the rapidity with which facts are daily colligated, they draw attention in their preface to the impossibility of their earlier sheets quite representing the latest knowledge available at the date of printing.

The responsibility of the volume is shared alike by both authors. The Vascular Cryptogams, Muscineae, Algae, and Schizophyceae are, however, the special work of Mr. Bennett, the description of the Fungi, Mycetozoa, and Schizomycetes having been undertaken by Mr. Murray. In each case the higher orders have presented the least difficulty, on account of their having been studied far more exhaustively than have, even yet, the lower organisms, although "bacteria" and "bacilli" have become almost household words. The proportion assigned to each group has been equalised as much as possible, so as to give, as it were, a bird's-eye view of the whole subject rather than a perspective glance.

As regards classification, the authors allow themselves a somewhat eclectic scheme, embodying with their own conclusions those of the latest monographers. They adopt what is called the descending order; teaching us, that is, all that is known about ferns, before they endeavour to unravel the life-mysteries of microscopic organisms. But such cells, whose life is but days, like those of the anthrax bacillus, before they kill a man; and such plants as the tree-ferns, whose life may equal that of an oak—when we contemplate these, terms implying the "higher" or the "lower" life obtain a significance which the student hesitates to solve or ratify. Power, as a factor of aristocracy, falls from its high estate. We men, who hold ourselves at the apex of development, are at the mercy of invisible bacilli; but we can hold our own with the tallest tree-fern that ever grew.

One aim of modern medical science is to investigate the powers of destruction—infinite though they mainly are, in regard to the space occupied by each individual—with the keenest observation. And there is nothing more conducive to the scientific knowledge of the way to conduct our warfare against such insidious enemies than a thorough study of the organisms which lie, in the evolutionist's idea of life, between bacilli and man. Such a treatise as this must do much to diminish the space between the known and the unknown. Pasteur has found a cure for the grape-vine disease; he may have succeeded in dispossessing hydrophobia of its terrors. But he could never have done either the one or the other unless he had first familiarised himself with a great deal of such knowledge as Messrs. Bennett and Murray here lay before us so elaborately.

There are, however, novelties in the book, some of which one can hardly hope may take root. Classification is a shifting art, and must progress on the lines of actual knowledge. Those who know most are the best qualified to erect the signal-posts; and the present authors are abreast with the times in that respect. So far, peritis credendum est in sua arte. But they seem to forget that botany, like all other sciences, has acquiesced in the usage of certain terms which, being merely latinised, can be utilised without alteration in all languages. Their anglicisation, which is here advocated and adopted, is but a stumbling-block, without a word to be said in its favour. We do not want new names, we do not want new forms of old ones; all we require is precise definition, such as we have in the authors' discussion of the meaning of the word "spore" (p. 5). An Englishman may guess what "archegone" is short for, for example; but why puzzle a foreigner with a new form of a word with which he is familiar in every treatise hitherto written on the special subject in any European language? Insular prejudice is indeed strong, but it should not be admitted into scientific nomenclature. Such words can never become popular, and the advantage of uniformity has everything to recommend it. The wider the disseminability of knowledge, the greater must be its power.

It may seem ungracious to speak thus, when there is so much to praise. So before I go any further let me call attention to the rich harvest of illustrations which embellish and interpret the book. Many of them are old friends; but they are none the worse for that. They are each the work of distinguished specialists. Here they are, all together, in a kind of national gallery. They drop into their places—places they would never have attained if they could have been improved upon. Not one is superfluous, or out of date. Nobody else ever ranged them in such order, or supplied their deficiencies so well.

Bibliography finds a helpful place in the book; and there is an art in the display of the right authorities. Every specialist can find all he wants to know if he searches the books and papers noted here. A reference to everything which has been written upon each subject would have been mere bewilderment. The book even goes beyond its profession. Geological time is a "large order," as the Americans phrase it. But here we have account taken of all that is known of the occurrence of cryptogams in prehistoric and primeval epochs. We cannot expect a mushroom or a toadstool to have survived a cataclysm, although many a fern and horsetail has—from the time when that which we now use as coal was little else than luxuriant vegetation. Still, lowlier members of the vegetable kingdom than ferns remain to show us that even such tiny cryptogams as diatoms existed aeons ago.

This is not the place to go into an elaborate account of the minute and accurate way in which the authors treat the marvellous diversity of life in the infinitude of plants which the ordinary botanist neglects. He is generally content to name his flowers. He dries them, and is happy. Let him now look into this book and see what he has yet to learn. Flowering plants are but a child's study compared with that which is within the ken of the cryptogamist. He may here look up the subject of lichens, for instance. But he will not find them as a separate group. What a vista this should open up to him! There is no such thing as a lichen. It is only a fungus growing on an alga. Read p. 322 for the proof. When he gets over that he is prepared for everything else of new or strange; and his delight will grow as his studies mature. No human being living in this year of grace will ever know all that cryptogamy has to teach. All thanks then to those who have so succinctly and accurately told us the essentials of that which is at present known.

HENRY T. WHARTON.

LITERATURE IN SOUTHERN INDIA.

THE official report on publications, recently issued by the Madras Government, is not wholly void of encouragement to those who desire to see a new intellectual awakening in Southern India. But we live in the Kali Yuga, and the time of strong mental activity is not yet.

In the Madras Presidency printing is carried on in the following languages: English, Tamil, Telugu, Canarese, Malayalam, Hindustani, and Sanskrit. During the past year the total number of books and pamphlets published amounted to 942. Of periodicals there were 227.

In history and biography but little has been accomplished. Most of the books under these headings have been educational.

Lovers of the drama will be pleased to learn that in this section more has been done. The works of Kalidasa, the Sanskrit dramatist, have been reprinted; and the Sanskrit play "Nagananda" has been translated into Canarese. Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" has appeared in a Mahratta version, which has been printed in the Nagari character. "As You Like It," from Charles Lamb's Tales from Shakspeare, has appeared in Tamil, and the "Winter's Tale" in Tamil and Telugu. A complete edition of the Arabian Nights has also been printed in Tamil.

In medicine, part of the Sanskrit work "Ashtanga Hrithayam," with a Telugu commentary, has been published, and a small book on the Muhammadan treatment for improving the blood has been printed in Tamil by a Labbai.

In poetry, nothing worthy of the name has been produced during the past year. A few songs and ballads have appeared, but they contain nothing which demands notice. Among the thirty millions of the Madras presidency I cannot mention three distinguished possessors of the poetic gift at the present time.

In philosophy, also, the year has been practically barren. Indeed, so far are men from producing philosophical works of merit that it is not easy to find Hindus who can intelligently read the Hindu philosophy which has been written. The same may be said also of religious literature, viz.: that the religious systems of the Hindus do not now appear to move them to any vigorous literary effect, nor even to arouse them to strong, clear thinking. Time was when it was otherwise.

During the past five years the annual number of publications in English has more than doubled. Next to English works, Tamil publications show the largest increase. Yet it is still true that the vernaculars and their treasures are at a discount, and genuine students few indeed, though the field for study and industrious research is well-nigh boundless. The Hindu intellect appears as if suffering from temporary exhaustion, and awaits the coming of a new enthusiasm and of that vigour which is necessary to creative mental effort. In the meantime, therefore, critical research must be undertaken by Englishmen; and that so little has been done by us to unveil India, and furnish to the world more exact knowledge concerning the faiths and the philosophy of this most interesting section of it, as well as of their sources, is not to our credit. Would not our German cousins have done better had India been theirs? It is to be feared that much cannot be hoped for from a government already heavily burdened and impecunious; but for Englishmen of culture and means desiring a field for study and research, surely none can be found more magnificent than Southern India.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE INSCRIPTIONS FROM NAUKRATIS.

Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge: Sept. 4, 1889.

In 1887 an active controversy was carried on in the ACADEMY (May 14, July 9, 16, August 6, 20, 27) between Mr. E. A. Gardner and Prof. Hirschfeld on the subject of the Greek inscriptions discovered at Naukratis. Mr. Gardner maintained:

(1) That Naukratis was founded as early as the middle of the seventh century B.C., or that, at any rate, there were Greeks settled on the site of what was afterwards Naukratis long before the time of Amasis, who, according to Herodotus (ii. 178), assigned the spot to the Greeks to dwell in;

(2) That certain inscriptions in the Ionic alphabet with four-stroke σ and Ω , which were found in a certain stratum of earth, must from their position and other evidences belong to a date earlier than that assigned by Prof. Kirchhoff to the Abu Simbel inscriptions;

(3) That, therefore, in spite of the use of three-stroke σ and absence of Ω in the latter, these Naukratite inscriptions were older and written in alphabetic forms of an older type than the Abu Simbel inscriptions;

(4) That consequently the alphabet of the Abu Simbel inscriptions could no longer be regarded as the mother alphabet of Ionic, and that the differences between it and the Ionic must be local rather than temporal.

Prof. Hirschfeld, on the other hand (Rhein. Mus., 1887, 209 sqq.) held:

(1) That Naukratis was founded by Amasis, and that previously there were no Greeks on the spot;

(2) That the Abu Simbel inscriptions belonged to the earlier (Kirchhoff says the later) years of Psammetichus I., or about the middle of the seventh century B.C.;

(3) That the peculiar alphabetic forms of the Naukratite inscriptions on which Mr. Gardner relied were mere graffiti, and in any case too insignificant in number to support his thesis;

(4) That the three-stroke σ must in every case have been the precursor of the four-stroke σ .

Vol. ii. of Naukratis has now appeared (Egypt Exploration Fund). Mr. Gardner maintains his views almost unaltered. Prof. Hirschfeld criticises vol. ii., as he did vol. i., in the Rheinisches Museum (1889, p. 461, sqq.). It is worth while (and this is the object of the present remarks) to see what this able scholar now thinks of the points in dispute.

(1) Prof. Hirschfeld accepts (Rhein. Mus. 464) the solution suggested by Mr. Gardner (Naukratis, ii., p. 74), that the difference between the alphabet of the Abu Simbel inscriptions and that of the Naukratite inscriptions was not temporal but local, though he notes that Mr. Gardner has not followed up his suggestion. I may be allowed to point out that Mr. Gardner expressed the same view, not only in Naukratis, i., but also in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, vol. vii., p. 230;

(2) Prof. Hirschfeld argues that four-stroke σ and three-stroke σ come from different mother-forms. In a note to p. 235, vol. vii. of the Journal of Hellenic Studies, Mr. Gardner wrote: "Or is the four-stroke form derived from Shin, the three-stroke one from Tsade? A suggestion confirmed by the form occupying the place of Tsade in the Abecedarium of Caere." This is exactly what Prof. Hirschfeld now seeks to prove, though whether Mr. Gardner would, on consideration, accept a proof which depends for its chief support upon the one, perhaps accidental, variety of form in the alphabet of Caere is, I think, doubtful;

(3) The Abu Simbel inscriptions with three-stroke σ belong to the Tsade group; the oldest Milesian and the oldest Naukratite (Milesian) inscriptions belong to the Shin group;

(4) This re-statement of the relation of the alphabet of the Abu Simbel inscriptions to the Milesian and Naukratite alphabet makes it possible, according to Prof. Hirschfeld's views, to estimate the age and value of the Naukratite alphabetic forms, entirely apart from those of the Abu Simbel inscriptions; and the standard of comparison becomes in fact the alphabet of the oldest inscriptions found at Miletus. That these epigraphically are later than the oldest Naukratite (Milesian) inscriptions is what Mr. Gardner maintains; that from the stratum in which they were found the oldest Naukratite inscriptions must be at least as old as the seventh century is the evidence of excavation.

Now Mr. Gardner may or may not be right in his original contention, that certain forms of letters in the oldest Naukratite (Milesian) inscriptions are of a more archaic type than the alphabetic forms on the oldest inscriptions found at Miletus, and that this archaism is not accidental. But as regards his controversy with Prof. Hirschfeld the position is strikingly altered.

Mr. Gardner contended that there were Greeks (Milesians) on the site of Naukratis as early as the seventh century, B.C. Prof. Hirschfeld at first disputed, but now (Rhein. Mus., 466) has nothing to say against, the conclusion.

Mr. Gardner contended that the alphabet of the Abu Simbel inscriptions was not the Ionic mother-alphabet. Prof. Hirschfeld now puts forward the same view.

Mr. Gardner contended that four-stroke σ was not preceded in every case by three-stroke σ . Prof. Hirschfeld now quotes with approval and develops both of the suggestions actually made by Mr. Gardner, as a possible explanation of the fact assumed, in the Journal of Hellenic Studies (l.c.).

My sketch of the controversy as it now stands is necessarily very brief and incomplete. I am sure Prof. Hirschfeld will pardon me if my brevity has led to unintentional misrepresentation of his present attitude.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish next week the second part of the fifth and largely revised edition of Prof. Michael Foster's Text-Book of Physiology. It forms book ii. of the complete work, and treats of the tissues of chemical action with their respective mechanisms, and of nutrition.

MESSRS. W. B. WHITTINGHAM & Co. will shortly issue Service Chemistry, by Prof. Vivian B. Lewes, of the Royal Naval College. The work, which is fully illustrated, treats with technical detail chemistry as affecting not only the Navy and the Army, but also the Merchant Service.

UNDER the title of Records of the Geological Survey of New South Wales, a new quarterly journal has been started by the Department of Mines at Sydney. Its primary object is to offer a medium for the speedy publication of observations and discoveries made by the staff of the Survey, which works under the Department of Mines. As the records will contain descriptions of newly-developed mining districts and newly-discovered minerals, the publication will be the means of calling attention to the rich natural resources of the colony. The first part contains several papers and notes on the rocks, minerals, and fossils of New South Wales, offering to the geologist much matter of scientific and economic interest.

THE third session of the Edinburgh University Extension Summer Vacation Course was held during August at the Marine Station, Granton, through the kindness of Dr. Murray, Director of the Challenger Expedition, and of Mr. Irvine, of Royston. The courses of botany and zoology were conducted, as last year, by Prof. Geddes and Mr. G. A. Thomson. This year each course was divided into an elementary and an advanced section—the former dealing with phanerogams and vertebrates, and the latter with cryptogams and invertebrates. Twenty-five or thirty students attended. All the courses were supplemented by demonstrations in the field and on the shore, and by visits to public and private gardens and to the museum. A course of twenty lectures on sociology was also delivered by Prof. Geddes.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Sciences, M. A. de Quatrefages submitted some remarks in connexion with his Introduction à l'Étude des Races humaines, Part II. In this second part the author passes from the general questions touching the evolution of man to those touching the evolution of the human races, of which he reckons at least one hundred and seventy-two, exclusive of minor varieties, all, however, reducible to the three fundamental black, yellow, and white stems. Adhering to the natural method of classification, as understood by Jussieu and Cuvier, he divides these stems into branches corresponding to primary and secondary divisions, under which come the families and groups. Much stress is laid on the early migrations of man, resulting in crossings of all sorts, and the general displacement of pure by half-caste races. The position of fossil man in the general scheme of classification is also studied, the five or six known varieties discovered in Europe being divided into two distinct branches allied to the white stock. Two distinct quaternary types are also recognised in America—that of the Pampas affiliated to the Siberian, and that of the Lagoa Santa to the Eskimo branch of the yellow stock. Some bold speculations are indulged in regarding the primeval homes of the three fundamental groups and their subsequent dispersion from common centres over the face of the globe. In this scheme the north of Asia is considered the cradle of mankind, whose three primary divisions grouped themselves round the great central tableland, whence they gradually spread over the continents during tertiary and quaternary times. In the oceanic world the eastern Polynesians are affiliated to the white, the Melanesians (Papuan) to the black, and the Malays to the yellow stock, each division migrating from the mainland in the order already indicated by Prof. Keane (Indo-Chinese and Inter-Oceanic Races and Languages.) The work is illustrated with 441 figures inserted in the text, four plates, and seven maps.

FINE ART.

A Dictionary of Miniaturists, Illuminators, Calligraphers, and Copyists. With references to their Works, and Notices of their Patrons, from the Establishment of Christianity to the Eighteenth Century. By John W. Bradley. In 3 vols. Vol. III. (Bernard Quaritch.)

THE author of this very laborious catalogue is to be congratulated at having brought it to a completion in three substantial volumes, of the first and second of which we gave an account in the ACADEMY of September 17, 1887, and September 8, 1888.

It is, we think, to be regretted that space has not been allowed for details of about 350 other artists whose names are given in an appendix at the end of the volume before us, by far the greater portion of whom flourished in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries—not more than fourteen being recorded among them as previous to the twelfth century. Among these, however, are Charlemagne (as patron), Herrade of Landsperg, the Archbishop Egbert, and Nicephorus Botoniates as a calligrapher, whose magnificent portrait occurs several times with that of his wife in a splendid volume at the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. These portraits were copied by Count Bastard, but have never been published, and are not mentioned by Mr. Bradley.

It was an excellent idea to introduce notices of the great patrons of the illuminator's art, such as the Orleans family, the Sforzas, Strozzi, Dukes of Urbino, &c., as this has allowed the mention of many magnificent MSS. still in existence, of which the present possession is generally given.

Of English artists the enumeration in the present volume is rather meagre. There is a good account of Matthew Paris, monk of St. Albans, who, "notwithstanding his name of Mattheus Parisiensis or Parisiacensis, was probably an Englishman . . . the most important of whose MSS. is the Royal MS. 14 C. vii., in the British Museum," as being the autograph copy of the author which was presented to Henry III., and probably containing examples of Paris's skill as an illuminator, miniaturist, and herald painter. On fol. 6 is a miniature of the Virgin seated and holding the infant Christ, whom she kisses. Beneath is the artist in monastic habit, prostrate, and evidently intended for a portrait. Above him is written in capital letters alternately blue and red—FRATS MATHIAS PARISIENSIS. The seated figure of the Virgin is a very beautiful one, nine inches high, and at the bottom of the drawing is the inscription (of which only the first line is given by Strutt, with the figure of the prostrate monk in his Horda Angel Cynan, pl. xxxv.), which is omitted by Mr. Bradley. This whole inscription (which the writer hereof copied with the miniature many years ago) is

"O felicia oscula lactentis labiis impressa cū inter crebra indicia reptantis infancie utpote ver' ex te fili' inri alludret cū verus ex patre dī dī genit' imparet."

The contemporary scribe and artist, Jean de Wallingford, whose portrait is contained in the Cottonian MS. Julius D VII., is not mentioned by Mr. Bradley. We find, however, an interesting notice of another almost unknown Berkshire artist, Joh. Serbopoulos, a Greek of Constantinople, who worked at Reading ('Padryk'), and by whom several MSS. are still preserved in the libraries of New and Corpus Christi Colleges, Oxford. A good account is given of Johannes Sifrewas, the illuminator of the splendid Loutterell Psalter now in the British Museum, from which a fine set of engravings was published many years ago by the Society of Antiquaries in the Vetusta Monumenta, not noticed by Mr. Bradley.

It is to be regretted that there is no fuller account of the famous Hortus Deliciarum of the Abbess Herrade von Landsperg than is given in the second volume of Mr. Bradley's work. The loss of the original invaluable work by the bombardment of Strasburg, in 1870, and the apparent cessation of the fine set of facsimiles, of which several parts were published by Messrs. Trübner some years ago, still leave much to be deplored. Some of the more remarkable drawings were copied in colours for Count Bastard, and are now in the Bibliothèque Nationale still unpublished.

We regret that we can give no details of the great mass of materials contained in the volume before us. We should estimate that there must be more than 1200 names of illuminators and scribes in this third volume. We would, however, especially refer to Rabula (sixth century), Udalricus (tenth century)—there is a fine copy of the Gospels signed by him in the British Museum)—Wulstan (eleventh century), Ultan, an Irish scribe (fourteenth century), Sintramn of St. Gall, and more extended accounts of King Rene, Sanzio Raffaello, Van Eyck, &c.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A CYLINDER OF KING URKHAM IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

Larnaca, Cyprus: August 24, 1889.

From a report (Temps, August 4; Journal Officiel, August 7) of a paper read before the Académie des Inscriptions by M. Joachim Menant, I gather that the writer throws doubts on the authenticity of a cylinder inscribed with the name of Urkham, King of Ur, now in the British Museum, or at least on its identity with that once in the possession of Dr. John Hine, and engraved in Sir R. K. Porter's Travels (vol. ii., 424, pl. 79, no. 6).

One point I, and perhaps I alone, can make quite clear. Dr. John Hine, formerly of the Bombay Medical Establishment, and for many years attached to H.M. Residency at Baghdad, died on March 18, 1859, aged eighty-two, at Leeford, near Exmouth, where he had lived at least twenty years. A few days after his funeral this cylinder was handed to me—a neighbour and legatee—by one of his executors; and it never left my possession until I gave it, in September, 1880, to the national collection.

C. DELAVAL COBHAM.

[We quote from the Revue Critique the report of M. Menant's paper:

"M. Menant read a note upon a cylinder in the British Museum, the authenticity of which he disputed. The object in question shows a subject that is of importance for the history of religion. A high priest leads a neophyte by the hand and presents him to a deity sitting upon a throne; behind is another personage in the attitude of worship. This cylinder has for a long time been known only from a drawing by Rich, which was made about 1818, after the original belonging to Dr. John Hine. A few years ago, a cylinder which seemed to be identical with this original was found by Mr. Cobham, Commissioner at Larnaca, who presented it to the British Museum. While this cylinder recalls generally the authentic objects of the same kind discovered in Chaldaea, it yet has some suspicious details. For example, one of the feet of the throne is ornamented with a pied-de-biche—a peculiarity not to be found elsewhere. M. Menant is of opinion that the drawing of Rich was executed from an authentic original, but failed to reproduce it exactly; and that the pretended original in the British Museum is but a copy made from the drawing."

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN announce a quarto volume on Pen Drawing and Pen Draughtmanship, by Mr. Joseph Pennell, which will be illustrated with photogravures and other illustrations, after examples by many well-known artists, both English and foreign. The list includes Sir F. Leighton, E. J. Poynter, Frederick Walker, Randolph Caldecott, G. Du Maurier, Linley Sambourne, Harry Furniss, Charles Keene, Walter Crane, Hugh Thomson, Lhermitte, and Menzel.

A PRIVATE view of the works of decorative art, &c., to be sent to the forthcoming exhibition of the Arts and Crafts at the New Gallery by the Guild and School of Handicraft, will take place on Saturday and Sunday next, September 14 and 15, from 3 to 6 p.m., at the workshop of the Guild, 34 Commercial Street, E.

MR. GEORGE MACMILLAN has lately presented to the British Museum a small Greek vase, belonging in form and decoration to the rare class of Corinthian pottery of the sixth century B.C. The neck is modelled to represent a lion's head, with open jaws and extended tongue. The ornamentation consists of five bands, of which the highest and lowest are of conventional patterns. The middle band shows a combat of warriors, numbering eighteen figures. Above is a horse-race, and below a hunting-scene. The figures in all these are admirably drawn and modelled, especially when their small scale is considered. The whole vase is less than three inches in height.

MESSRS. KERR & RICHARDSON, of Glasgow, have published in pamphlet-form a paper read by Prof. Jebb last March before the Glasgow Art Club, entitled "Has Art thriven best in an Age of Faith?" On historical grounds, the professor inclines to answer his question in the negative, though he admits that art should possess a certain moral suggestiveness. We may add that the gross profits of the sale of the pamphlet will be given to the Scottish Artists' Benevolent Association.

THE three portraits by Rembrandt in the Sagan collection have, it is said, been sold to America. The most important of these, the portrait of Prof. Tulp (who is the lecturer in the famous "Lecture on Anatomy" at the Hague), has been bought for the Art Institute at Chicago.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Salomon Reinach called attention to an inscription found in Cyprus, in the neighbourhood of Paphos, which contains a dedication to a divinity called Opaon Melanthios. A comparison with other inscriptions from Cyprus shows that this divinity is no other than Apollo. Opaon, meaning shepherd, is used by Pindar as an epithet of Aristaeus, who is an early form of the Arcadian Apollo. The name Melanthios recalls that of an Athenian hero, the eponym of the town Melainai; and there was another town of the same name in Arcadia, which must have had the same eponym. Both the titles, then, under which Apollo was worshipped at Paphos seem to attest the ancient connexion between Cyprus and Arcadia. The town of Paphos is known to have honoured as its founder the Arcadian Agapenor. M. Clermont-Ganneau pointed out that this inscription had already been published by Colonna-Ceccaldi, in his posthumous work, Monuments Antiques de Chypre.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

A Second Set of Six Songs. By H. Festing Jones. (Op. 5.) (Weekes.) It is difficult nowadays to be original—indeed it becomes everyday more so. Mr. Jones certainly shows character in his music. There is a strong flavour of the antique about it, but it is something more than a mere imitation of the past. We shall follow the composer's career with interest. Of the six songs now before us, Nos. 3, 4, and 5 please us best. The words of the first three of the set are taken from Bullen's Lyrics from the Song Books of the Elizabethan Age.

First, Second, and Third Book on the Theory of Music. By Louisa Gibson. (Weekes.) We have already called attention to this exceedingly clear and concise work on theory; and therefore it will suffice to state that this is a second edition, revised and enlarged by the author with the assistance of Mr. E. Prout.

The Sea hath its Pearls. By T. H. Frewin. (Woolhouse.) This song opens in a very pleasing manner; and the middle section, with its change of key and rhythm, and with its 'cello obbligato effects, is attractive.

Four Songs. By W. Noel Johnson. (Woolhouse.) The first and second, to words by Longfellow, are neatly written and unpretentious. The third (Longfellow's "All are sleeping, weary heart") and the last (Shelley's "I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden") are also simple, but show more character. The Shelley is the best of the set—the accompaniment is most delicate.

The Fair Garden, by J. Cliffe Forrester (Woolhouse), is a good song, and the last page throws into the shade all that has gone before.

My Love has come, by Dr. Spark (Woolhouse), is a tuneful but ordinary ballad; the doubled thirds, however, in the accompaniment to the piu animato are not pleasant.

Three Character Pieces for Viola or Violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, by J. J. Haakman. (Woolhouse.) Prière is a quiet, elegant movement, and should certainly be played with viola rather than violin. Meditation is of a more popular character. We care least for No. 3, Epoir.

Trois Morceaux de Salon pour Piano. Par J. J. Haakman. (Woolhouse.) The opening of No. 1 has not an original sound, but yet it is graceful. We do not, however, like the passage with arpeggio chords. No. 2 is light and lively. No. 3—the last and the best of the set—is a taking morceau.

Romanesca and Elégie for Violin and Piano, by G. St. George (Woolhouse), are effective drawing-room duets.

Song of the Brook: a Sketch for Pianoforte, by J. Cliffe Forrester (Woolhouse), is good as a study, but somewhat tedious as a piece.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

IN our notice of the Appendix to Sir G. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians (ACADEMY, July 27), we complained that no mention was made of J. F. Rowbotham's History of Music. This work is, however, noticed, but only under the heading "Ancient Music." We naturally looked for it under "List of the Principal Musical Historians of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries." Again, in commenting on the article "Saxophone," we stated that that instrument is used in Berlioz's "Les Troyens." We had a strong remembrance of having seen a Sax instrument in the full score; and we therefore concluded, somewhat rashly, that Mr. J. A. Kappey, the writer of the article, had been correctly informed. But a recent examination of the autograph score at Paris enables us to point out our own mistake and that of Mr. Kappey's informant. Berlioz used Saxhorns of various kinds in the stage orchestras of the "Marche Troyenne," but not the Saxophone.

THE full programme of the Leeds Festival has been issued. The committee have, we think, acted wisely in omitting the familiar "Messiah" and "Elijah," in order to make room for other works less frequently performed. The dates of the novelties have already been given in the ACADEMY. The Festival opens on Wednesday morning, October 9, with Berlioz's "Faust." On Thursday morning Bach's Cantata—"God's time is the best," Schubert's Mass in E flat, and Handel's "Acis and Gaulea" will be performed; and on Saturday morning Brahms's "Requiem" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." In the evening there will be a Sullivan programme, including the incidental music to "Macbeth" and "The Golden Legend."

IN consequence of October 12 being the concluding day of the Leeds Musical Festival, the date of the first of the thirty-fourth annual series of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts has been postponed from October 12 to 19. There will, therefore, be nine concerts before Christmas, and eleven after (February 8 to April 19). Mr. Mann's benefit concert taking place on April 26, 1890.

MR. BASIL TREE has published a most useful list of concerts at St. James's Hall for the forthcoming season. The Popular Concerts will commence on October 28; the first Saturday concert on November 2. Mr. Henschel will begin his series of London Symphony Concerts on November 14. Señor Sarasate will give three concerts on October 19, 26, and November 1. Sir C. Halle will give orchestral concerts on November 22, December 6, and January 24, and February 7, 1890. The dates of the Novello Oratorio Concerts have not yet been fixed.

THE Hackney Choral Association will give Spohr's "Fall of Babylon" at their first concert on November 18. The dates of the other concerts are January 20, March 17, and May 5, 1890.

AGENCIES.

Copies of the ACADEMY can also be obtained every Saturday morning in EDINBURGH of Mr. MENZIES; in DUBLIN of Messrs. EASON & SON, 40, Sackville-street; in MANCHESTER of Mr. J. HEYWOOD. Ten days after date of publication, in NEW YORK, of Messrs. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS.

LITERATURE.

The Life and Letters of Thomas Drummond.

By R. Barry O'Brien. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

THOMAS DRUMMOND, the inventor of the lime-light and the famous under-secretary for Ireland in the second administration of Lord Melbourne, was born in 1797 and died in 1840. His father, "the last laird of Comrie," died in 1800, leaving his wife, with her three sons and a daughter, to fight the battle of life on an annual income of about £120. Nevertheless, Mrs. Drummond did not despair; but with that indomitable courage, so characteristic of Scotch parents, bent all her energies towards securing a liberal education for her children. In due time she met with her reward. Passing from school, where he had manifested a decided predilection for mathematical studies, Thomas Drummond obtained a cadetship at Woolwich, and at the age of eighteen entered the Royal Engineers. But the monotonous drudgery of a life in barracks proving uncongenial to him, he was on the point of quitting the army for the bar when circumstances brought him into contact with Col. Colby, then engaged on the Ordnance Survey, who invited him to take part in that work. Drummond gladly accepted the invitation, and for the next ten years laboured with such assiduity in the service as seriously to impair his health. It was while engaged with Colby in Kent, in the autumn of 1823, that Drummond, feeling the insufficiency of the ordinary Argand lamp for the purposes of the survey, especially when the atmosphere was at all misty, set about making certain experiments which eventually resulted in the invention of the Drummond, or, as it is more usually called, the lime-light. Many years were required to bring the light to a state of perfection, but such as it was it was of inestimable service during the survey of Ireland. Curiously enough it was by means of his invention that Drummond received his introduction into political life. Dining one day with a friend, he happened to meet Lord Brougham, who expressed a desire to see the light. Accordingly the apparatus was placed in an adjoining green-house and the lamp directed to the drawing-room where the company were assembled.

"There were," wrote Drummond, giving an account of the scene to his mother, "only eight persons present, all intimate friends of Brougham's, so that the conversation, at and after dinner about men and things, more especially the Reform question, was most entertaining and interesting. The Chancellor was in great spirits and talked the whole time. After returning to the drawing-room I displayed the light, at which they expressed great admiration, though the Chancellor seemed greatly afraid of his eyes, and could hardly be persuaded to look at it. I spied him, however, peeping at a corner, and immediately turned the reflector full upon him, but he fled instantaneously."

The acquaintance thus formed soon ripened into friendship; and it was at Brougham's suggestion that Drummond was appointed chairman of the Boundary Commission, in connexion with the parliamentary reform scheme of 1832. In 1833 he accepted the post of private secretary to Lord Althorpe, then Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Grey ministry; and in June, 1835, he became Under-Secretary for Ireland. Other posts were suggested for him; but his "partiality for Ireland," as his mother put it, prevailed, and in July he set out for the scene of his labours. Certainly, whatever his motives were in accepting the post, no man was ever better qualified for it by a more thorough knowledge of the Irish people, by a keener appreciation of their good qualities, by a profounder sympathy for their misfortunes, and by a more comprehensive knowledge of the causes which lay at the root of those misfortunes, than was Drummond. In this respect his labours on the Ordnance Survey were of inestimable service to him.

It was a pitiable spectacle that met his gaze when he landed. Every day the movement for the repeal of the Union was taking a stronger hold on the people. Catholic emancipation tardily and grudgingly granted had only served to enrage the Orange party without satisfying the Catholics. Church divided against church; race against race; Orangemen against Ribbonmen; rack-rents and evictions on the one hand, outrages and murders on the other; everywhere nothing but a seething mass of discontent—it might well have seemed a hopeless task to establish a strong and impartial government, dependent upon no party or clique and capable of meting out justice to Orangeman and Ribbonman alike. Yet it was to accomplish this task that Drummond resolutely set himself. For a little more than four years only he was virtually ruler of Ireland; and it must be confessed that there are few pages in Irish history either more agreeable to the general reader or more instructive to the student of Irish politics than is the history of Drummond's brief but beneficent rule. The apostle of a new policy, he had no sooner landed than he was assailed by all the forces of the old régime. Flattery, raillery, abuse, were heaped upon him in turn; but, conscious of the rectitude of his purpose and strong in the strength which comes of knowledge, he calmly proceeded on his way. Hitherto the Ascendancy had been accustomed to regard the forces of the crown rather as an instrument for enforcing the payment of tithes and rent than as the guardian of the commonweal. When, therefore, the Under-Secretary declared in unmistakeable language that such was not the case—that the executive was not responsible for the enforcement of personal claims, just or unjust, but only for the preservation of the public peace—they could hardly believe their ears. Even Drummond's own friends and colleagues were sometimes astonished and perplexed at the firmness and consistency with which he adhered to the doctrine he had laid down on this point. But, in truth, what with Orange rowdiness, Ribbonism, and faction fights, the police—even after being reorganised by Drummond on a basis which has made "the force" an object of admiration to every visitor to Ireland—had quite as much as they could attend to in preserving the public peace. Each of these elements of disorder Drummond attacked in turn. Wherever Orangeism showed itself, either in riotous processions, in indecent toasts, in the jury box, in the police force, or on the magisterial bench, it was promptly attacked by him. His conduct was much resented, and the Orangemen talked loudly of defying him; but the good sense of the country gradually rallied to his support, and nothing was wanting to secure his complete victory than the sorry figure which their champion, Colonel Venner, who had given "The Battle of the Diamond" as a toast at an election dinner, and his friends cut in parliament over the subject. With Ribbonism Drummond was equally successful. Treating the organisation rather as an excrescence due to landlord oppression than as a symptom of an innate spirit of lawlessness on the part of the peasantry, he endeavoured by placing the administration on a popular basis, by removing from the bench every suspicion of political partisanship, and by showing the people that the government sympathised with their grievances, to win them over to the side of law and order. Nor was the confidence he reposed in them misplaced. In Tipperary, the very centre of agrarian disturbance, a society was formed by the peasants themselves for the suppression of Ribbonism and all "bad characters." The society died with Drummond, and no similar one has ever since been established. "Significant commentary," remarks Mr. O'Brien, "upon his government and upon the government of those who came after him." Equally characteristic both of the man and of the general spirit of his administration is the story recorded by his sister of the way in which he suppressed faction fighting and brawling in the Phoenix Park on Sunday.

"On the Sunday afternoons and evenings crowds used to assemble in the Phoenix Park. Drinking booths were opened, and few Sundays passed without riot and mischief ensuing. My brother talked over the matter with some friends, who told him he must not dream of interfering, because it was a very old custom, and it would not do to attempt to put it down. He resolved, however, that he would make the attempt; so one Sunday afternoon, the people having assembled as usual, he rode out unattended among the crowd. To the keeper of the nearest booth he represented the consequences of the meetings—drunkenness, brawls, fighting, and then punishment; he said these things were to him very painful, and that it would give him great satisfaction could the meetings be altogether given up. The man immediately, without a word of remonstrance, complaint, or even a show of sullenness, set about packing up. He quickly left the ground, and never returned again. The same result occurred at other booths, and in a short time the park was cleared, and the 'old custom' given up for ever."

Some rulers have treated the Irish people as knaves, others as fools; Drummond treated them as men capable of being argued with and convinced. For nearly five years did he rule Ireland in this spirit. How much he knew about the country his "Report of the Railway Commission" in 1838—still one of the most valuable historical documents regarding the social and economical condition of the people ever published—is sufficient to prove; how much he loved it, his death testified. "Bury me in Ireland, the land of my adoption. I have loved her well and served her faithfully," were the last words he uttered. Nearly half a century has passed away since then; but his memory is still green in the hearts of the Irish people. A statue erected to his memory stands in the City Hall of Dublin, side by side with the sculptured figures of Grattan and O'Connell.

Such, in barest outline, is the story of Drummond's life as told by Mr. O'Brien, and told by him with his usual good taste—with sympathy and impartiality; and, it may be added, with a more comprehensive knowledge of the times than is probably possessed by any other student of Irish history. In one respect the book is rather disappointing; but it is a defect which doubtless Mr. O'Brien felt more keenly than anyone else, and which he would gladly have remedied had he been able. I mean the meagreness of our information regarding Drummond's private life. Nevertheless, there is a charming geniality about his letters to his mother, here printed for the first time, which, while it still further illustrates his filial devotion, enables us also to realise in a measure the fascination which his conversation possessed for his contemporaries in general. For the rest, the task Mr. O'Brien has allotted himself has evidently been a labour of love; for whatever could throw any light on his subject either in regard to his scientific inventions or his government of Ireland has been carefully noted by him.

Afterthoughts. By Joseph Truman. (Macmillan.)

THERE is a marked and almost touching fitness in the title of this small book. If Mr. Truman had not called his poems—all, as he says, which he cares "that friendly eyes should see, or indulgent minds remember"—"afterthoughts," the reader would still have ascribed that character to them. They are evidently the ripe fruit of those years of life in which the mind reckons its gains and losses—in which the enthusiasms of youth, and the loves, hopes, and ambitions of a man's prime, are passed in review—with the result that whatever was best in them is gathered like a distilled essence, to be cherished to the end. But when, as in this case, the afterthoughts of a life are rich, the materials from which they were gathered must have been rich to affluence. The gold of youth grows dim, and the brilliant morning colours fade, but it is a true brilliance and a genuine gold all the same. So, looking at the rare worth of these few poems, it is impossible not to regret the keeping back of the first-fruits of the writer's mind. We would rather have had them, in spite of their immaturity, and even because of it. There could be no afterthoughts if there were no first-thoughts—the later growth is the outcome of the earlier; and when the ultimate produce is fair and excellent it is no idle curiosity that makes us want to know out of what abounding bloom and leafage it came.

A single line in the first of these poems will serve to give point to our regret. Writing of "Dreams" Mr. Truman says:

"The blossoms of Eternity lie furled
In the dim kindling buds of dreams that keep
A fluttering pulse within Time's broken sleep;
Dreams are not idle; dreams have saved the world."

That is a noble truth, expressed with all the concentrated force that a poet, and only he, can put into words. But this clear statement of a truth, which the poet has proved by his own experience, is the afterthought; the first-thought is the dream itself; and since dreams are not idle, why not let us have the dreams? Mr. Truman gives us some suggestions of the days when it was natural to dream, in the touching lines recording "What the Robin said in December." Robin, perched and singing on a marble head-stone by Shirley Church, wakes in the poet's heart reminiscences of bygone springs. But the song brings its own satisfaction, and the early dream and the afterthought both lead up to aspirations in which both are merged. Sings the Robin, with the poet for his interpreter:

"Man of dolour, wait awhile—
See the morns of April smile,
Mist shall pass, and skies be blue,
May shall roof these trees anew,
Pave them with unfolding fern,
June's long sunsets through them burn,
And this leafy realm be stirred
With the joy of every bird.

Time is but prefiguring sign—
Buried seed, of worlds divine,
Can aught here seem wondrous fair,
And no answer echo there?
Shall Spring brighten earthen sod
And no life be—nearer God?"

Life is full of compensations, and when one thing is lacking another is redundant, and the loss is made up. So, if the thoughts that come after are fewer and less passionate than those that came first, they are riper and more complete. The unripe thought may be lost in a plague of words, for the garrulousness of youth does not express much wisdom, but the mature mind chooses few words and crowds everyone of them with meaning. That is done in these poems. A few lines, or a single line, are made to express a picture, a character, or the experience of a lifetime. Here is an example from a short poem called "Elleray," having reference, of course, to Prof. Wilson:

"A few pale poems and some worthier prose
Make up the meagre sum which the world knows
Of what was working in that brain and breast;
The vague, eternal kingdoms have the rest."

Four lines, one line indeed, no more; yet not another word is needed to indicate the mortal insufficiency, the ample immortal worth, of that brilliant life. The meagreness of the record is of less matter when it can be said—

"The vague, eternal kingdoms have the rest!"

But Mr. Truman's muse has a still higher mood, which she rarely indulges perhaps, though when she does so the effect is charming, as in these lines, for instance:

"Abroad the first white butterflies wavering flew,
And the cloud-chased lights swept swift o'er the rippled pool,
And the kingcups bright and the pallid windflowers blew
In the meadow marge and the mossy hollows cool;

The wheeling swallows were busy below the thatch,
The mellow throistle piped from the greening fir,
And often one eagerly lifted the cottage latch,
And watched in the happy evening light with her;
Tenderly, playfully, he would gather a bud,
To set like a star in the dark of her wavy hair,
And on they went through the lanes and the tawny wood,
In the sheen of the early moonrise faint and fair."

The desire of pleasant things grows with their possession, and we cannot read such verses as these without wishing that there were more of them.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

THE RELIGIOUS QUESTION IN RUSSIA.

L'Empire des Tsars et les Russes. Par Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu. Tome III., "La Religion." (Paris: Hachette.)

To his elaborate Russian studies already published M. A. Leroy-Beaulieu has now added a third volume on the religious question in that country—a part of Europe which affords such interesting fields of investigation alike to the psychologist, the ethnologist, and the philologist.

The tone of the volume is sympathetic towards the Slavs; at the same time the author does not hesitate occasionally to tell them some disagreeable truths. He has not a mean opinion of the intellect of the Russian moujik, nor does he consider that because his religion is overlaid with so many gross superstitions and ceremonies that there is no real piety or feeling underneath it. He remarks very truly that, tried by the same standard, the Italian and Spanish peasants and, we might add, the Roman Catholic Irish, might be considered pagans.

A large part of the work is necessarily occupied with the raskol, or great religious schism, which began when Nikon corrected the errors which had crept into the religious books. Then occurred the fatal disruption, which has lasted even to our own days. M. Leroy-Beaulieu expresses a high opinion of this remarkable priest, whom he boldly calls the greatest man produced by Russia before the days of Peter. The study of the character of Nikon which he gives us is a very careful one, and great help has been furnished by Palmer's work. It is only from the Englishman's translation, which was made from the original MS. still preserved, that it is possible to learn the boldness of the answers of this champion of the Church when summoned before the Council. Up to the present time they have never been printed in Russia. Nikon was the Beckett of that country, and might have carried the day with the superstitious Alexis, whose ecclesiastical proclivities have been noted for us in the quaint book of his physician Samuel Collins, but the boyars were too much for him. They talked the Tsar over, and Nikon lost his ecclesiastical dignities, and ended as a simple monk. The reader who wants to understand the dispute must go to the pages of Palmer. The account of Dean Stanley is picturesque, but only touches the surface. If we desire an encomium of the bold Russian priest, the Roman Catholic authors will furnish one.

They are admirers of such a vigorous champion of the Church; but, as M. Leroy-Beaulieu does not fail to tell us, Nikon had no sympathy whatsoever with the "Latin heresy."

Our author has given us a careful analysis of the various sects, from the first appearance upon the scene of the staro-obriadi, in the seventeenth century, to the latest development—that of the Stundists—a kind of offshoot of German Protestantism, who derive their name from the word Stunde. He finds the most striking parallels to these sects in America and England; and in fanaticism he compares, as Buckle did before him, the Spanish and the Scotch. Certainly, when we read of the skakuni, or leapers, who make religious dances a great part of their creed, and the molokani, or milk-drinkers, who acknowledge no imperial or royal authority and hold war unlawful, we are reminded of the Shakers and Quakers. Other sects recall the Plymouth Brethren and the Irvingites.

When speaking of the organisation of the Russian Church, M. Leroy-Beaulieu lets us see very plainly that he does not consider the position of the Tsar in reference to it—he being technically only a "curator"—so inconsistent and anomalous as the attitude of the parliament in our own country. "Ni Moscou ni Pétersbourg n'ont vu une assemblée laïque, telle que le Parlement britannique, légiférer souverainement sur l'Eglise" (p. 197). He has some kindly and sympathetic words to say about that much-abused person, the Russian priest, dwelling upon his laborious life, the great extent of the parish which is under his care, and the privations to which he is subjected. Poor and half educated as he frequently is, he is the consoler of the moujik in his troubles, and the partaker of his joys—as the Irish priest has been in the sister isle; and the peasant might address him in the words of Banim's pathetic song:

"Who, as friend only met,
Soggarth Aroon,
Never did flout me yet,
Soggarth Aroon?
And when my heart was dim,
Gave, while his eye did brim,
What I should give to him,
Soggarth Aroon?"

Of the peasant's feelings for religion as shown in the raskol, M. Leroy-Beaulieu speaks as follows:

"Le raskol n'est point uniquement un symptôme morbide ou un signe de débilité intellectuelle: s'il fait peu d'honneur à l'esprit du peuple russe, il en fait beaucoup à sa conscience, à sa volonté. Au fond de cette nation, si souvent accusée de servilité et de manque de personnalité, les vieux-croyants nous font sentir la vigueur du caractère et le sentiment de devoir qui, non moins que l'intelligence, sont une des forces des nations. Sous la surface terne et plate de la société politique les sectes nous font toucher le fond résistant de ce peuple en apparence inerte; elles nous montrent son originalité, son individualité, son indépendance dans les choses qui lui tiennent à cœur. . . . La révolte d'une notable partie de la nation contre la réforme liturgique suffit à prouver que ce peuple n'est point le troupeau stupide et indifférent que s'est longtemps figuré l'Europe. Il est au moins un terrain où sa conscience s'est émancipée de l'autorité temporelle, et où l'autorité ne peut tout oser."

Our author employs his severest language when speaking of the treatment of the Polish

Roman Catholics by the Russians, and he is hardly less vehement when telling of the measures by which the Uniates under Joseph Siemaszko returned to the Orthodox fold—an event the jubilee of which is now being celebrated.

The concluding chapter, on the position of the Jews in Russian Poland, will be read with much interest. Like Prince Kropotkin, M. Leroy-Beaulieu considers that the dislike of the Russian peasant to the Jew has nothing to do with religious feeling, but is rather opposition to the so-called Kahal, or trade-confederation, by which the moujik believes himself to be exploited. It is to be regretted that, under the rule of Alexander III., some laws which had been passed two centuries ago, impeding the Jews in the practice of their industrial callings, should have been re-enacted. It was found necessary, however, to rescind them as absolute anachronisms.

Some of our readers will be amazed to hear what our author says of the loyalty of the Tsar's Mohammedan subjects:

"Ce qui est vrai c'est que le tsar n'a rien à redouter de ses sujets mahométans, même en cas de conflit avec le Khalife. On l'a bien vu par la dernière guerre d'Orient. Les mosquées appelaient les bénédictions d'Allah sur les armes orthodoxes, et de nombreux irréguliers musulmans combattaient à côté des Cosaques, contre leurs anciens compatriotes tocheresses émigrés en Turquie. Pour ébranler la fidélité des musulmans du Caucase, il faudrait que le Croissant reparût en vainqueur sur leurs montagnes. La Russie est sûre d'eux tant qu'ils croient en sa force."

The same remark probably holds good of our own Mohammedan subjects in India towards our raj.

Half sympathetic as M. Leroy-Beaulieu is with the Orthodox Church, he puts his finger upon many of its unprogressive features; and he justly censures the Russian adherence to the Old Calendar, which, he adds with terrible irony, when they annexed a part of Poland they re-introduced into the country of Copernicus. While speaking of some prominent Russian sectarians, he does not fail to pass under review the writings and opinions of Leo Tolstói, whose works are now creating much sensation in Western Europe. He finds in him a visionary, and his views of the celebrated Russian novelist may be fairly summed up in the formula—what is true is not new, and what is new is not true. M. Leroy-Beaulieu has clearly no enthusiasm for the count's Christian socialism:

"Ce ne sont plus les grands écrivains qui accomplissent les révolutions religieuses. Léon Nikolévitch a peut-être moins de disciples que les apôtres en kaftan ou en touloup."

This eloquent book winds up with an emphatic appeal to the Russians to introduce a system of toleration throughout their dominions. This is the only policy worthy of a great country. Of that country no one has made a more profound study than our author. He has travelled over it, as we gather from his occasional remarks, from Novgorod to Tiflis. He is familiar with its language and literature. The opinions advocated in his book are supported by references to Russian authors, to reviews such as the Russkaga Starina, and many others, with a fulness which shows the widest reading. One statement only, as far as he has noticed, does the writer of this article feel inclined to dispute. M. Leroy-Beaulieu seems to think that the Russians have so amalgamated the Georgian Church with their own that the services in the former are in the Old Slavonic. The present writer, however, has attended Georgian services at Tiflis; and that Russia is not attempting to stifle the Georgian language is shown by the existence of a society for the diffusion of education by means of it, which boasts a very valuable library of MSS. and early printed works.

W. R. MORFILL.

The Home of a Naturalist. By Rev. Biot Edmonston and Jessie M. E. Saxby. (Nisbet.)

AFTER all the exciting narratives and hair-breadth escapes, the hurry and horrors of modern story tellers, the gorgeousness of Ouida, the imaginative intensity of a Rider Haggard, the critic once more breathes calmly and reads in placid happiness when he lights upon such a book as this. He has escaped from the rush and swirl of literature's great river, and is swept for a space into a sunny backwater, among birds, nodding sedges and wild flowers, where he can enjoy to the full the peacefulness of the naturalist's home. It would be intolerable to read this book anywhere but by the hearth in winter, or under the honeysuckle arbour in July heats.

For The Home of a Naturalist is a charming idyll of home and family life. It centres round the writer's father, Laurence Edmonston, M.D., who followed his father "of that ilk's" profession, settling in Baltasund, Unst, the most northerly island of the Shetland group, and for some fifty years ministering, often in considerable danger from winds and waves, to the illnesses and accidents of a large surrounding district of sea and land. Probably his was a "practice" unique in the kingdom. God-fearing and kindly, devoted to his profession, and, if possible, still more attached to nature—to the wild prospects obtainable from his native cliffs, and to every living creature that ran, flew, or crawled—with an intense love of home and his own domestic circle, Dr. Edmonston, in his secluded isle, lived worthily a useful life, and well deserved the touching record of it which his children have given to the world. Apart from the other interests of the book—and they are many—it is always advantageous that it should be known how good men in retirement, often in comparative solitude, can and do walk the daily round of duty among us—it may be amid the manifold discomforts of a rigorous climate—and yet leave mankind distinctly the better for their presence. Scotland has the honour of having produced many such admirable characters. They are not heroes, judged by the world's standard. Perhaps they are something better—the salt of the earth.

The glimpses of family life which we can catch in this book, set in the constant roar of northern seas, are delightful. It is easy to follow the history of the children through the amusements and not seldom the perils of boyhood until they seek the larger world beyond their loved Hjalmland. So, too, with the girls. In due time "fremit" folk seek the islands as doctors, scientific men, or what not. One by one they marry these, and the original home becomes too straight for them. The much-regretted ornithologist who married Mrs. Saxby will live by his excellent book, The Birds of Shetland. In addition, we soon learn to know many of the quaint characters to which seclusion invariably gives birth, thanks to the literary skill of the writers. Ingath and Osla, with their very different wooings, the devoted servants of the doctor's family, Mam-Willa, the sick nurse, the sensible yet almost prophetic Kirsty, undisciplined Gonga, coy Osla, and Magnus Anderson, the udaller's son, form a pleasant group of singularly original minds. Then the pets—ponies, dogs, cats, birds, innumerable, and yet each with its well-known identity—these are by no means forgotten. Beyond even the wide horizon of the Shetlands, passing at will into the spiritual world, lies a curious and tricky nation of Trows. Mrs. Saxby has evidently had many uncanny dealings with these, and describes them with some particularity. They are not English fairies, nor yet Norwegian Trolls; but they possess something of the merriment of the one with the mischievous, sometimes the malignant, nature of the other, while the melancholy seas and drifting fogs of the Shetlands have imparted to them characteristics of their own. So cleverly are they portrayed here that we feel inclined to "sain" ourselves in writing of them by crossing two pens upon the table, the nearest approach to plucking two straws from an Orkney family's store, and laying them in the form of a cross at the "steggie." One or two famous tunes among the islanders had been learnt from Trows. Occasionally, Trows, dressed for the most part in grey, are seen peeping and peering about the houses. These unfortunates are "daybound"—i.e., have been surprised by sunrise, and are, therefore, compelled to stay upon the earth till sunset.

The chapters connected with legendary and folklore and most of the descriptive writing of the volume belong to Mrs. Saxby. Her brother is responsible for the adventures and for many pleasant accounts of the natural history of the islands. Some of these papers have been published in magazines, but they now naturally fall into one complete whole. There is an adventure in cliff-climbing which makes the blood run cold, and another on a desert island which was within an ace of terminating fatally. The account of the seals common round the islands and of the Arctic skua's habits is a useful contribution to the Northern fauna. It is tempting to enlarge on the superstitions connected with the "deathrig," or tell the tale of the skipper of the fishing boat who caught a mermaid. Besides these, the manner in which Shetland women once kept a secret, and have ever since been allotted the place of honour at the table, ought also to be named; but readers will be pleased to find out these and many other delightful anecdotes for themselves. It is sad to think that the primal freshness of native manners and many of the quaint customs and beliefs of the islanders are fast dying out before steamboats, tourists, and telegraphs. Still the old home of King Olaf and Earl Rognvald, of Harold Sigurdson and Queen Ellesif—above all, of holy Earl Magnus—has left not a few curious memories for the authors of this book to blend with their pleasing delineation of a modern naturalist's home.

When the inevitable separations of death fall upon the happy family at Balta Sound Mrs. Saxby touches upon them with pathos, to which the healing touch of time has brought a thankful resignation. As we close the book the best compliment to pay the writers' vivid descriptive powers is to tell them that in some previous state of existence we seem to have been well acquainted with the good Dr. Edmonston, his long-suffering wife, the troublesome "bairns," their numberless pets, and specially the dogs. Certainly they are now inscribed for many a day on our list of friends.

M. G. WATKINS.

Essays, Religious, Social, Political. By David Atwood Wasson, with a Biographical Sketch by O. B. Frothingham. (Boston, U.S.: Lee & Shepard.)

READERS of the Atlantic Monthly and of those American periodicals which represent one phase and another of free religious ideas, such as the Christian Examiner, the Index, and the Radical, have long been familiar with the name of David Atwood Wasson; and the present volume is sure to be welcomed by them. It deserves a welcome also from other persons who, if they have no particular sympathy with Mr. Wasson's religious and political opinions, may well be interested in the sterling character of the man himself.

The book consists of a biographical sketch by Mr. Frothingham and of eight essays on various subjects by Mr. Wasson. Mr. Frothingham's portion of the work possesses the usual merits of his biographies of transcendentalists—clearness and a sympathetic appreciation. His memoir is just what such a sketch should be, and might almost be said to be perfect but for one small fault. It is a fault which he shares with perhaps three-fourths of the writers of essays and biographies in the present day. I mean the over use of the word "charming," and its variations. Mr. Wasson was a "charming" conversationalist. He was himself "charmed" by the old English poets, but moral beauty "charms" him most. His autobiography is "charming," and the days Mr. Frothingham spent with him were "charming." The essays seem to have been well selected so as to indicate Mr. Wasson's opinion and method. If there had been a few more, all the better, but perhaps another volume will follow.

Mr. Wasson began life in the arid desert of Calvinism. Religion, as he knew it in his childhood, was "ugly, hard, cold"—"a disagreeable old-folks' affair; a hateful necessity which one must endure when he could no longer help doing so." If the children frolicked and laughed after they had gone to bed, his stepmother—an excellent woman in her way—would check them with, "Hush, children! how dare you be laughing when you may die before morning?" In the "charming" fragment of autobiography which Mr. Frothingham prints, Mr. Wasson says:

"All that should have invited my being to spiritual expansion only served to shut me up to a war with my own heart. I can only thank God that for a while I had the courage to defy the preacher and be cheerfully 'irreligious.' I was a hardy little pagan, and this alone saved me. I did not think enough about Master Calvin's God to hate Him too bitterly, nor, on the other hand, to make a little hypocrite of myself and pretend, even to myself, that I loved Him. Thanks to the strong cheery nature that sang her own tunes in my blood long enough to drown the preacher's lugubrious drone. The pall might fall down around my soul at night, but the morning came, and the dear old pagan, unregenerate, incorrigible sun shone, and I, pagan and incorrigible also, danced out of bed, and took to life as nature would have me" (pp. 12-13).

Mr. Wasson describes vividly, and with some humour, the one occasion when he came near to being "converted." A "revival" had taken place, and he, in common with others, was impressed. So powerfully were his emotions aroused that, though he had some strong notions that, under the Calvinistic method, he was more sinned against by the higher powers than himself a sinner, he humbled himself to pray for pity and forgiveness. He confidently expected that some great change indicating "conversion" would straightway take place within him, but nothing happened; and the shame he felt at the part he had played led to a reaction. He never was "converted" in the Calvinistic sense.

Another burden of Wasson's childhood was work. He was not naturally indolent, but the unceasing toil demanded by his father was hateful to him. Laziness, in his father's eyes, was "the sin of sins," and everything short of desperate energy was laziness. So the boy had no leisure; for every spare moment some task was found, if only driving a "swarm" of hogs. He "mentally" sent the hogs "to the devil." But this inward swearing must have been a poor outlet for his overwrought feelings; and he dared not to say "devil" profanely "since that too was a kind of 'taking God's name in vain,' the Calvinistic devil being a deity with the bar sinister."

Mr. Wasson had a large store of combativeness in his nature. He was a warlike youth, and his willingness to do battle ended disastrously. When he was about seventeen years old he received, in a wrestling match, a spinal injury which made him a partial cripple for the remainder of his life, and for some years at the close he was nearly blind. After several experiments he chose the ministry as his profession. In 1851 he was "ordained pastor of an Evangelical church at Groveland, Mass.," but he did not abide there long. Calvinism was still in his way. He preached against it and was cast out. Theodore Parker and Mr. Thomas Wentworth Higginson helped him onward. He succeeded to the pulpit, or rather the platform, of the former, passed into Unitarianism and partly out of it again over the question of a creed, and finally found his spiritual home in a kind of liberated Unitarianism akin to the American "Free Religious Association."

Of Mr. Wasson's writings his biographer says that they "show rare insight, grace, and capacity"—an opinion which readers of the select pieces in this volume or of his many other excellent essays will approve. His style is clear, crisp, incisive, and reveals—in Mr. Frothingham's phrase—"a nice ear for the music of words." He was a man of clear convictions, which he often expressed strongly. He had a reason for the faith that was in him and was free from prejudice. His opinions had been well weighed and carefully tested, and naturally commanded respect even where they failed to secure assent. Mr. Frothingham sums up his character thus:

"He extracted the soul of good from things evil if anybody ever did. . . . He was no dreamer or mystic or exalted devotee; but a critic, a scholar, an enquirer, all the time that he was a believer. . . . Solitary, unknown, without fame, holding many unpopular opinions, in sympathy neither with orthodox nor liberal, seeing his pet ideas rejected by the generation he loved, out of bearing with the democratic spirit of the age, he waited and watched, having unwavering belief in the ideas themselves." "He was a man of strong feelings, running all the way from love to hatred." "His conscience was inflexible. . . . The one thing worth recording was his constancy of soul, his invariable sweetness, his cheerful courage." "Veracity, it may be said, was his distinguishing trait" (pp. 63-4, 68, 69, 122).

His high courage is manifested in the outspoken expression of his convictions, and still more in the cheerful endurance of his life-long martyrdom. The present volume is acceptable as a memorial of a valiant soul.

I HAVE not read any of Mr. Masterman's previous novels, but there can be no hesitation in saying that The Scotts of Bestminster is one of the most satisfactory stories published for a long time. It is not that there are any distinct flashes of genius in it, but the narrative all through maintains a high level of interest and ability. One is in danger of becoming jaded with fiction when so many writers can travel only in conventional grooves, or ring the changes upon certain specific forms of villainy; but it is quite refreshing to meet with a writer who captivates us by his descriptive talent and power of character-drawing. This Mr. Masterman does from the opening to the close of his story; and his sketches of Anglo-Indian life are evidently produced at first hand. The journey of the sick officer, Captain Scott, and his wife and infant, through the length of Hindustan to the coast, is a most touching incident, and powerfully told; but it is almost equalled by the account of the life of the castaways of the Elephanta, who have been wrecked on a stretch of volcanic rocks in the Indian Ocean. There they set up a little colony, suffering great hardships, and buoying each other up with hopes that for a long time are only doomed to disappointment. There is one brave, tender, and self-denying English officer who would have wound his way into Thackeray's heart. It may be doubted, however, whether Commissioners' wives ever furnished so vulgar a caricature as the author has represented in Mrs. Smith, whose woes only provoke immoderate laughter. But there are other characters who are not one whit exaggerated—including a self-conscious M.P., a country solicitor and electioneering agent, and a noble and simple-hearted brother of the hero. The two heroines—for such we regard Mrs. Scott and Mary Latimer—are admirable creations, quite as well drawn as any of the men. A strain of deep pathos is reached in the chapter entitled "The Bride of the Sea"; and, indeed, it may be said that every part of this novel is thoroughly and conscientiously worked out. The Westminster election furnishes some amusing passages. One party strenuously endeavours to range Capt. Scott upon its side, but he will persist "in admiring both Beaconsfield and Gladstone. He called the one imagination, the other mind, and said both were necessary to keep the balance sure. So far, and no farther, could he be got to express himself." Some minor objections might be taken. For example, the title seems scarcely appropriate when quite two-thirds of the action takes place out of the British Islands. Nor is it the fact that every verse of a certain beautiful lyric by Mrs. Hemans has for its refrain the words, "Restore the dead, thou sea." Only the last verse concludes thus.

An Irish Cousin is a very clever story, and eminently readable withal. But in the opening pages there is quite a phenomenal amount of killing off, until the authors have sacrificed almost the whole of the relatives of their charming heroine, Theodora Sarsfield. Theodora is brought up in the United States, where, by the time she is two-and-twenty, she has only one American relative left, an Aunt Jane, with whom she does not get on well. She consequently resolves to visit her father's old home at Durrus, county Cork, now held by her Uncle Dominick, who, with his son Willy, are her only other relations in the world. The real story opens at this place, and the authors show the minutest familiarity with Ireland and the Irish people. Of course, there is a tender element of considerable prominence. "Cousin Willy" and the son of the O'Neill both fall violently in love with the bewitching Américaine, and there is a good deal of trouble before matters finally adjust themselves. Uncle Dominick is very anxious for his son and niece to marry, and thus keep the property together; for the fact is that he has "played it very low" indeed on his dead brother, whose estate he has long unjustly enjoyed. His remorse becomes so poignant that at length he suffocates himself in an Irish bog, which is an effectual, if not an aesthetic, settlement of his personal difficulties. Among the amusing readings of Irish character is one to the effect that "nothing so much compels the respect and admiration of the Irish peasant as the rare astuteness that can outwit him." We are introduced to an Irish officer, who, when his militia regiment was ordered to Aldershot, said he was "the first of his ancestors that was ever sent on foreign service." This is really a successful novel.

The incidents in Off with the Old Love take place partly in New York and partly in Switzerland. There are two heroes, two heroines, and a consumptive Frenchman, who would have qualified for a third hero if death had not put him out of the running. Besides these there are several racy American characters. Captain Stopford desires to marry Lessie Leigh; but there is an old love in the way in the shape of Lady Lawlor, whom he had known as Miss Kate Pemberton, but whom he had foolishly registered as his wife at a New York hotel some years before in order to save her reputation. He does not really care for Lady Lawlor; but she still indulges a passion for him, and swears that he shall never be married to anyone else. She endeavours to make it appear that she is really Stopford's wife, and that her marriage with Sir George Lawlor was null and void; but the plot fails, and Stopford and Lessie are ultimately united. There is not much literary merit in the story, but it is amusing reading, especially in the Yankee passages. Dana, the American artist, is perhaps the best of all the characters, being manly, brave, and self-sacrificing.

Those who love a mystery will find one to their liking in The Piccadilly Puzzle. This latest example of the "shilling shocker" deals with a murder which completely baffles the noted detective Dowker. Four persons are in turn suspected of being the perpetrator, and it is only by a kind of accident that the real criminal is at length revealed. Perhaps, with so much sensation in so small a compass, the reader will not trouble about graces of style; but if he does he will not find them.

Tempted is, as the author describes it, only an episode, but it is one bearing valuable lessons for the youth of both sexes who are just setting out upon life's pilgrimage. Of two bosom friends at a Scotch university, who are both in love with the same girl, one, Graham Reid, uses a purloined paper at a critical examination, and thereby dishonestly obtains a valuable bursary over the head of his abler and more deserving comrade. The act subsequently causes him great remorse, and he is not happy in life until he has made a clean breast of his temptation and his sin. After he has done this, everything assumes a brighter aspect; and ultimately he becomes Sir Graham Reid, the fashionable doctor, who attended royalty on occasion, and on whom her Majesty had bestowed a baronetcy. But we are glad to know that he remembered the poor in the East End in his high estate.

The chief object of A Child of Japan, which is the story of one Yone Sauto, is to set forth the character and personality of a Japanese girl of the present day, and to exhibit the social and moral conditions by which she is surrounded in case she attempts to participate in the rapid intellectual development of her people. The heroine is naturally refined and sensitive in character, and there is many a touch of pathos in her delineation, as well as in the account of her sad and premature death. Mr. House, who is evidently familiar with Japanese life and customs, has decided views respecting the treatment which Western Powers ought to mete out to Japan. His ideas, as expounded at the close of this little volume, are well worthy of consideration.

Grandison Mather is an anagram formed out of "Thomas Gardiner," and the story bearing this title relates the fortunes and misfortunes of a young couple who lost their entire fortune soon after marriage. After much tribulation, the husband develops into a successful author, while his wife makes an equally brilliant mark in the musical world. The story is bright, fresh, and interesting.

At the Eleventh Hour is not to be read at the twelfth, except by those who have nerves strong enough for such midnight reading. Murder, the Morgue, and the Nihilists have all a place in this novelette; and he who reads it will have no reason to complain of lack of sensation. If one were inclined to be hypercritical, the suggestion offers that a little of the sensation might have been exchanged with advantage for a little more literary talent.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Father Damien: a Journey from Cashmere to his Home in Hawaii. By Edward Clifford. (Macmillan.) The name of the Apostle to the Lepers has been in almost every mouth of late; and this little book, mainly reprinted from the Nineteenth Century, will confirm and extend the report of his saintly life and heroic death. Mr. Clifford writes well; and, while preserving his own right of private judgment in matters theological, bears hearty testimony to the Church of Rome as a producer of saints. Part of the charm of the book indeed resides in the fact that it is a tribute from a strong Protestant to an equally strong Catholic. Mr. Clifford's object is not only to celebrate the self-denying virtues of Father Damien, but to urge the necessity of further aid for the lepers of India and elsewhere. The frontispiece is a reproduction of a really charming drawing, in which Mr. Clifford has shown the earnest and sympathetic profile of the young priest in 1868, before his face of hope and devotion had become furrowed by care, and ridged and disfigured by the dreadful disease which brought him to a leper's death.

The Story of William and Lucy Smith. Edited by George S. Merriam. (Blackwood.) The author of Thorndale and Gravenhurst can hardly be said to have proved himself "a man of genius," as his biographer supposes; but at any rate he was the possessor of superior talent, which he used faithfully. He did a considerable amount of good, if not of lasting work, as thinker and critic. The best of him, however, was not in his public work, but in his personality: he was greater as a man than as a writer. It is well that his story, and that of his admirable wife, should be given to the world. The present volume is made up chiefly of memoirs, written by Lucy Smith, and of letters. Mr. Merriam's duty as "editor" was to arrange the whole, and to provide the connecting links, which he has done carefully, and with considerable skill. His weak point is that he is too sentimental, and he overstates. For instance, the articles contributed during the years from 1839 to 1871 to Blackwood's Magazine were, for the most part, good; but they do not call for such a high-flown description as this: "Scattered through the endless numbers of the magazine, his articles are to the readers of the present day like carbon dispersed through a coal bed: condensed and crystallised, they would have yielded a diamond" (p. 106). Mr. Merriam uses such words as "carefree," "joyous," "troublesome"; he is too lavish with superlatives; he is continually in an ecstasy, and his language is gushing and sometimes bombastic. Of criticism and the critical spirit there is none. Moreover, the work is too elaborate. If all the material that is here had been "condensed and crystallised" by a judicious person into a biographical sketch, it would have been better both for the reading world and for the memories of the two worthies of whom it treats.

Joseph Rogers, M.D.: Reminiscences of a Workhouse Medical Officer. Edited by Prof. Thorold Rogers. (Fisher Unwin.) These reminiscences are autobiographical; but Dr. Rogers died before they had passed through the press, and the task of editing them thus devolved upon his brother, Prof. Rogers. They have probably gained rather than lost by the change of editorship, for the preface sums up the life-work of the doctor—"one of incessant devotion to a noble object"—in terms which command respectful attention. The object which Dr. Rogers set before him was to improve the condition of workhouse inmates, to check reckless and unwise expenditure, and to secure for his own profession better treatment than it had been wont to receive. Naturally, he was brought into frequent collision with boards of guardians; and the accounts which he gives of these administrative bodies—their incompetence, ignorance, greed, and insolence—are lifelike, but distinctly unpleasant in detail. There was a certain degree of heroism displayed by him in the resolute manner with which he strove to do his duty in spite of official opposition of every kind. The Poor Law Board sometimes proved as deaf to reason as the guardians, and the Local Government Board occasionally exhibited a tenderness towards mismanagement and misconduct for which it is not difficult to account. It is gratifying to find that one result of Dr. Rogers's bold line of action was a genuine reform in workhouse administration, which he himself lived to witness. That it has not yet proceeded so far as he and others desired is likely enough, for abuses die hard; and what we learn of some of the metropolitan workhouses through this book shows that a Hercules is needed for the Augean task—a Hercules as resolute as Dr. Rogers and as indifferent to obloquy. As a history of the advance that has been made towards securing proper care for the sick poor, this volume is valuable; and as the record of a public man who fearlessly discharged his duties in circumstances of great difficulty, it cannot fail to be interesting.

The Story of Thomas Carlyle. By A. S. Arnold. (Ward & Downey.) Two favourable things can be said of this book and of its author. He takes the right view of Carlyle; and he supplies his readers with everything that is historically true about his hero, and with a good deal also that, being based on Sartor Resartus and other literature of a quasi-autobiographical character, is, to some extent, mythical, or mere hearsay. But Mr. Arnold's style is fearfully and wonderfully irritating. One comes every second page or so on an over-shot phrase like "grim tremendous earnestness," and "mighty soul." Anyone who is acquainted with the truth both as to Carlyle's temperament and as to his life cannot but be amused to read this account of one of his Edinburgh experiences.

"His soul was attacked with demons of doubt, darkness, and scorn unutterable. Manfully, like old Bunyan of old, he determined to take the devil by the horns, to conquer or die. Then arose, gaunt and awful, Giant Fear, the worst of all enemies. Before his fury Carlyle bowed, then bent down almost to the earth, exhausted with mental and physical sufferings." This "Story of Thomas Carlyle" needs, when taken, to be well shaken.

Literary Workers, or Pilgrims to the Temple. By J. G. Hargreaves. (Longmans.) The mantle of Isaac Disraeli has apparently fallen upon the shoulders of Mr. Hargreaves, whose common-place books must already rival those of his long-lived predecessor in number and variety. We have not come across Mr. Hargreaves's other published works, but we learn that he is the author of two books with stupendous titles—viz., Possibilities of Creation; or, What the World might have been, and Blunders of Vice and Folly. Yet he is only lately entered upon that pilgrimage towards the Temple of Fame which, more often than not, leads through misfortune to final disappointment. Encumbered as he is with such superabundant matter, he can scarcely be the vacuus viator whom he describes as singing merrily on starting for "the radiant eminence." Out of his vast stores he brings forth anecdote after anecdote, bearing more or less directly upon the literary career; and, though we could hardly conceive any book more indigestible than this if swallowed whole, a bite, now and then taken, may be pleasant to the taste of many. The waiting-rooms of doctors and dentists need a literature of their own; Mr. Hargreaves's volume is a valuable contribution to it. It is almost impossible to give a specimen of its contents; but, opening the book at hazard, we find that on two pages the author quotes from Galileo, Daub, Coleridge, Milton, Krieff, and Bishop Cumberland, while there are allusions to Charles Lamb, Lord Monboddo, Homer, and Sophocles. There is, therefore, plenty of variety, and, we may add, some humour in this well-printed and well-indexed volume. A few of the stories are spoilt in the telling by the writer's prolixity; but there is not one of them that might not be read aloud in the strictest family circle. So far, therefore, Mr. Hargreaves need have no apprehension of the result of that "great post-mortem" to which, in common with other "children of genius," he is looking forward.

Shakespeare's Funeral, and other Papers. By Sir Edward Hamley. (Blackwood.) Of most of the papers comprised in this volume we may say, as the author himself says of Mr. Hayward's essays, that there is nothing greatly to distinguish them from a number of other essays and reviews written anonymously in excellent English. They have appeared before in the shape of contributions to periodicals, and served their purpose well. Their republication is not a matter of great importance to the public, nor, we should think, of much additional profit to the author. Perhaps the essay which most deserves attention is that entitled "False Coin in Poetry." In it Sir E. Hamley criticises with severity some of the most popular passages in English poetry, and asserts that their popularity is not due to intrinsic excellence, but to the glamour of a great name, or the blind following of indiscriminate admirers. He takes as an example Wordsworth's "Laodamia"—a piece which has found a place in most collections of "Gems of Poetry," and which even so severe a critic as Matthew Arnold has selected as a favourable specimen of the poet's dramatic power.

"But no chorus of praise," says Sir Edward, "should render us insensible to the fact that in this case Wordsworth has but shared the general fate of those who deal with matters uncongenial.

The very first verse labours, and labours in vain—

“‘With sacrifice, before the rising morn’
(why ‘rising’ morn? Morn itself signifies the rising of the day, and the phrase might therefore be paraphrased, ‘the rising rising of the day’).”

“‘Performed, my slaughtered lord have I required;
And in thick darkness, amid shades forlorn,
Him of the infernal gods have I desired.’”

“Was ever expression more wooden? How the joints of the verse creak! . . . how laboured the lines; how prosaic ‘performed,’ ‘required,’ and ‘desired’; and how abominable ‘my slaughtered lord’! a phrase suggestive of the knacker’s yard rather than of the death of a hero devoting himself to his cause, and slain in fighting valiantly with Hector.”

Captious as some of these remarks are, we agree in the main with the estimate of the poem; but when Sir Edward proceeds to dissect Portia’s praise of mercy, and tells us that we are all wrong in admiring its beauty and appropriateness, we are fain to say, “Errare malo cum Platone, quam cum istis recte sentire.”

A Summer in a Dutch Country House. By Mrs. Arthur Traherne. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.) Mrs. Traherne’s book is a little Anglo-Dutch idyll. Her heroine, an English orphan, visits some Dutch relations who are living their simple life in a chateau, appropriately named Lindendaal. There the young English lady has to endure a certain amount of teasing, and to learn the inevitable lesson that the exploits of her countrymen are not always viewed with the same eyes abroad as at home. But she is sensible, and accommodates herself without great difficulty to the orderly tranquil life around her, and its unexciting pleasures. Mrs. Traherne shows the economy, the precision, the domestic pre-occupation of Dutch life. She is not equally happy in bringing out the peculiar quality and charm of Dutch scenery. The heroine, after a slight misunderstanding, commits her fate to the keeping of a Dutch lover, who is more remarkable for his sterling qualities than for an engaging exterior. A Summer in a Dutch Country House is pleasant, but conventional. It affords no particular insight into Dutch character, and there is a want of local colour.

May in Anjou. By Eleanor C. Price. (Edinburgh: David Douglas.) May in Anjou—which the writer insists is the true May of Chaucer and of our early English poets, and gave us a literary tradition of that month not always corresponding to the facts—furnishes the title to a collection of descriptive papers of Anjou and Touraine. These essays have been published before in the Spectator and Graphic, but were worth reprinting for a certain finish and elegance. Those devoted to Anjou break newer ground, and Miss Price depicts certain aspects of the old life before the Revolution with some vividness. In the chateaux of Touraine she takes the reader through more familiar fields.

The Co-operative Traveller Abroad. By Edward Owen Greening. (Arthur Standing). Mr. Greening went on a holiday trip to France in company with some other zealous co-operators, and he thought it worth while to relate his experiences to the readers of the Co-operative News. The papers have now been gathered together, and form an exceedingly readable little volume. To co-operators, as Mr. Greening says in his preface, “industrial co-operation means a great deal more than a matter of business. It means even more than the purification of business. It is to us a living faith and a principle.” This is exemplified in the tone of the present volume. The ordinary man of business is willing, nay anxious, to throw business aside altogether when he takes his holiday trip. Not so Mr. Greening. He is a co-operator in his work and a co-operator in his hours of relaxation. When he travels through France he looks at all objects through his co-operative glasses. This, of course, is what gives its distinctive value to his book. Plenty of people can describe France, with more or less skill, in its general aspect; but it requires the special experience and understanding and also the enthusiasm of a man like Mr. Greening to reveal France in its co-operative aspect. Naturally, the chief interest of the work centres round the chapters which discuss M. Godin and his society at Guise. A full description is given of this interesting establishment and of its founder, who, at the time of Mr. Greening’s visit, was still alive. The success of one such undertaking is no guarantee of like success elsewhere; but at the present time, when English co-operators are making a new, or at least a more definite, departure in the direction of co-operative production, and are trying to set their existing co-operative shopkeeping on a truer basis, the successful efforts which have been made elsewhere, even if local and partial only, deserve the closest study. What is the proper relation between labour and capital? To this question we need a quieter and at the same time more practical answer than the Socialistic shriek—Down with capital! Hitherto capital has been accustomed to employ labour with no very satisfactory results, as far as labour is concerned. Hereafter, perhaps, labour will come to employ capital. This, at least, seems at present to be the direction the movement is taking; and nothing can be more important for a proper understanding of the point than the light which such an experiment as that of Godin, and the equally significant, if less notorious, experiment of Leclaire, can throw upon it. Mr. Greening has something to tell us about Leclaire also. “Association, accumulation, intelligent and honest direction,” are justly described as the essentials of a successful industrial undertaking. When these are secured “the profits of human labour suffice, without charity, to provide those who work with complete insurance against the evils and dangers of life” (p. 233). These were secured in the societies of Godin and Leclaire. The problem, not for co-operators only, but for all persons interested in social well-being, is how to secure them under somewhat altered conditions, when the services of such “beneficent autocrats” as Godin and Leclaire are not obtainable. Mr. Greening’s book is written in the pleasantest style throughout, and contains, in addition to his co-operative records, plenty of shrewd observations on men and manners.

The latest addition to Bohn’s Library (Bell) is Arthur Young’s Travels in France, a book more talked about than read, and more valued in France than in this country. No better editor for it could have been found than Miss M. Betham-Edwards, whose intimate knowledge of the present condition of rural France has enabled her to draw a series of most instructive contrasts in her Introduction. She also contributes a Life of Arthur Young, which is more detailed than any which we remember to have seen elsewhere, for it is based upon his own diary and other family papers which have been placed at her disposal by his grandson, the present owner of Bradfield. The book is also adorned with a portrait of the author for frontispiece. Miss Betham-Edwards comments upon the fact that it appears just one hundred years after Arthur Young finished his third and last journey in France. It also seems worthy of note that it appears in the very month when the Board of Agriculture is resuscitated, of which Arthur Young was the first secretary.

Egypt under Ismail. By J. C. McCoan. (Chapman & Hall.) In 1882, Baron de

Malortie gave us a book on Egypt entirely composed of quotations. Mr. McCoan tells us that he has “winnowed whatever has seemed to him trustworthy and of any permanent interest.” Both books are compilations rather than works of originality, but neither is devoid of interest. The book before us deals exclusively with the reign of Ismail, and closes with his deposition by a telegram just ten years ago. In a brief epilogue, Mr. McCoan glances at “the nerveless indecision” which has discredited our rule in Egypt under the Tewfik régime, and looks forward to the coming partition of Turkey, when Egypt will of necessity fall to England. “If,” says his concluding sentence, “the misrule of Ismail has hastened our entry on this inheritance, for that we and the Egyptian people may forgive him much.” In justice to our author we ought to add that “we” does not include the bondholders, in whose interest this book is not written.

Leon Roch: a Romance. By B. Perez Galdós. From the Spanish by Clara Bell. In 2 vols. (New York: Gottsberger; London: Tribner.) This is a translation of one of the most striking of Perez Galdós’s “Spanish Contemporary Novels,” La Familia de Leon Roch. The theme is the hypocrisy and bigotry of the extreme ultramontane party in the Romish Church, and the unnatural character of the modern saint, the product and ideal of their teaching. The hero, Leon Roch—a scientific sceptic, but of the highest moral integrity—marries into a devout aristocratic family, all of whom, with the exception of his wife and her twin brother, who are examples of the typical sanctity of the day, are hypocrites, but none the less bigots of the deepest dye. Along with this, as in nearly all Galdós’s stories, there is a merciless exposure of the vices and corruption of the higher employés; and among them all, with the exception of an Italian priest, sincere in his mischievous mysticism, Leon Roch is the only honest man. But, because of his opinions, and in spite of his own toleration, he is insulted by every one, driven to a separation from his wife, and his whole life ruined by the slanders and impure imaginations of those who cannot conceive of the existence of virtue outside the church. It is a powerfully drawn picture, but too uniform in its sombre colouring. It depicts a society in which we should hate to live, and which it is not altogether pleasant even to read about. No foreigner could have dared to delineate such scenes; and in closing the book the reader asks himself: Can such things really be? The translation is well done, and reads pleasantly. There are a few slips: largo, “long” (vol. i. 149) is translated “broad,” in describing the hands of one dying of consumption. In vol. ii. 212 the telling Latin word transit is left untranslated, and the whole passage is confused.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. announce a volume of singular interest—The Uncollected Writings of Thomas De Quincey. This will contain a large amount of matter (much of it copyright) not to be found in any edition of the author’s works, British or American. It includes some essays and stories intended for republication by de Quincey himself, which he did not live to include in Selections Grave and Gay. The book will contain a prefatory note and annotations by Mr. James Hogg, who was intimately associated with De Quincey while he was occupied with the revision of his works.

We understand that Prof. Edward Dowden is well advanced with his History of Modern English Literature, for Macmillan’s four-volume work. Mr. Stopford Brooke has made some progress with the first volume, but it will be the last of the four to appear. The two central volumes, by Mr. Saintsbury and Mr. Gosse, have been long out.

MR. GEORGE MEREDITH has written a new poem of English country life—a satire upon religious excess of the Salvation Army type—which will appear in an early number of The Universal Review.

MESSRS. ISBISTER will publish immediately Mary Howitt: an Autobiography, edited by her daughter, with portraits and numerous illustrations, in two vols.; and The Life of Sir Richard Steele, by George A. Aitken, with portraits, also in two vols. Both books will be issued at the same time by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., of Philadelphia.

MESSRS. ISBISTER have also in preparation new works by the Bishop of Peterborough, the Dean of Gloucester, Archdeacon Farrar, and Francis Peck; and for their Home Library: Glimpses of Europe, edited by W. C. Procter; The Story of Chemistry, by Harold Picton; and We Three, by the author of "Worth a Three-penny Bit." They will also publish in September Proverbs, Sayings, and Comparisons in various Languages, collected and arranged by James Middlemore; and the yearly volumes of Good Words and the Sunday Magazine will be issued as usual in November.

A Memory of Edward Thring, by the Rev. J. H. Skrine, will shortly be issued by Messrs. Macmillan. Mr. Skrine was first a boy, and in later years, an assistant master at Uppingham, and in both capacities knew the distinguished head master intimately.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK is engaged making a facsimile of the first edition of Bunyan's Country Rhymes, which has recently been discovered and acquired by the British Museum. The Rev. John Brown, of Bedford—the latest biographer of Bunyan—will furnish an introduction, giving the history of the little volume.

A NEW story by the author of Mehalah—who now acknowledges himself as the Rev. S. Baring Gould—will be issued this year by Messrs. Blackie & Son, the theme being that of the Icelandic Saga of Grettir the Strong. It should have more than the ordinary interest of being merely a good fighting story for boys, inasmuch as the author some years ago made a visit to the scenes referred to in the Saga. The illustrations are to be by Herr Zeno Diemer—a German artist specially selected for this work by Mr. Baring Gould himself.

MR. G. A. HENTY has this season availed himself of the renewed and more minute interest taken of late years in the details of the American Civil War; and his story, With Lee in Virginia, is an endeavour to present the case of the South in its most attractive and romantic light. A second story by Mr. Henty—By Pike and Dyke—deals with the Revolt of the Netherlands, covering in story form the ground taken up historically by Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic. Messrs. Blackie & Son will be the publishers of both these books.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will shortly publish two new novels: Mrs. Bob, by John Strange Winter, in two vols., and Mount Eden, by Florence Marryat, in three vols.

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co. will publish immediately Historic Oddities and Strange Events, by the Rev. S. Baring Gould, first series; and Ballads of the Brave: Poems of Chivalry, Enterprise, Courage and Constancy, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, selected and arranged by Frederick Langbridge, with notes.

My Friend the Bloodhound, by Mr. Percy Lindley, illustrated by Mr. Herbert Dicksee, is in the press. The training of the bloodhound for use in the detection of crime, and for war purposes, in auxiliary sentinel, despatch, and ammunition-carrying work, is specially dealt with. The illustrations are reproductions of wash and pen-and-ink drawings from the life, and include portraits of typical champion hounds.

MESSRS. OLIPHANT, ANDERSON, & FERRIER'S announcements for the new season include: Sheila, a story by Annie S. Swan; The Luck of the House, a new novel in two vols., by Adeline Seageant, and a cheaper edition of Seventy Times Seven, by the same author; Kilgirvie, by Robina F. Hardy; Kate and Jean: the History of two Young and Independent Spinsters, by Jessie M. E. Saxby; Barbara Leybourne: a Story of Eighty Years Ago, by Sarah Selina Hamer; Lally Letham's Will: a Tale of the Great City, by A. Rycroft Taylor; and cheap editions of Robinson Crusoe and the Pilgrim's Progress, with numerous illustrations. In religious literature: Manliness, and other Sermons, by the late Hugh Stowell Brown, with a preface by Dr. Alexander Maclaren; Life's Stages: their Duties and Opportunities, by Rev. James Stark.

THE Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company announce two new books for next month from the pen of the Rev. James J. Ellis, of Richmond—Harness for a Pair, a story, and Messages of Christ, a series of addresses.

MR. THOMAS J. WISE has issued the first part of his Bibliography of the Writings in Prose and Verse of John Ruskin, LL.D. That it is on Dutch hand-made paper and printed, with wide margins, in Clay's best style follows as a matter of course, as old sharers of Mr. Wise's former extravagances know. But they seem to like it; for the 250 subscribers, to whom the issue was limited, were found privately in eight days. The editor says he hopes to finish his task in eight parts; but this is plainly impossible, as the Seven Lamps and the Poems alone take twenty-nine and a half pages. On this scale—and it is the right one—the work must run to sixteen or twenty parts. It certainly ought so to do; and so well is it started, with such admirable completeness and care, that we are sure no Ruskin lover will grudge the increased price for such a record of his master's work. The only additional bit of information we can give on this Part I. is, that the "little girl" for whom The King of the Golden River was originally written was Effie Gray, one of the daughters of a Perth lawyer, who is now Lady Millais.

PROF. F. J. CHILD, of Harvard, has just issued part vi. of his magnificent edition of The English and Scottish Popular Ballads. It contains thirty-three old favourites like "Durham Field," "The Battle of Otterbourne," "The Hunting of the Cheviot," "The Rose of England," "Sir Andrew Barton," "Flodden Field," "Johnie Armstrong," "The Rising in the North," "Captain Cor," "The Laird of Logie," "Kinmont Willie," "Jock o' the Side," and so on. It is edited with that loving care, that wide research, and that wealth of illustration from other country's ballads, which have distinguished all the foregoing parts, and which puts to shame everything of the best that has been done in this country or elsewhere before. It is a real treat to a ballad-lover to turn over Prof. Child's pages, and see all the different versions of every ballad, and of every line and phrase given, and to know what analogies it has in any and every language of the continent, into how many of these it has been translated, what are its sources, and all about it. The work reflects the highest honour on Prof. Child, and the college and country of which he is an ornament.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH has written an article for the October number of Macmillan's Magazine, on the passing of the Jesuits' Estates Act by the Quebec legislature. The writer is, as may be expected, an uncompromising opponent of the measure, and has delivered himself concerning it with all his wanted frankness.

THE next number of the Contemporary Review will contain an important article on "The Triple Alliance, and Italy's Place in it."

THE October number of the English Illustrated Magazine, which is the first of a new volume, will contain poems by A. C. Swinburne, Walter Crane, and Violet Fane; an illustrated article on "Ceylon," by Sir Frederick Dickson; on "The Embossing of Metals," by Mr. W. A. S. Benson; on "Wagner at Bayreuth," by Mr. G. B. ORIGINAL VERSE.

EVOLUTION.

A BOY sat dreaming near a summer brook,
Dreaming of things to come, and yet content
To view the landscape with enraptured look;
The sunset-bars of gold, with crimson blent,
Filled all his soul with silent wonderment;
His was a sacred joy, beyond compare,
To think this earth had scenes so wondrous fair.

Long years have passed; the boy hath learnt his share

Of knowledge of the toil that daily strives;
How earth is filled with bitter care and care,
And ceaseless want broods darkly o'er the lives
Of city-haunting toilers, men and wives;
How can his heart do otherwise than grieve
That earth has dens where ruffians cheat and thieve?

Oh! that the course of time could back return,
When sunset skies could yield a perfect peace,
When every slope, ablaze with golden fern,
E'en in decay show'd beauty's rich increase,
And every skylark's song bade sorrow cease,
Before the innocent mind had learnt to scan
How God's fair earth is marred by sins of man!

But wherefore backward gaze with fond regret?
Canst thou not learn the lesson God would teach?
His face is forward, and His laws have set
No limit to his forecast's boundless reach;
If even here, at times, joy visits each
Whose mind is pure, conceive what joys may thrill

A world unsoiled by crime, untouched by ill!

Look forward! Though thy mind must fail to guess

The vast developments of endless time,
Believe that He, whose smile doth even bless
This sinful earth, can, in his plan sublime,
Complete a universe that knows no crime.
Serve faithfully, help them that err, and wait;
God in good time throws wide the golden gate.

OBITUARY.

WE regret to record the death of Mr. Latham O. N. Percy Brickwood, which took place on Friday, September 13, at the comparatively early age of forty-eight. Mr. Brickwood was in his earlier days noted among amateur scoulers, and he afterwards became a writer of authority on rowing and rowing matters. During the last twenty years he has been a constant contributor on many branches of sport to some of the leading London journals. He was a very careful writer, and his polished sentences were models of lucidity and strength. A classical style is too often absent from English sporting literature, and in this respect alone Mr. Brickwood rendered a valuable service to the press of these days. We have spoken of the precision and exactness of his style; but on occasion he could touch a lighter vein, and some of his articles on grouse, setters, pointers, and similar subjects, published in the Pall Mall Gazette a few years ago, under the editorship of

Mr. John Morley, are redolent of the fragrance of heather and stir the pulse like the moorland breeze.

THE death of Miss Amy Levy, on September 9, has cut short a career of much literary promise. While a student at Newnham College, Cambridge, she began to write both in prose and verse. Some of her early poems, of which "Xantippe" was the most noticeable, were collected into a volume entitled A Minor Poet (1884); and Mr. Fisher Unwin has at the present time another collection in the press, to be called A London Plane Tree. She was also the author of two novels—The Romance of a Shop (1888) and Reuben Sachs (1889), the latter of which attracted considerable attention, both in this country and in America, by its bold delineation of Jewish life as seen from within. Miss Levy had only reached her twenty-eighth year.

THE death is also announced, on September 12, of M. Fustel de Coulanges, the author of La Cité Antique (1864)—a work which deserves to stand by the side of Maine's Ancient Law. He had lately devoted himself to the early history of France.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

IN the current number of Mind, Prof. W. James has a very fresh and suggestive paper on "The Psychology of Belief." The writer hardly discusses the nature of the mental phenomenon itself, but confines himself to its psychological conditions, and, of these, to the more variable and striking ones. The essay is a clever popular treatment of the question—Why different people believe different things; but it is far from being an adequate scientific account of the genesis and conditions of belief. Mr. Stout continues his concise and very readable account of the psychology of Herbert and his disciples, and Prof. Bain writes with his customary smartness on "The Empiricist Position." This last paper is instructive as showing what a long way the modern empiricist has travelled from the old sensationalist position—that all knowledge can be derived from sensation. According to Dr. Bain, we must have from the first not only the senses but the intellect itself.

The American Journal of Psychology (vol. ii., no. 3) contains a continuation of the remarkable history of a gifted mind wrecked by disease. The unfortunate subject of this memoir was not only a thinker and a poet of considerable promise, but a talented painter. Some of the semi-philosophical, semi-religious musings here reprinted are a curious illustration of the close proximity of a certain order of genius and insanity. Another article of general interest is Dr. Burnham's study of Paramnesia or illusions of memory. Among these, special attention is given to the common experience that the scene before our eyes, the events taking place, and so forth, are all familiar, and have presented themselves to us before. The essayist gives a careful judicial summary of the various theories propounded for the explanation of these phenomena.

IN Brain, Dr. Gaskell has a very ingenious and well-reasoned paper on "The Origin of the Central Nervous System of Vertebrates," and attempts, in the face of the prevailing view of recent morphologists, to derive this system from the Crustacean type. The paper is a brilliant example of the application of the theory of evolution to the facts of morphology. In another paper Dr. Ferrier discusses "Cerebral Localisation in its Practical Relations." His account of the large measure of success already attained by cerebral surgery supplies a damaging reply to those who contend that vivisection practised on the lower animals has been of no substantial benefit to man. Our knowledge of the precise locality of cerebral injuries is largely due to physiological experiments carried out on monkeys and other animals; and Dr. Ferrier here shows that this knowledge has already resulted in a considerable number of operations by which brain troubles have been permanently relieved.

EARLY ENGLISH WILLS.

THE Early English Text Society wants to have a series of the earliest English wills from all our chief dialectal centres whose probate registries contain wills before 1500. Dr. Furnivall began in 1882 with his volume of "The Fifty Earliest Wills in the Court of Probate, London, 1387-1439," and he has more in hand. They ought to be followed up by like gatherings from the south, the east and west midland, and the north; for though the Surtees Society has done its duty by the York and Durham wills, its editions of selections from them are out of print, and not easily accessible to students here and abroad. More early northern wills should be got into type. No editor has yet offered for these; but for the midlands, Mr. A. Gibbons, of the Lincoln Record Society—who has already edited a volume of abstracts of the early Lincoln wills—will probably edit a full print of the earliest three or five score for the Early English Text Society; while Mr. Walter Rye, the Norfolk champion in antiquities, will do the like service for the Norwich wills. The Canterbury ones will be edited by Mr. J. Meadows Cowper, the editor of so many of the Canterbury parish registers, and a former editor for the Early English Text Society. Editors are still wanted for, at least, the Salisbury and Worcester wills; and anyone who will volunteer for them is asked to write to Dr. Furnivall, 3 St. George's-square, Primrose-hill, London, N.W. Mr. Charles Wooldridge, of the Diocesan Registry, Winchester, has already kindly offered to help with his district wills; but as they do not begin till 1500, the society wants to take the earlier material first.

THAT local wills are invaluable for social history and for their words has always been allowed; but till Dr. Leon Kellner used Dr. Furnivall's volume freely for his History of English Syntax—as he has done, and is doing—wills were hardly reckoned as part of literature. Yet Dr. Kellner finds in them many valuable early instances of phrases which, if only colloquialisms at the time of their use, have firmly established themselves in our literature for many hundred years. And as to dialect, though that of each district is obscured by the education—more or less—of the priests who almost always drew up the wills, yet many valuable characteristics of local speech must be, and are, preserved in them.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MURATORIAN FRAGMENT.

Auckland Castle, Bishop Auckland: Sept. 6, 1889.

In the early part of his work (Haer. i. 15-16) Irenaeus quotes, from one whom he describes as "the divine elder and herald of the truth," some verses (ἐμμέτρως) written against the Valentinian heretic Marcus. They run as follows:

Εἰδωλοποιὲ Μάρκε καὶ τερατοσκοπε, ἀστρολογικῆς ἐμπειρὲ καὶ μαγικῆς τεχνῆς, δὲ ὧν κρατύνεις τῆς πλάνης τὰ διδάγματα, σημεῖα δεικνύς τοῖς ὑπὸ σοῦ πλανωμένοις, ἀποστατικῆς δυνάμεως ἑγχειρήματα,
ὃ σοὶ χορηγεῖ σὸς πατὴρ Σατὰν αἰὲ δὲ ἀγγελικῆς δυνάμεως Ἀσάστλ ποιεῖν· ἔχων σε πρόδρομον ἀντιθέου πανουργίας, some slight corrections being made in the sixth line, on which all critics are agreed, and which are suggested by the ancient Latin version. It will be observed that our poet is very fond of trisyllabic feet, and that more especially he affects anapaests in the fourth and fifth places. I should add that, as the editors give his text, he does not shrink from a spondee in quarto; but we might easily relieve him of this monstrosity by reading δυνάμεις in both cases, thus giving him two more of his favourite anapaests instead.

In this instance the editors could not well go wrong; for they were warned by ἐμμέτρως that some verse was coming, and have printed accordingly. But elsewhere, where there was no such warning, they are altogether astray. Thus in Haer. iii. 17.4 (a passage preserved only in the ancient Latin version) Irenaeus is made to write;

"Aque mixtum gypsum dans pro lacte seducat per similitudinem coloris, sicut quidam dixit superior nobis de omnibus qui quolibet modo depravant quae sunt Dei et adulterant veritatem In Dei lacte gypsum male miscetur," where the Claromontane MS. has "veritatem Dei, Lacte," &c. This is the correct reading (in being a repetition of the previous m), but not the correct punctuation. The sentence therefore runs,

"Dei lacte gypsum male miscetur," which is in Greek,

Θεοῦ γάλακτι μίγνεται γύψος κακῶς,

so that the mixing of chalk and water with milk is not a discovery of modern civilisation. I may mention by the way that not a few of our homely proverbs are anticipated by the Fathers. A lively writer, like Jerome, would furnish several examples. One occurs to me at the moment, "Equi dentes inspicere donati," "to look a gift horse in the mouth," which might have been a product of modern Yorkshire, but which Jerome calls "a vulgar proverb" even in his own day (vii. p. 538, Vallarsi).

Nor is this the only instance in which the editors of Irenaeus have been nodding. In Haer. i. Praef. 2. likewise this Father quotes one whom he styles in the same way (ὁ κρείττων ἡμῶν, here however rendered melior nobis in the Latin), and who is doubtless the same person. Here the original Greek is happily preserved, which I will write out as it ought to be written, separating the prose from the verse (without however altering a single word) καθὼς ὑπὸ τοῦ κρείττονος ἡμῶν εἴρηται ἐν τῶν τοιοῦτων [τῶν αἰρετικῶν] δτι

λίδον τὸν τίμιον

σμάραγδον ὅντα καὶ πολυτίμητόν τισιν βαλὸς ἐνυβρίζει διὰ τέχνης παρομοιουμένη, ὅσταν μὴ παρὶ δὲ σθένος δοκιμάσαι καὶ τέχνη διελέγξει τὴν πανούργως γενομένην δταν δὲ

ἐπιμύθῃ

ὁ χαλκὸς εἰς τὸν ἀργυρὸν, τίς εὐκόλως

δυνήσεται τοῦτον ἀκραιῶς δοκιμάσαι;

where however for ἀκέραιος we should probably read ἀκέραιος, as the Latin has "rudis quum sit." Very slight alterations would bring more of the context into the verses. Thus διοικουμένη might be substituted for παρομοιουμένη, and εἶσαν γὰρ for εἶσαν δὲ, the Latin having "quum enim." But this is sufficient to show that several verses are embedded in a passage which the editors print continuously as prose. Probably "our superior" in the two last passages is the same with the "divine elder" who writes against Marcus in the first.

The employment of verse or of rhythm for theological teaching was not uncommon in these early ages. The heretics had their own psalms, in which they propounded their favourite doctrines. From the orthodox point of view Clement of Alexandria, at the close of his Paedagogus (i. p. 312 sq.), has written a metrical hymn in honour of Christ for instructional purposes. An anonymous contemporary of Clement, who has been identified for excellent reasons with Hippolytus, is quoted by Eusebius (H.E. v. 28) as referring to the "numerous psalms and songs" (ψαλμοὶ ὅσοι καὶ ᾠδαὶ) written by believers in which Christ is spoken of as God. Again, in the fourth century the notorious Thalia of Arius, which was sung in the streets and taverns of Alexandria, will occur to us on the one side, and the poems of the elder and younger Apollinarius on the other. More especially, where a memoria technica was needed, as in the list of the Canon, verse was naturally employed as a medium. In the last quarter of the fourth century, we have two such metrical lists of the Scriptures—the one by Amphilochius, the other by Gregory Nazianzen.

I now come to speak of the Muratorian Canon. It is generally allowed that this catalogue emanated from Rome, as indeed the mention of "the city" implies. Of its date we may say that it is ascribed by different critics to various epochs between about A.D. 160 and A.D. 220. The general opinion also is that the document was written in Greek (though this view has been questioned by Hesse, who has found followers in Caspari, Salmon, and others), and that we possess only a not very skilful, though literal, translation, greatly corrupted however in the course of transmission. I cannot doubt that this view is correct. The literature of the Roman Church was still Greek, as we see from the examples of Gaius and Hippolytus; even though Victor, being an African, may have written in Latin. Moreover I am quite unable to explain the phenomena of the document, if it is preserved to us in its original language. In answer to this view, it is urged that on this hypothesis the document ought to lend itself easily for retranslation into Greek, and that the Greek reproduction ought to throw back light on the meaning of the Latin. To this objection the following paper will, I trust, be a sufficient answer.

But it does not seem to have occurred to anyone that the original document was written in verse, like the corresponding lists of Amphilochius and Gregory Nazianzen. Yet the more I study the work, the stronger does this conviction grow. Neither in phraseology nor in substance does it resemble a prose document. There is an absence of freedom and equability in the treatment. This is the more remarkable where the writer is dealing with a mere list pure and simple. It is obvious that he has to grapple with a medium which constrains him and determines what form any particular statement shall take.

The Muratorian Fragment has been translated into Greek prose by Bunsen (Analecta Antenicena, i. p. 142 sq.) and by Hilgenfeld (Einleitung in das N. T., p. 97 sq.). Either of these translations would, as it seems to me, justify the contention that Greek was the original language of the fragment, for it reads so much more naturally than in the Latin. I had not read either of these when I made my own verse renderings; but I note with satisfaction that the last words of the fragment, are translated unconsciously by Hilgenfeld into an iambic line, τὸν τῶν Ἀσιανῶν Καταφρύγων καταστήτην, as I had translated it, except that I should substitute κατὰ φρύγας for Καταφρύγων, since the Montanists are always (so far as I have noticed) called in Greek οἱ φρύγες or οἱ κατὰ φρύγας, never οἱ Καταφρύγες, at all events for some centuries. But would not "constitutor" be a strange word for a "founder" in an original Latin prose document? Why also should these Cataphrygians be called "Asiatic," except that an epithet was wanting to fill up a line?

"Asianum Cataphrygum constitutorem,"

Again, the author of Supernatural Religion, ii. p. 385, accuses the writer of this Canon of going so far as to "falsify" the words of St. John's First Epistle in his zeal to get evidence for the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel. He was a clumsy blunderer, if this were his design; for his abridgment has considerably weakened the force of the original. But his motive, I believe, was much more innocent. He had to squeeze the language of the Epistle into his own verse; and accordingly he wrote (as represented by his translator),

"dicens in semetipsum quae vidimus oculis nostris et auribus audivimus et manus nostrae palperunt haec scripsimus vobis," which may have run in the Greek:

λέγων
ἐς ἑαυτὸν· ὁφθαλμοῖσιν δ' ἐώρακαμεν, καὶ ἤκουσαμεν τοῖς ὤσιν, αἱ δ' ἡμῶν χεῖρες ἐψηλάφησαν, ὅμιν αὐτ' ἐγράψαμεν.

Now let us see what can be made of some longer passages:

(1)
"acta autem omnium apostolorum sub uno libro scripta sunt Lucas obtulit Theophilus comprehendit quia sub praesentia ejus singula gerebantur sicuti et semote passionem Petri evidenter declarat sed et protectionem ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis. Epistulae autem Pauli quae ex quo loco vel qua ex causa directae sint volentibus intelligere ipsae declarant Primum omnium Corinthiis scyama heresis interdicens deinceps Galatis circumcissionem Romanis autem ordinem scripturarum, sed et principium earum esse Christum intimans."

ἀρχὴν ἐκείνων Χριστὸν ὅντα δεικνύων.

For the form and quantity of this last word there is good Attic authority (Menander in Fragm. Comm. Graec., iv. pp. 93, 245). As regards the martyrdom of St. Peter and the journey of St. Paul to Spain, there can be little doubt, I think, as to the meaning. As St. Luke only records what took place within his own cognisance, his silence about these two important facts is evidence that they happened in his absence. But whether or not some words have fallen out in the Latin, such as I have given in the Greek, "semote [quum esset, silentium ejus] evidenter declarat," I will not venture to say.

where I am disposed to think that "completum numero" is a clumsy translation, perhaps corrupted by transcription, of the idiomatic Greek συντελεῖν ἐς ἀριθμὸν, "to be classed among the number"; but it would not be difficult to substitute a more literal rendering of the Latin. In this passage the repetitions "in urbe roma," "urbis romae," "sedente cathedram," "ecclesiae episcopus," lead me to suspect that we have here some surplussage introduced for the sake of foreigners, when the original document was translated into Latin for the use of (say) the African Churches; but I have given them the benefit of the doubt, and retranslated them.

But if this catalogue was originally written in Greek verse, who was the poet? In a paper written some time ago (Hermathena, i. p. 82 sq.) on the "Chronology of Hippolytus," Dr. Salmon (p. 122 sq.) discussed at length the notice of the authorship of Hermas, which the Muratorian Canon has in common with the Liberian Catalogue of Popes, the earlier portion of which is attributed on fairly satisfactory grounds to Hippolytus. He there maintains that the writer's "nuperrime temporibus nostris" cannot be too strictly pressed; that a change came over the Church after the age of Irenaeus and Clement of Alexandria, who both quote the "Shepherd" with deference; that this change took place in the interval between the two treatises of Tertullian, De Oratione and De Pudicitia, the work being treated with respect in the former and rejected in the latter, as having been classed "by every council of your Churches among false and apocryphal books"; and that the statement in the Muratorian Canon was the great instrument in effecting this change. The Muratorian Canon, therefore, may be placed at the close of the first century or the beginning of the second, so that there is no difficulty in ascribing it to Hippolytus, or at least in assuming it to have been known to him, and thus to have suggested the note which we find in the Liberian Catalogue. As however I do not see that Salmon elsewhere (Smith and Wace, Dict. of Christ. Biogr., ss. vv. "Hippolytus," "Muratorian Canon") has so ascribed it, though he still maintains the later date, I presume that he has changed his mind. Indeed, as he now holds the Latin to be original, he could hardly do otherwise.

Now I should not be prepared to attribute an influence so great to this document, especially if it came from Hippolytus, who was at daggers drawn with the heads of the Roman Church. But nevertheless I am ready to accept the Hippolytean authorship. To this view I am predisposed by the fact that there was no one else in Rome at this time, so far as we know, competent to produce it. Its first discoverer, Muratori, ascribed it to Gaius; but the only reason for considering Gaius, the Roman presbyter, a distinct person from Hippolytus is the fact that a certain Gaius, belonging to the same age, rejected the Apocalypse as spurious, whereas our writer (along with Hippolytus) maintains and emphasises the authenticity of this book. Gaius therefore is put out of court. But I seem also to see elsewhere direct evidence of the Hippolytean authorship. Among the works of Hippolytus, whose titles are inscribed on his chair, we read $\alpha\alpha\alpha\iota\iota\chi\eta\alpha\alpha\tau\alpha\tau\alpha\tau\alpha\phi\alpha\alpha\epsilon\alpha\alpha$. If correctly copied, this represents $\phi\delta\alpha\iota$ eis $\pi\delta\alpha\varsigma$ tās $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\alpha\varsigma$, "odes" or "verses on all the Scriptures." This might represent two titles; (1) $\phi\delta\alpha\iota$, and (2) eis $\pi\delta\alpha\varsigma$ tās $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\alpha\varsigma$. In this case the $\phi\delta\alpha\iota$ would only be available as showing that Hippolytus wrote metrical compositions, of which these verses on the canon might be one; and eis $\pi\delta\alpha\varsigma$ tās $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\alpha\varsigma$ would represent his exegetical works which, as we learn from Jerome, were numerous, though it would be a gross exaggeration. But against this separation two objections lie: (1) In no other instance in this inscription are titles of two separate works run together in one line. Thus $\chi\rho\omicron\nu\iota\kappa\omicron\nu\eta\eta\eta$ has a line all to itself, though only a single word. (2) The inscriber has already named the commentary "On the Psalms," not to mention the treatise on the "Witch of Endor" ($\tau\eta\eta$ $\epsilon\gamma\gamma\alpha\gamma\tau\iota\mu\theta\omicron\nu$) and the "Defence of the Gospel and Apocalypse of John," which might all have been dispensed with, if eis $\pi\delta\alpha\varsigma$ tās $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\alpha\varsigma$ were a comprehensive description of his commentaries and other exegetical works. What then were these "odes referring to all the Scriptures"? Might they not describe two metrical compositions relating to the canon of the Old and New Testament respectively, of which the latter only is preserved, being itself mutilated at the beginning? Before the extant leaves in the MS., which begin abruptly in the middle of the description of St. Mark, a sheet or sheets are wanting, and these may have contained the canon of the Old Testament. This was at least as important as the canon of the New in the eyes of the early Fathers, and precedes it in almost every ancient list, e.g. in Athanasius and Epiphanius, in Amphilochius and Gregory Nazianzen. The fragment on the canon is followed in the MS. by a passage from St. Ambrose (De Abrah. i. 3, §§ 15, 16; i. p. 289); and Jerome tells us (Epist. lxxxiv. 7) of St. Ambrose that he "sic Hexameron illius [Origenis] compilavit, ut magis Hippolyti sententias Basilique sequeretur." Probably Jerome treats the two works of Hippolytus eis $\tau\eta\eta$ $\epsilon\lambda\eta\mu\epsilon\rho\omicron\nu$ and eis $\tau\alpha$ $\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha$ $\tau\eta\eta$ $\epsilon\lambda\eta\mu\epsilon\rho\omicron\nu$ as one, for he only mentions Hexameron in his Catalogus, where Eusebius mentions both. At all events, Ambrose would use the second as freely as he used the first. May we not then have here possibly (I will not say more) a passage from a Latin translation of Hippolytus, which Ambrose borrowed verbatim?

If Hippolytus be the author of this Canon, it was probably one of his earliest works. He seems to have died about A.D. 235 or 236, being then in advanced age. Thus his birth may be placed about A.D. 155-160. His literary activity began early; for his Compendium on Heresies was founded on some lectures of Irenaeus which he heard in his youth, and for various reasons it cannot well be placed after about A.D. 185 or 190. In this case he might say with only a natural exaggeration that Hermas wrote the Shepherd "temporibus nostris," according to his own view of the authorship, which may or may not have been correct.

I may add that in the above translations I have avoided any metrical licenses which Hippolytus might not have used. My task would have been much easier if I had indulged in such monstrosities as we find even in cultured writers like Amphilochius and Gregory Nazianzen, writing on the same theme.

DAMPIER.

Bromley, Kent: September 18, 1889.

I am very sorry if I have unintentionally misrepresented Mr. Crawford in quoting his words about Dampier. The main point is that—apart from the ethics of his day—that navigator has a personal character and a scientific habit which widely separates him from the "ruffianly buccaneers," along with whom he is at present being tarred.

I certainly did not ask, or think of asking, "if any proof of the ill-behaviour of the buccaneers can be found in Dampier's narrative"; but I did ask, and must ask, if a man who is far above his time is to be charged with the faults of those about him, when all his evidence and allusions show him to be a very different character?

OLD IRISH AND THE SPOKEN LANGUAGE.

London: Sept. 17, 1889.

May I be permitted to confess to the blunder with which Mr. Fleming charges me, and to add, however, that it was never intended by me for publication; also that I am tired of seeing him repeat the same old one? If he cannot find later ones of mine I shall be happy to call his attention to some. I said "happy" advisedly, for so long as I can discover blunders of my own I know that I have not ceased learning. If Mr. Fleming wishes to apply to me the charge of "affecting to despise or disregard" modern Irish, I protest. The late Father Bourke and Mr. Hennessy could have told him that once on a time I took considerable pains to familiarise myself with modern Irish, and that I even acquired some facility in speaking it before leaving the country. Alas, it is now many years ago, and one does not grow younger or even hear Irish every day at Oxford! As to the continuity of the language, that is an idea with which I also have long been impressed; and I go further than Mr. Fleming, as I should like to see Irish studied from its earliest Ogmic monuments down to its most tattered dialects wherever found, whether in Brinn, Man, or Scotland. But I cannot pretend to be angry with scholars who think they can do their best work by concentrating their attention chiefly on the literature of one or two centuries of old or mediaeval Irish; nor can I believe that Mr. Fleming is really angry with them or with any other men, only he does not wish them to become concisited.

JOHN RHYS.

London: September 17, 1889.

In a second excellent letter (ACADEMY, September 14), Mr. John Fleming criticises a line in Mr. Whitley Stokes's version of "Find and the Phantoms." That one line emanates from me, and I reserve for another place the justification of its being what it is, and the explanation of its being where it is. Provisionally, I have written to disabuse Mr. Fleming's mind as to its parentage.

STANDISH H. O'GRADY.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "CLOUGH."

Oxford: Sept. 12, 1889.

With regard to the "clough" in Cloughton, I still think that the etymology connecting the word with the Gaelic clach, a stone, may be rejected without the slightest hesitation. There is no historical evidence whatever that any Gaelic-speaking people ever settled anywhere near Cloughton. If Dr. Taylor will consult Prof. Rhys's little book on Celtic Britain, he will see that the learned professor finds traces of Goidels and Ivernians in what is now the Lake District, and also in the South-West of England, but elsewhere in England only settlements of Brythonic Celts. There is no evidence that the word clach was in use among the Brythons. Again, Dr. Taylor thinks that the Domesday form "Cloctun" supports his view better than mine. On the contrary, "Cloctun" can be the Domesday representative of O.E. Clōhtūn, modern Cloughton, just as "Hootun" is the Domesday representative of O.E. Hōhtūn, modern Houghton. Lastly, Dr. Taylor asserts that there is no clough (or cleuch) near Cloughton which would account for the name. I am informed by a friend who has just returned to Oxford from the neighbourhood of Cloughton that on this point the learned antiquary is mistaken. On the above grounds I am compelled to reject the Gaelic explanation so resolutely maintained by Dr. Taylor.

A. L. MAYHEW.

London: Sept. 16, 1889.

Clough is a townland five miles west of Tuam, and twelve north-east of Galway. It was there I was born. In Irish it is called "Cloch Bail'-in-Ridire," namely, "the Stone of Balin-Ridire," always anglicised and written "Clough." The stone in question is a very large roundish block, once capped by a flat stone, now leaning against it, and is situated sole in the centre of a lea or turlough, viz., dry lake, because it is flooded in winter by the river Clare, and gets dry in summer.

"DEBATE BETWEEN THE BODY AND THE SOUL."

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: September 16, 1889.

Sir Theodore Martin's poem on the above subject has had many predecessors. Besides the Debat du cuer et du corps de Villon, to which Mr. Morshead refers in his review of Sir Theodore's book in last week's ACADEMY, there is a Latin Dialogus inter Corpus et Animam attributed to Walter Mapes, and printed by Th. Wright in his edition of Mapes's Latin Poems (Camden Soc., 1841, pp. 321 ff.). In an appendix Wright mentions over a dozen different poems on the subject in nearly as many different languages, among them two or three in English.

THE HAISTWELL MS. OF CHAUCER.

London: September 17, 1889.

A statement in last week's ACADEMY (p. 166), in reference to the Chaucer Society, needs correction. The Haistwell MS., lately bought at the Perkins sale, has nothing to do with Tyrwhitt's Askew 2, which has been for many years in the British Museum (Add. 5140). It was bought by Mr. Stevens for nine guineas at the sale of Dr. Askew's MSS. in 1785.

What is Truth? By the Duke of Argyll.
(Edinburgh: David Douglas.)

JUDGING from the number of books recently published on the subject of Truth, the question of "jesting Pilate," which the Duke of Argyll takes for the text of his academic discourse, is destined soon to receive a satisfactory answer.

It is true that some of the works which have lately dealt with the question seem intended not so much to raise a fresh issue or to set forth a new method of enquiry as to formulate and reassert a foregone conclusion. They merely represent the authors' long-recognised standpoint. They are no more bona fide investigations into truth or the processes of its discovery than the rehearsal of a creed is an enquiry into the validity of its tenets. If a man, e.g., known to have pledged his faith in the flatness of the earth were to indite a work on Truth, one might be pardoned for expecting that his scientific heresy would occupy a prominent place in such a work, even if its indirect objects were not the inculcation of the heresy. It is no doubt difficult for any man who has diligently and ingenuously sought for truth to divest himself of something like an arrière pensée when he proceeds retrospectively to detail the progress he has made and the end he conceives himself to have attained. This initial difficulty is increased when he has already committed himself to a well-known series of dogmas on various points of more or less controverted knowledge. Probably the most trustworthy enquirer after truth would be the thinker who is least committed to definitive dogma of any kind, who is, in other words, more or less a philosophic skeptic; while the next most trustworthy would be the cautious dogmatist, who accepts his truths as provisionally adequate, but who has no desire to extend them to infinity in space or eternity in time, and who never considers himself entitled to an immunity from the duty of further search for the greater light which the most advanced human knowledge must always lack.

The Duke of Argyll could not be described as a philosophic skeptic; probably he would vehemently resent such a designation. It may be doubted even whether he could claim to be called an ingenuous dogmatist, understanding by the term a thinker accustomed to review and scrutinise his prepossessions and convictions. Probably he would not complain of the popular estimate he has long enjoyed as a born dogmatist—a thinker who on certain subjects is not only a rigid and uncompromising but a passionate and aggressive dogmatist.

At the same time no one can deny that, dogmatist though he be, the Duke of Argyll is a thoughtful and rational dogmatist. His convictions are not set forth as true because he holds them, still less because he has received them to hold. He has thought out his way to reach them, and is conscious of every stage in the process. Besides which no one can refuse him the merit of conspicuous ability in explaining his ratiocinations, nor of a many-sided culture which stamps everything he writes with a distinctively intellectual brand, nor again of a happiness and fertility of illustration which belongs to few of our popular writers on science and philosophy. The answer of such a writer to the question, "What is Truth?" may therefore claim the especial attention of anyone interested in its discussion. And I will add that no thoughtful man can read the duke's treatment of it without profit either of stimulus or conviction.

The lecture begins with an attempt to find a definition of Truth; that which most commends itself to the Duke of Argyll is the definition formulated by the late G. H. Lewes—viz., "Truth is the coincidence between the external and the internal order." This definition the duke not only accepts, but parallels, generally in the direction of enhancing the immutability of human truth. He arrives ultimately at the conviction which he thus presents:

"Whether, therefore, we think of Truth in the light of philosophy or in the light of religion, we reach two grand and most comforting convictions—the first of which is that Truth is by us definable, and the second of which is that Truth is to us accessible" (p. 15).

It is obvious that such a thesis stated thus, without qualification, is capable of almost endless discussion. The simple dictum that truth is accessible opens up a vista of controversy as boundless in its scope as the history of philosophy, of which it may not unfairly be described as the perennial theme. One might parallel the assertion by another—"The ocean is wadeable." No doubt it is, on its sandy shores and shallows all over the earth; but few would care to put "the wadability" of the ocean in the front rank of its characteristics. And this brings me to the crowning defect of the duke's conception of truth. He fails to grasp with the force which might be expected from a thinker of his eminence the great fact of the relativity of human knowledge. He manifests too much haste in transmuting the individual or general human conviction into an immutable law of the universe, operating through all space and in all time.

With this qualification which, after all, is no more than might fairly have been expected from a thinker of the duke's well-known idiosyncrasy and intellectual formation, I have only praise for his treatment of the question. Especially well done, for example, is his exposition of analysis as the chief method in truth discovery. He shows the operation of this method in the three different spheres of human thought—politics, the physical sciences, and religion. As my readers will perceive, they are fields in which the Duke of Argyll has been expatiating for many years to the pleasure and advantage of all thoughtful students. Readers of his Reign of Law will find some of the ratiocinations and examples of that work here again reproduced. I have no space to follow him through this part of his lecture, though I willingly bear testimony to the combined weight and interest of his argument. I would rather call my readers' attention to one or two points of fresh interest in relation to Darwinism—at least, they are points I have not myself come in contact with before. The first relates to Prof. Ewart's investigations into the electric organ of the skate, which the duke describes in these terms:

"Germs, prophetic of future use, in the lifetime of the individual, are the universal law. But germs prophetic of changes that may lie beyond the lifetime of the creature in which they occur—germs prophetic of changes which, when they emerge, will constitute a new species: these are indeed germs which demand a new interpretation. Yet such is the character of the facts which Prof. Ewart's investigations are revealing. He is tracking those very steps which Darwin thought it impossible to conceive; The steps, namely, of commencing and advancing structure by which electric organs are being built up and prepared for use."

The impression which Prof. Ewart's microscopic sections made on the duke must be given in his own words, though every enthusiastic and reverent seeker for truth will readily enter into the spirit which they evince.

"No words of mine can convey to you the impression they made on me. . . . I felt almost as if I could hear the voice which sounded near the Burning Bush—'Put off thy shoes from off thy feet—for the place where thou standest is holy ground'."

The other point relates to that intermittent recognition of Mind as an operating cause in nature which Darwin's life shows possessed the thought of the great naturalist. In an interview with the duke, who urged on him the need of some such recognition, Darwin replied—

"Well, that conclusion has often come upon me with overpowering force. But then—at other times it all seems—'And then he passed his hands across his eyes as if to indicate the passing of a vision out of sight.'"

There are other points of the duke's most interesting brochure which I would gladly have noticed, but I have already exceeded my space. I can only recommend the book as a striking contribution to the theme with which it deals. To the thinker, the student, to all who admit that search for truth is a universal and momentous duty, the book may be commended as stimulating and interesting in the highest degree.

JOHN OWEN.

THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS IN SCANDINAVIA.

Christiania: September 10, 1889.

THE eight Congress of Orientalists has been a long-continued festival. King and people alike have delighted to do honour to oriental science; and we have been simply overwhelmed by the princely hospitality with which we have been received. Dinner has followed upon dinner, fête upon fête, excursion upon excursion; we have been carried gratuitously by special trains and steamers past towns and villages thronged with shouting crowds, and decorated with flags, or lit up with illuminations; our meetings have been presided over by the king, who has entertained us sumptuously at the royal castles of Drottningham and Oscarshall; we have drunk mead at Upsala, on the tomb of Odin, surrounded by the professors and students of the university, and have listened to their choir in the evening in the great college hall; we have watched the death of Aida in the Opera-house of Stockholm; and finally we have been carried in two monster trains to Christiania, there to begin anew a series of scientific festivities. Hardly a moment of repose has been allowed us; and the Oriental Congress is, by this time, thoroughly tired out by too much pleasuring.

It is needless to say that the programme has attracted a good many members who have no pretensions to oriental learning. It is also needless to say that the working side of the congress has been thrown into the background. A night of dissipation is hardly a suitable preparation for a morning of scientific work. Fortunately, little that is new has been brought forward. The papers and discussions have been, for the most part, on subjects and questions which have been threshed out many times before.

Among the papers, however, of permanent importance the following may be mentioned:—Brugsch Pasha has described his discovery of a system of measures among the ancient Egyptians, and has compared them with those of other nations of antiquity. Interesting papers also by Profs. Maspero and Schiaparelli have been read on certain inscriptions of Amen-enhar I. and Amenophis I., while Miss Edwards has communicated to the congress the revolutionary results of Mr. Flinders Petrie's recent excavations in the Fayûm. Prof. Marucchi has further made the announcement that all the Egyptian monuments of the Vatican are about to be published by order of the Pope. In the Aryan section Dr. Burgess read a valuable paper on archaeological research in India, and Count de Gubernatis drew attention to certain Kashmirian representations, which illustrate the development of the god Indra into the god Ganesa. My presence in another section unfortunately prevented me from hearing a memoir by Prof. Tegner on the vowel i in the Indo-European parent-speech.

In the Semitic section Dr. Hildebrandt gave an account of the oriental coins discovered in Sweden. More than 50,000 have been found, especially in the island of Gotland, dating from the age of 'Abd-el-malik to the end of the tenth century; and belonging, for the most part, to the Sassanids, the Omayyads, the Abbasids, and the Bulgarians of the Volga. Gold coins of Mohammed and his rival Muselima were also described by Prof. Karabacek. Prof. Oppert delivered an interesting discourse before the king on Babylonian astronomy; and Prof. Haupt took advantage of a short but incisive communication on the death of Sargon to express the hope that the next meeting but one of the congress would be in America, where he promised it a hearty welcome. The rapid progress made by oriental study in the United States during the last half-dozen years is simply wonderful. I laid before the congress the results of my examination of the Kappadokian cuneiform tablets, of which I have already given an account in the ACADEMY; and Dr. Strassmaier described certain cuneiform inscriptions of the Persian period, one of which is written in an unknown language. Prof. Hommel announced the discovery in the Himyaritic texts of the name of the Assyrian god Rimmon, which would thus have been borrowed from the Babylonians by the people of Southern Arabia, like Sin the moon-god and Ishar.

The most important discovery, however, that has been brought before us is that embodied in Prof. D. H. Müller's Epigraphische Denkmäler aus Arabien. In this monograph he deciphers and comments upon the inscriptions brought back by Prof. Euting from his adventurous and successful explorations in northern and central Arabia, as well as upon some of the inscriptions found by Mr. Doughty. Prof. Euting has obtained more than 900 inscriptions, which fall into three classes—proto-Arabic, Minaean, and what Prof. Müller entitles Likhyanian. The latter inscriptions, found especially, like the Minaean, in El-Ola and El-Hijr, probably belong to the Thamud dean tribes of ancient writers; but as the name of Thamud does not occur in them, while the kings mentioned in them claim to have ruled over Likhyan, it is advisable—for the present, at least—to apply to them the latter name. The characters in which they are written form a link between the early Phœnician and Minaean or Himyaritic alphabets; and the language of them, though distinctly north-Semitic, nevertheless possesses the article ha, and forms the Niphal participle without a prefixed m. Their antiquity may be judged from the fact that Prof. Müller has found a Likhyanian inscription on a Babylonian cylinder in the British Museum which is assigned to the tenth century B.C. The Minaean inscriptions belong to a south Arabian colony, and may be connected with the Sabæan tribes who, as we learn from the Assyrian texts, were settled in northern Arabia in the time of Tiglath-pileser and Sargon. The 700 proto-Arabic inscriptions collected by Prof. Euting, which are scattered over a wide extent of country, are reserved by Prof. Müller for a future publication. The language of them closely resembles the Likhyanian, and, like the latter, possesses an article ha. Many of them are written in a vertical direction, thus throwing light on the fact that the Himyaritic letters can so frequently be reduced to their Phœnician prototypes by turning them upon one side.

Of equal importance with Prof. Müller's work, though in a different field, is an elaborate volume, published under the auspices of the Finnish Archaeological Society, on the inscriptions discovered on the upper banks of the Yenissei, of which I spoke in my last letter. The inscriptions are carefully reproduced, and have been analysed by Prof. Donner, who drew the attention of the congress to them. He has made out a list of the characters occurring in them, which are plainly alphabetic; and as the words are separated from one another by points, while the age of the texts can be approximately fixed by the help of Chinese objects found in connexion with them, we may hope that their decipherment is not far distant.

Before finishing this brief sketch of the "Acts of the Congress," I must not omit to notice a special session held under the presidency of the King of Sweden. This was inaugurated by a brilliant lecture by Brugsch Pasha on Egyptian funeral ceremonies and beliefs, illustrated by two mummies from Ekhnim, which turned a vacant stare upon the audience. Brugsch Pasha was followed by Prof. Max Müller. Unfortunately, the Oxford professor spoke in German, and consequently was not understood by the Indian members of the Congress who were present. Two of the other speakers were Prof. de Goeje, whose comparison of the legend of St. Brandan with the story of Sindibad will be of the highest interest to Celtic scholars, and Dr. Stolpe. The subject of Dr. Stolpe's memoir was the development of ornament among the population of Oceania, to which he traced the origin of the writing once employed in Easter Island.

The final banquet of the congress at Stockholm was distinguished by a novel feature. Each copy of the menu was accompanied by a volume, got up in an Oriental style, and containing original poems on the several courses of the dinner in Egyptian Arabic, Chinese, Ethiopic, Sanskrit, Malay, Aramaic, Hebrew, Manchu, Javanese, Akkadian, Turkish, Coptic, Hieroglyphic, Himyaritic, Bishâri, Japanese, and Jagatai, while the praises of champagne were recounted in classical Arabic, and those of claret on a Babylonian tablet, the grace being written in modern Persian by a poet of Ispahan. The session of the congress at Stockholm had already been closed by the King in a happily worded Latin speech.

Christiania: September 12, 1889.

The eighth Oriental Congress is over, and most of its members have left Christiania, the greater number of them by a special train which will convey them to-day to a valedictory picnic at the foot of the falls of Trollhättan. Some interesting papers were read at the conclusion of the meeting. Prof. Chwolson described the remarkable monuments of Nestorian Christianity which have been discovered at Semirætshie on the Chinese frontier of Kulja. They consist of boulders of stone, engraved with crosses and vertical inscriptions which illustrate the transformation of the Aramaean alphabet into Mongolian characters. When at St. Petersburg, I saw a large number of the boulders in the Oriental library of the Imperial Academy of Sciences.

Dr. Glaser further gave an account of the 1032 Sabæan or Himyaritic inscriptions discovered by him during his travels in Arabia; while Prof. Euting drew attention to the new Nabathean texts he had found in the peninsula of Sinai. Mr. Ball exhibited a very remarkable relic of Babylonian art in his possession. It is a large globe of blue chalcedony, evidently the head of a mace, bearing the following inscription in beautifully cut cuneiform characters:

"To Nebo, the exalted lord, his lord, Nabumukin-abli the son of Nur-Sin, the stonemason (?) of Merodach, who dwells in Babylon, for the good of his life, for the length of his days, for the welfare of his seed, for the joy of his heart, for the stability of his foundations, in Babylon had it made and dedicated it."

Much interest was subsequently excited in the Semetic section by the description given by Dr. Zehnpfund, a young German Assyriologist, of his successful attempt to write Assyrian upon clay in the ancient Babylonian manner. After several experiments, he had discovered the exact form of the stylus used by the old scribes. It had the shape of a cube with a pointed end, and was made of wood, not of metal. With the help of such a stylus, he soon found that he could write the cuneiform characters as rapidly as German.

In the last séance of the Congress, Dr. Leitner had promised to give us an account of the people of Hunza on the slopes of the Pamir, illustrated by photographs and objects of industry; but the time allowed him was so curtailed at the last moment that he preferred to remain silent. Brugsch Pasha, however, delivered an eloquent discourse on recent discoveries in Egypt in connexion with the Exodus, with special reference to Mr. Naville's discovery of the site of Pithom. In the course of the address, he stated that Prof. Mahler, of Vienna, had succeeded, with the aid of astronomy, in fixing the date of the reign of Ramses II., the Pharaoh of the Oppression, which is thus shown to have lasted from 1347 to 1280 B.C. Brugsch further identified the city of Ramses built by the Israelites, not with Tanis-Ramses, but with another Ramses now represented by Phakusa between Belbeis and Bubastes at the western extremity of the land of Goshen. Prof. Brugsch's address was followed by a charming paper by Count de Gubernatis on the origin of the cosmographical beliefs embodied in Dante's Purgatorio.

A somewhat animated discussion at the final meeting of the delegates and committee of organisation resulted in the appointment of a permanent committee to look after the affairs of the congress in the intervals between its meetings. The committee consists of four members: Baron von Kremer, Prof. Dillman, Prof. Kuenen, and Count Landberg, the three leading nations of Western Europe—England, France, and Italy—being, it will be noticed, excluded from representation. No conclusion was arrived at as to the next place of meeting. Prof.

Kern suggested Lisbon; but the delegate from Portugal regretted the little interest still taken in his country in oriental studies, and pointed out that it would be some time before Portugal would be able to receive so large and learned a body as the Congress of Orientalists. At present, therefore, the congress remains without a habitation.

CRYPTOGAMIC TERMINOLOGY.

London: Sept. 18, 1889.

It may seem ungracious to refer to the one point in which the very kindly review of our Handbook of Cryptogamic Botany in the ACADEMY of September 14 calls us severely to task; but I wish to set your readers right on a simple matter of fact. The statement that the Latin form of scientific terms is "familiar in every treatise hitherto written on the special subject in any European language" is surely far too sweeping. Van Tieghem, for example, one of the highest authorities in France, uses the forms sporange, archegone, anthéridie, sclérote, epiderme, almost identical with our own; and equally high authorities could be quoted in the German language. Indeed, it was the fact that the Latin forms are being gradually disused by the best continental writers, rather than "insular prejudice," that, among other reasons, induced us to recommend strongly a similar change to our brother botanists in this country.

SCIENCE NOTES.

PROF. A. GRIEKE has recently visited Norway with the view of comparing the metamorphic rocks of certain districts near Trondhjem and Bergen with those of the Scottish Highlands. His investigations showed that fossiliferous rocks of Silurian age might be traced passing gradually into mica-schists, the metamorphism of the rocks having thus taken place not earlier than some epoch in the Silurian period. On the other hand, Prof. Bonney has visited the Lepontine Alps for the purpose of examining the alleged occurrence of fossils in crystalline schists, and does not verify the conclusions of the Swiss geologists. He still believes that the crystalline schists of the Alps existed as such prior to any rock which can be regarded as of palaeozoic age, much less of mesozoic age, as the occurrence of belemnites in certain schistose rocks had suggested.

MR. JOHN BOWER has written for the young people's section of the National Home Reading Union a work entitled Science of Everyday Life, which forms a volume for the first year's course. It will be published in a few days by Messrs. Cassell & Co. with illustrations.

MESSRS. TAYLOR & FRANCIS have just issued the second and concluding volume of the late Dr. Francis Day's monograph on Fishes, forming part of "The Fauna of British India" which is being edited by Mr. W. T. Blandford for the Indian government. The two volumes together consist of nearly 1100 pages, illustrated with about 340 woodcuts. In the preface the editor gracefully acknowledges the value of Dr. Day's lifelong labours in this department of zoology. It is stated that the remaining parts of the work, dealing with other classes of Vertebrata, are well advanced towards completion; and that a volume on Birds, by Mr. E. W. Oates, will probably appear before the close of the year. Up to the present only one part of the editor's own volume on Mammalia has been published; but the thoroughness, exactitude, and general interest of that part make us look forward with eagerness to the appearance of the remainder.

FINE ART.

"BRITISH MUSEUM CATALOGUE OF GREEK COINS."—Corinth and her Colonies. By Barclay V. Head. (Longmans.)

THIS is not one of the most interesting of the long series of volumes which the British Museum Coin-room has been sending out during the last ten years. Mr. Head has been entrusted with a rather thankless task in being set to catalogue the endless but monotonous issues of the Corinthian mint. For absolute sameness of type the Corinthian money even surpasses that of Athens. From the middle of the fifth century to the middle of the third not a single change was made in the image and superscription which distinguished it. With exasperating regularity the Pegasus and the head of Pallas recur on every stater that was sent into circulation. We do not even meet with the interesting series of magistrates' names that redeems the dullness of the annals of the mint of Athens. The Corinthian monetary magistrate was at most allowed to insert two letters of his name, and to place a tiny symbol behind the head of Pallas on the reverse of the coins he issued. Instead of being able, as at Athens, to identify numbers of historical personages, such as Apellikon or Antiochus, Aristion or Callias, we find rows of uninteresting Δ I-s and AP-s, Ξ O-s and NI-s, whose personality will remain for ever uncertain.

The colonies of Corinth sinned no less deeply in this way than their mother city. Leucas and Ambracia, Anactorium and Dyrrhachium, linked to their parent by a close monetary league, imitated her issues with the most slavish accuracy. A Leucadian coin only differs from a Corinthian one of the same date in the one fact that instead of the letter Koppa it has inscribed below the inevitable Pegasus the letters A or AEY.

It results that the coinage of Corinth and her colonies is quite the most uninteresting and almost the most difficult to arrange in the whole Greek series. In the latter failing, indeed, it is only excelled by the prolific mintage struck in the name of Alexander the Great.

In constructing this volume, the British Museum authorities have had to choose between two systems of arrangement. Should they place coins bearing the Pegasus and Pallas-head all together in a single volume, or disperse them among the volumes dealing with the divers regions that contained towns belonging to the Corinthian monetary league? Should issues of Rhegium or Apollonia, when they copy Corinthian types, appear in the volumes Italy or Thessaly to Aetolia, or be massed with those of the city which they imitated? It was, perhaps, best to accept, as has been done, the latter alternative; but the results are in some respects unhappy. The arrangement breaks up the continuity of the monetary history of all towns which were not consistent in their adherence to Corinthian types. We find the vast majority of the coins of a place, such as Coreyra or Rhegium, which only yielded for a moment to the Corinthian influence, arranged in one book, and the small minority of pieces which are based on the Corinthian system placed in another. The line, too, is sometimes hard to draw. There are, for example, pieces of copper belonging to Leucas, which bear on one side the Pegasus of Corinth, on the other a chimaera, also a Corinthian type, but one not found along with the Pegasus or any actual copper coin of the mother city. For this reason these Leucadian pieces are taken out from among the rest of the issues of their city, and stranded in the volume Thessaly to Aetolia, far from their silver contemporaries. Such anomalies are, perhaps, unavoidable, but they are unfortunate.

One series of coins of some interest Corinth does possess. In the times of the Roman empire the new town, which the first Caesar had founded on the site of the city destroyed by Mummius, struck a considerable number of copper coins with interesting mythological subjects on their reverse. We learn from them much about the local cults of Bellerophon and Melicertes, of the personified "Isthmos," and the fountain-nymph Peirene. They give us copies of several famous statues, and representations of some well-known buildings—the tomb of Laïs, the temple of the Divus Julius, and the harbour-works of Cenchreae. But artistically the pieces are worthless. They are executed in the rough bad style into which the art of Peloponnesian coins had sunk by the days of the empire, and only give the faintest adumbration of the subjects which they reproduce. This series runs down as far as Geta, and then comes to an abrupt conclusion.

When we investigate the list of towns which in the fifth, fourth, and third centuries struck coins in imitation of the Corinthian stater, it is easy to realise the vast extent of the commerce of Corinth. From the end of the Peloponnesian War to the time of Alexander she must have had a virtual monopoly of the traffic between Greece and the cities of Italy and Sicily. Hence not only towns like Syracuse, which were colonies of Corinth and had close political relations with her, but many other places, whose only dealings with her were commercial, issued money closely copying her types. Locri Epizephyrii, Rhegium, Leontini, and the Acarnanian league, may be mentioned as examples of this class. We notice that Mr. Head adds to them Mesma, as the state which issued some pieces bearing under the Pegasus the letters ME, following in this the attribution of Dr. Imhoof-Blumer. For our own part we should prefer to give them to Messana. If Rhegium on the one side of the Sicilian strait struck such coins, nothing can be more likely than that its neighbour across the water should have followed its example. With this exception we do not find anything in the volume to which we should append a mark of doubt. It is proverbially hard to pick holes in the publications of the British Museum Coin-room. We need hardly say that the autotype illustrations to the text are as good as ever.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE collections brought back by Mr. Flinders Petrie from his excavations last winter in the Fayum are now to be seen at 8 Oxford Mansions, Oxford Circus, where they will remain on exhibition until October 5. They consist in the main of three classes of objects; or, rather, of objects of three different ages. The oldest are a number of domestic articles, implements of bronze and flint, scarabs, beads, &c., of the XIIth Dynasty, or about the twenty-fifth century B.C. It was among objects of this date that Mr. Petrie found pottery incised with Cypriote letters, which has awakened so much interest. Second, a collection of necklaces, beads, &c., of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties, or about the twelfth century B.C. The finest articles from this find were reserved for the Bulak Museum; but Mr. Petrie has brought back some hundred fragments of pottery of the well-known Mykenæan type, incised with Cypriote, Phœnician, and Greek letters. Lastly, a set of amulets, alabaster jars, and coffins found in a tomb of the XXVth Dynasty. The present exhibition may not attract so much interest as that of last year, which included the celebrated series of portraits; but it possesses at least equal interest to the archaeologist, from the light it throws upon the early history of the alphabet and of civilisation in the Levant.

THE proprietors of Church Bells announce, for early publication, a work entitled Notable Churches of the City of London, which will consist of twenty-five full-page engravings, with descriptive letterpress.

THE next quarterly general meeting of the Royal Historical and Archaeological Association of Ireland will be held in Dublin, on October 2, for the reading of papers and the exhibition of objects of antiquity. Among other papers will be one on "Ecclesiastical Archaeology," by Bishop Reeves, of Down. On the following day there will be an excursion to Drogheda, to visit the tumulus of Dowth, the stone chamber of New Grange, the hill of Slane, Mellifont Abbey, and the round tower and sculptured crosses of Monasterboice.

THE Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia (July—September) contains three papers on the antiquities of Cabeza del Griego in the province of Cuenca. The site needs the spade of the explorer to unearth the Keltiberian, with its neolithic weapons, the Roman, and the Visigothic town. The inscriptions given are numerous and important, but the miliary stones are wanting. A Roman aqueduct has lately been cleaned out and utilised for the town of Sahelices. The best collection of the objects discovered is in the house of D. Ramón García Soria at Uoles. Other articles on Roman archaeology are "The Roman Roads between Merida and Toledo," by F. Coello, showing great prosperity in the district in Roman times; and on a terminal inscription at Ledesma, by Fernandez Guerra, which suggests Valluta as the ancient name of Ciudad Rodrigo. A notice of the MSS. in the Cathedral of Leon by Manuel Danvila is very useful; one on Cantiga Ixix. of Alfonso el Sabio by Father Fita helps to explain the popular success of the Roman over the Mozarabic liturgy of Toledo in the eleventh century.

THE STAGE.

"A MAN'S SHADOW" AT THE HAYMARKET.

BEFORE a brilliant, critical, and essentially a "Haymarket" first-night audience, Mr. Beer-b hm-Tree has obtained a unanimous verdict in favour of one of the most uncompromising melodramas of recent years. Authors, actors, men and women of the world, celebrities, nobodies, and busybodies, were of one mind in welcoming—not with the common civil assent of "first-nighters," but enthusiastically—a play of such a complexion as in the memory of living men has not been seen at the little theatre in the Haymarket.

A great deal of speculation has been latterly brought to bear by shrewd observers and critics on the question of what the London theatre-going public really do want. It is a public daily increasing in numbers and in intelligence and, perhaps, in independence of judgment. A knowledge of its requirements, therefore, is indispensable to purveyors for its entertainment. Does it want farce, farce-comedy, psychological melodrama, realistic melodrama of the Adelphi type, or costly scenic decoration, plus any tragedy of Shakspeare's? Or does it want sad and serious domestic drama with a moral, or some approach to the eighteenth-century comédie larmoyante?

It is abundantly evident that it can be well supplied in all these kinds. That it wants them all, and that it actually gets them all just in the form it asks for, a retrospect of the past theatrical season is enough to show. Mr. Pinero can give the public farce-comedy in its highest form, or sad and serious domestic drama with a purpose, as in his fine drama "The Profligate," or something like the old comédie larmoyante in his pretty play "Sweet Lavender." Mr. Jones with his "Middleman," the great manager of the Lyceum, Mr. Grundy, Messrs. Sims and Pettitt, Mr. Buchanan, and other playwrights can do the rest. Finally, there have been the two recent and remarkable performances of Ibsen's plays. Is it in this realistic and somewhat undramatic form that our theatre-goers, as some shrewd critics think, will choose in the future to have their stage entertainments served to them?

There are thus plenty of grounds on which to form an opinion; and with this last success of pure French melodrama at the Haymarket the conclusion is strongly forced upon one that the taste of the great play-seeking public is exceedingly catholic, that it loves variety and novelty, and that it is ready to give a hearty welcome, not to one particular form of stage play alone, but to whatever is really good and true in any kind.

At the Haymarket the audience had a thoroughly good piece of work before it, and there was no mistake about its reception thereof.

There is nothing, indeed, very new in "A Man's Shadow." The lines are the ancient lines; the methods are as old as the elder Dumas; and the essential issue, the good man followed and thwarted by, and finally prevailing against, his evil shadow, is no other than the main issue in more than one fine drama of the Dumas school. "A Man's Shadow" is the adaptation of a popular, essentially vulgar, and very long-winded melodrama now being played at the Paris Ambigu.

In its French form the play is virtually in nine acts, and is admittedly one of the most tedious examples of spontaneous melodrama ever put upon the stage. Mr. Buchanan, the English adapter, has shown singular skill in shortening and sweetening it, in giving point to the dialogue, interest to the characters, and enhancement to the incidents. In its present four-act form and in its actual kind, it is little short of a dramatic masterpiece; and its faults are not Mr. Buchanan's, hardly even those of the French author's: they are faults incidental to us all—audience, actors, and authors—who choose to breathe the unreal air of melodrama-land. It is our own fault if we choose to set our sense of the possibilities asleep and make believe to accept incidents that never do nor can occur in any lives of mortal men, to hear motives ascribed which even eccentric men and women never could entertain, to listen to sentiments which our non-theatre judgment would laugh at, to hear the actors talk in such tones and behave with such an excess of either vice or virtue as we know well in our hearts are not after the manner of human talk or behaviour at all. This granted, the play is admirable, the stage management excellent, and the acting best of all.

Here is the plot. Laroque (Mr. Tree) is a Paris merchant who, as the play opens, is on the brink of ruin. He is married to a woman he loves, and is the father of a little girl of eight. His bosom friend is the great advocate, de Noirville (Mr. Fernandez), in whose company he has fought bravely during the Franco-German War, and whose life he has saved. In the first act, de Noirville is pressing upon his dear friend, the hero, a loan which will save him from ruin. Laroque is about to accept when de Noirville's wife, Julie (Miss Julia Neilson) enters. Laroque recognises her as a cast-off mistress of his own. She tells him of her constant love for him, and proposes a continuation of the liaison. The virtuous Laroque rejects the proposal, and speaks of his devotion to his wife and his child.

Madame de Noirville, however, is not easily to be repelled; and when she is alone she sits down to write a letter to Laroque, a loving and compromising letter, again beseeching him to accept the money. As she finishes it, Luversan (Mr. Tree again) enters her drawing-room. He is the "shadow" the man with the marvellous likeness to Laroque, a mean rascal, and, it need hardly be said, a villain of the deepest dye. During the war he has been a Prussian spy—wounded by Laroque, captured by him, and by him as captain sentenced to death. He bears the hero a grudge, and mingles a desire for melodramatic revenge with the ordinary pursuits of a thief and swindler. He begins his interview with Julie by a full confession of his past wickedness, and his intentions as to future iniquities. He offers to collaborate with the rejected mistress in persecution of the hero. Julie not unnaturally refuses to have anything to do with so abject and compromising a rogue, whereupon Luversan gives her and the audience a sample of his quality by stealing and pocketing the letter addressed to Laroque just left by Julie on her writing-table. She is compelled to buy it back at a heavy price, but immediately afterwards restores it to him on his undertaking to use it to the detriment of Laroque.

The unhappy Laroque is able to raise 100,000 francs and pays it to his creditor; but he can borrow no more, and is in despair. He meditates suicide, and buys a pistol. Luversan, coming to Laroque's house in the master's absence, is taken by Laroque's child, so strong is the likeness, for her father. Laroque's windows look into those of his chief creditor, Gerbier, the banker, who can be seen sitting in his room by the light of a lamp counting his gold and notes. The sight inflames the cupidity of Luversan; and, taking advantage of Gerbier's invitation to the seeming Laroque to cross over and get a receipt for the money he has paid, Luversan takes the pistol and departs on his errand of robbery and murder. The villain is seen by the audience to enter the banker's room, a struggle takes place, a pistol shot is fired, and the old man is seen to fall and die.

Laroque's wife and child, and a female servant (Miss Norreys) are witnesses of the crime. Deceived by the extraordinary resemblance, they do not doubt for a moment that Laroque, in desperate straits for money, has committed the deed. Some time after, the villain Luversan, forging a copy of the letter which Julie has put into his hands, sends it, with the 100,000 francs he had stolen from the murdered man, to Laroque. So, he conceives, will the murder be brought home to the hero, and his vengeance be accomplished.

Laroque is suspected of the murder, arrested, and presently arraigned before the court, in a great and solemn scene. The evidence against him is overwhelming. His own pistol is found in the murdered man's room. The maidservant declares herself an eye-witness of her master's crime. The very money known to have been taken from the banker is found upon Laroque; and, as he has burned the letter that came with it, and magnanimously refuses to save his life at the expense of his friend's honour, it is clear he must be condemned. The court is adjourned for a few minutes, the prisoner removed, and the villain Luversan hands the original letter to her husband, Laroque's advocate. De Noirville's struggle between his duty to his client and his horror of his wife's infamy is but momentary. He makes an impassioned speech to the jury, and holding out the letter in his hand declares it to prove the innocence of the prisoner at the expense of a wretched woman. He is about to name her, and proclaim her and his own dishonour, when the effort overcomes him. He staggers and falls dead on the floor of the court.

The prisoner is condemned to death; but, his sentence commuted to penal servitude; he escapes from New Caledonia, returns to France, and finds his wife and child. Julie repents before it is too late, and divulges the machinations of Luversan, and her own share in them. Luversan himself is apprehended by the gens d'armes in mistake for Laroque and shoots himself at the moment of arrest. Laroque then admits to the police his identity, in the knowledge that he has now full means of establishing his innocence, and the curtain falls.

It will be seen how full of incident and movement and life, how incessantly interesting a plot of this kind must be in the hands of such a thoroughly competent playwright as Mr. Buchanan, and with such interpretation as it receives at the Haymarket.

With "A Man's Shadow" we are in the region of pure melodrama, and must not look too closely into the probabilities or even the possibilities. We must not, for instance, enquire too deeply how it comes that a lady like Julie, capable of good impulses, as afterwards appears, should give a letter, so compromising that she had bought it back from the scoundrel who had stolen it, into the keeping of that villain, and should thereby put her honour into his infamous hands; or how it is that this miscreant, who will risk his neck for the mere chance of plunder, should give away that plunder on the very remote chance of inculcating his enemy in a foul crime. It would have been, it must be remembered, the remotest of chances but for the evidence of the eye-witnesses, of which he knew nothing. Then again, why, when he had done his utmost, and spent all the fruits of his crime in ruining the man he hates, does he undo all his work, risk his own life, and actually, by the surrender of the letter, do that which would have saved his victim from the scaffold but for the unforeseen accident of de Noirville's death? There are other improbabilities, as, for instance, the question why Laroque should have been sentenced to death at all after the dying declarations of de Noirville. Would any judge have failed to enquire further into the mysterious letter, would any sane hero, even, condemn himself to death and his beloved wife and child to life-long misery and disgrace when the man was dead who had made the previous sacrifice seem right to him? These, however, are difficulties to be no more critically considered in the region of melodramaland than they would be in the region of dreamland. They even enhance the triumph, if not of the author, at least of the actors; and, allowing every credit to the author-adaptor, the great success gained by "A Man's Shadow" is still an actors' victory.

There has not often been witnessed from so critical an audience so sudden and enthusiastic an outburst of applause as on the first night greeted Mr. Fernandez's dying speech in the character of advocate. The audience appreciated this intense and passionate rhetorical display the more for being wholly unprepared for it. De Noirville is something of an invalid, and his manner in the first act is, as it should be, listless and subdued. Perhaps that excellent actor and pleasant gentleman a little overdid this undertone, in conscious preparation of a surprise alike for the audience and his brother actors. The audience, at any rate, had the benefit of such a shock of pleasurable astonishment as they but too rarely get.

Such a fine bit of passionate acting, concentrated into the space of three or four minutes, is a striking and notable thing. The critics have done it full justice, but it is not by such transitory outbursts that audiences are held. It is only by the patient, well-considered rendering of an important character, the result of long preparation and long study aforethought, that an audience worth winning can be interested and won. In all my previous experience of Mr. Tree's remarkable talent, I have never seen him to such advantage as in the dual part of Laroque doubled with that of Luversan, for the two cannot be separated by the critic, though the audience is but too ready to do so.

An honest critic must always desire to disparage a manager-actor to the utmost of his critical honesty, for the good reason that the manager is a despot who can choose his own part and stint his rival actors' parts while he makes his own as prominent as he pleases. In the present play Mr. Tree can be accused of none of the encroachment sometimes ascribed to manager-actors. He is reticent in his playing of Laroque; and there is not a redundant tone, gesture, or speech, when he plays the villain. The degradation, through gradual degrees of scoundrelism, of Luversan—from the jaunty swindler, as he makes his first appearance, to his final state of besotted, slouching, begrimed blackguardism and criminality—is a marvel of fine observation and fine playing, and is worthy of a great actor and the traditions of a famous theatre.

Miss Julia Neilson has a part of which little can be made. She is wicked, beyond all common sense and propriety of prudent iniquity, in the beginning of the play, all for the good of the piece, and is again conscience-stricken at its end for the same useful purpose, but from no other motive that appears. Miss Neilson plays this ungrateful part thoughtfully and well; but a part with no development is a hard one, and that the actress gets just applause from the audience is due partly to her good looks, her pleasant voice, and her distinction of manner, and partly perhaps to her good dressing. Mrs. Tree, as the wife of Laroque, has an important but not an interesting part, in which she is refined, pathetic, and dignified. Mr. Kemble admirably plays the President of the Court of Justice.

It is a pity Mr. Buchanan did not invent some fresh comic business. The fun made of the French divorce law by two French soldiers and a soubrette falls dead upon us on this side of the Channel, and is poor stuff even on the other. Such actors as Messrs. Collette and Robson, and Miss Norreys, are worthy of better lines. Miss Norreys had one short opportunity, in the scene of the murder, of showing how good and clever a player she is; and she used it. She has chosen to cover her pretty auburn hair with a black wig—a circumstance which every sound critic in the house must have regretted! A pretty little girl, Miss Minnie Terry, with a bad cough (and who ought to have been in bed) did her not unimportant part excellently; but the acting of a child of seven is chiefly the acting of her teachers.

The Sword of Argantyr: a Dramatic Cantata in Four Scenes. By F. Corder. (Forsyth Brothers.) The argument, in condensed form, is as follows. A certain king hight Argantyr went forth one day to hunt. An earthman started from amid the rocks while the king was giving chase to a stag. The mannikin, in return for his life, which the king threatened to take, delivered to him the sword Tyrning, on which is wrought the rune—

"Draw me not except in fray, Drawn I pierce, and piercing slay."

When the king died in a battle on the island of Samsøe, the sword was buried by his side; and Odin hemmed in the grave with a girdle of ever-burning fire. Years after, Hervor, a mighty daughter of the king's race, gathers her warriors together, takes ship and steers for the south. A shepherd, Hjalmar, the watcher over the grave on Samsøe, guides Hervor to the place where Argantyr lies. The two pass the fire; and Hervor, "with runes of huge power, wakens her forbear and compels him to give her Tyrning. Hjalmar, with whom she is in love, tries to take the sword from her, so as to be leader of the race; but it pierces his thigh and he bleeds to death. Hervor sings a drapa over the dead man, and then sternly leads her warriors home. Whether Mr. Corder, who is his own librettist, has modified the story according to his fancy, or whether he has followed some other version of the legend than that contained in the famous Hervarar Saga, we cannot say. He writes in rhymed alliterative verse—good stirring lines; and up to the “fire” scene the interest increases. But the conclusion appears unsatisfactory. The simple sailing away of the maiden in the Saga is tame, but Mr. Corder scarcely improves matters by her strange and sudden love for the shepherd. The struggle for possession of the sword reminds one of the contest for pre-eminence, as related in another Saga, between Hjalmar and his friend Oddur before the fight at Samsøe. With regard to the music, all we can venture at present to say is that representative themes are used, and that the general style shows the influence of Wagner. From the pianoforte score one can gain but a vague idea of the effect which the music is likely to produce. It is a real orchestral score arranged for piano, not composed at the piano and afterwards arranged, as is sometimes the case. It is evidently a work which the composer has written with zest and courage.
